The commencement of the year 1805 found Admiral Cornwallis at his station off Ushant with a force not exceeding eleven sail of the line; while the French fleet under Ganteaume, which lay in the road of Brest ready for sea, numbered twenty-one sail. The British fleet, however, was speedily reinforced, and throughout the spring months it kept Ganteaume in harbour, although Napoleon contemplated that he should join Villeneuve in the West Indies, and "after ravaging the British possessions there," return to the Channel. "It was then that the great blow was to be struck," Napoleon wrote concerning Ganteaume on April 23:—"Dieu vaille que mon courier ne le trouve point à Brest." But as this aspiration was not gratified, Napoleon directed Ganteaume to remain quiet, and sent orders to Villeneuve to return from the West Indies to Ferrol, pick up the Spanish squadron there, and sail thence either to join Ganteaume off Brest, or directly to Boulogne, where he might expect to arrive four or five days before the British Channel Fleet. "In these four or five days the flotilla was to cross, and the descent be effected." Whatever Napoleon may have thought or said at a later time, he did entertain this plan in May 1805. The dispositions of the British Admiralty were doubtless made in view of all the alternatives open to Napoleon's commanders. It was known that Nelson had gone to the West Indies in search of Villeneuve. On July 7, in the morning, the brig Curieux reached Plymouth with intelligence that Villeneuve's fleet had been seen off Martinique and was on its return to Europe. The Captain of the Curieux arrived at the Admiralty on the 8th, after the First Lord had gone to bed, and the despatches were not communicated to him until the morning of the 9th, when, without waiting to dress himself, he wrote orders which reached Admiral Cornwallis off Ushant on the 11th. This promptitude of decision could not be credited by Napoleon. The orders were that Rear-Admiral Sterling should raise the blockade of Rochefort, and join Vice-Admiral Calder off Ferrol, who should also raise the blockade of that port and take with his own and Admiral Sterling's ships a station westward of Cape Finisterre. At the same time Admiral Cornwallis, with the Channel Fleet, was to cruise between Ushant and Finisterre. This plan was probably the best that could be devised; but it must be remembered that there were in Rochefort and Ferrol French and Spanish squadrons at least equal in strength to the blockading forces, and when the blockade was raised these squadrons had nothing to do but put to sea, and appear wherever they could do most harm to England. In fact the Rochefort squadron did sail immediately, and made a six months' cruise, in which it did much harm to British trade, and got safely back with 1,200 prisoners. This squadron was composed of five powerful ships, commanded by an enterprising officer, and we are entitled to speculate on the consequences of its turning up off Brest or when Calder was engaged with Villeneuve. The Spaniards in Ferrol were brave men, and they also had fine ships, but they did not hate England as Napoleon did, and they doubtless required to be stirred up by their energetic ally. There were also French ships in Ferrol, but they waited for the Spaniards. At any rate the combined squadrons remained in Ferrol until Villeneuve entered that port, and invited them to join him. He had sailed from Toulon, passed the Straits of Gibraltar, picked up the Spanish squadron in Cadiz, and sailed thence to Martinique, which he reached on the 12th of May. He had instructions to wait a month or more in the West Indies for the expected arrival of Ganteaume with the Brest fleet, and during his stay to do as much harm as possible to British colonies and commerce. Hearing of the arrival of Nelson in these seas, and not hearing of Ganteaume, who, as we have seen, was still in Brest, Villeneuve, in further pursuance of instructions, quitted the West Indies and sailed for Europe. He arrived off Cape Finisterre on the 9th of July. Nelson had quitted Antigua on the 13th of June, hoping to reach Europe before Villeneuve, but he only came in sight of Cape St. Vincent on the 17th of July. He sailed thence to Gibraltar for provisions and water, and on the 25th he received intelligence that Villeneuve had been seen five weeks before by the Curieux on her way from the West Indies to England, as already mentioned. Nelson again cruised off Cape St. Vincent, until, having reason to believe that Villeneuve had gone northward, he took that direction himself, and joined Cornwallis off Ushant on the 15th of August, where he heard all that had occurred. The Admiralty, on learning by the Curieux that Villeneuve was on his way to Europe, ordered Calder, as we have seen, to cruise off Cape Finisterre to intercept him. Accordingly, on the 22nd of July, Calder encountered the combined fleet about forty leagues west of Finisterre, and took two ships of it. Calder did not force a renewal of the battle on the 23rd, because, as he wrote to Cornwallis, it behoved him to be on his guard against the combined squadrons in Ferrol. He was not to be contented and recommended for not having resumed the action. The best proof that Nelson was not near enough to assist Calder is furnished by the fact that he did not hear of this action until nearly a month after it was fought. Nelson, doubtless for good reasons, shaped his homeward course for Cape St. Vincent and Cadiz, whereas Villeneuve steered for Finisterre and Ferrol. Thus Villeneuve had ample opportunity of combining with the Ferrol squadrons against Calder, or with Ganteaume against Cornwallis. He missed the opportunity, and it did not again occur. Having united the Ferrol ships to his own, he was still expected by Napoleon to attempt one more combination with Ganteaume. But he merely sailed from Ferrol to Cadiz, and lay in that port until he quitted it to receive a decisive defeat from Nelson at Trafalgar. We leave this statement of facts to the consideration of students, civil or military, of the art of war.

THE EGYPTIAN SLAVE TRADE.

A LETTER has been received by the Prince of Wales from Sir Samuel Baker, in which an account is given of the progress of an expedition undertaken for the suppression of the African slave trade. The letter is dated from Gondokoro, on the 26th of August last, and the writer says that at that place he has once more attained solid ground, after twelve months passed in unhealthy morasses. From the beginning of the enterprise all that the leader could personally arrange had been rapidly carried out, and the various branches of the expedition were united with admirable precision. But the Egyptian authorities acted as might have been expected. Sir Samuel Baker arrived at Khartoum on the 7th of January, 1870, and found that nothing had been prepared at that place for the expedition. There was not a vessel ready, and all people, high and low, were averse to the suppression of the slave trade of the Nile. There had been premeditated delays in Egypt, and the fleet, instead of starting so as to pass the catarnots at high water, dallied at various stations on the river until the passage became impracticable. Thus, instead of finding at Khartoum six steamers and thirty vessels from Egypt, as well as twenty-five other vessels which were to be provided at Khartoum, there was absolutely nothing ready at Khartoum except a house, which had been purchased by the Governor for the residence of Sir Samuel Baker. The authorities appear to have determined to thwart the Viceroy's expedition by a passive resistance, for which plausible excuses would be forthcoming. And for one season they did succeed in delaying it. By driving, threatening, and sometimes persuading, Sir Samuel Baker obtained thirty-three vessels, after losing invaluable time at Khartoum. He attempted to proceed with this squadron up a branch of the White Nile, called the Bahr Giraffe. The entire country was marsh, through which the river flowed beneath tangled vegetation. For thirty-two days he cut canals through dense masses of obstructive growth, from four feet to five feet in thickness. The season was too late, the rains commenced, and great numbers of the men employed upon the work died. Nevertheless the fleet crept forward until it reached a portion of the river where the depth did not exceed one foot. He was forced to return; but not wishing the Khartoumese to triumph over a temporary failure, he formed a camp about 700 miles above Khartoum, and commenced operations against the slave trade. He caught the Governor of Fashoda in the act of kidnapping women and children, and released the slaves and reported the Governor to the Viceroy. During his stay of seven months at this place he stopped all vessels, liberated the slaves, and put the principal traders in irons. Thus, says he, not a slave passed down the river in 1870. He made every preparation for surmounting the difficulties of the Bahr Giraffe in the ensuing season. He went down to Khartoum to superintend these preparations, and after much hard work got together 59 vessels, including a steamer of 100 feet length of deck, and 32 horse-power. The vessels averaged about thirty tons burden, and drew four feet of water when deeply laden.

The events of the second season began on December 1, 1870. A serious disaster occurred in the sinking in deep water of a vessel laden with sections of lake steamers. By great exertion the vessel was raised, dragged ashore, and repaired. The point was reached where the shallowness of the water stopped the expedition the year before. It was now the month of Ramadan, and the soldiers and sailors were fasting during the day and eating all night. Of course no work was done. The impatience of an energetic English employer of labour during Ramadan may be conceived. At length operations commenced, and many weary months were passed in working through vegetation and shallow channels. The country is a vast marsh, without a single dry spot to the horizon. "Fortunately," says Sir Samuel Baker, "I had English spears and broad hoes in hundreds, and slowly we dug canals, and dragged the heavy vessels forward." He had dismantled the paddles of the steamer, but she gave great trouble, owing to her length, in the sharp turns of the river, where sometimes 1,000 men dragged her bodily through the mud. Months passed in this severe labour, until Sir Samuel Baker, who was reconnoitring ahead, reached a fine lake, which in five miles took him to the White Nile junction. The news gave some courage to the men, and after a few days of hard toil the fleet of 59 vessels assembled in a portion of the river resembling a long pond. While engaged in cutting a channel in advance to reach the lake, the river, accelerated by the cuttings newly made in the rear, ran from under the fleet, and left it aground in two feet of water. The only escape lay in a strong dam, which was forthwith constructed of piles, fascines, and sandbags. "The success was perfect. The fleet, lately helpless, floated. The wind was strong from the north, and, two vessels taking the steamer in tow, we passed through the new channel to the lake, and shortly reached the Great White Nile. We all felt thankful for deep and clear water." The bulk of the fleet arrived at Gondokoro on the 22nd of May, having occupied five months and twenty-two days in accomplishing a distance of 700 miles from the Sobah junction, just above Khartoum. Formerly when the White Nile was open this voyage would have occupied twenty or twenty-five days. This is a remarkable example of English perseverance in repairing the consequences of native neglect. The White Nile having become blocked up by unchecked vegetation, the fleet had to make a channel for itself up a branch of the main river. "Thank God," writes Sir Samuel Baker, "we are here, with all the material of the expedition." He writes thus from Gondokoro within five degrees latitude of the equator, and more than twenty-five degrees from Cairo. He has 1,000 troops in good condition, and ten mountain guns. The Baris, who dwell around Gondokoro, declared against annexation to Egypt, and refused to acknowledge the Viceroy's authority. Hereupon Sir Samuel Baker declared war, and gave them "several lessons." His black troops are excellent. He wishes he could say as much for the Egyptians, many of whom are convicts transported to the Soudan for felonies, but he has them all tight in hand. He is building a new fort and town, after which he will go through the Bari country, with 600 men, and thoroughly subdue them. Until that is completed it will be impossible to travel south with so large a transport of material. He has written for reinforcements, which he hopes no intrigues in Egypt or the Soudan will delay.

It is evident from the tone of Sir Samuel Baker's letter that he is entirely satisfied with his work, but we cannot help thinking that the impression made by him on the Baris will be obliterated as soon as he leaves the country. We indeed hardly understand why the expedition was sent out unless it was to prove that an English vessel could float wherever the ground was slightly damp. No doubt every step in the enterprise, and particularly the giving of "lessons" to Baris, or, in other words, the killing of them, has proceeded upon the highest principles. As a place of residence for Englishmen we cannot think that Gondokoro has any attractions, except perhaps in the fact that "the post is merely annual." It happens that Sir Samuel and Lady Baker like that kind of life, at any rate until they are tired of it; but when they are, then we should say will come the deluge. Poseidon and Apollo did not sweep away the Greek entrenchments before Troy more speedily and completely than the Baris will abolish all traces of interference with their trade in slaves. Sir Samuel Baker says that he has succeeded in his main object. "The slave trade of the White Nile has ceased." And he believes that it cannot reappear except with the connivance of the authorities after his return to England. We also believe this; but we expect that the authorities will connive just as we expect that weeds will grow in the channel which Sir Samuel Baker cut for his vessels. The traders will offer to the authorities a handsome bribe, which the authorities will accept, and the old order of things will be restored and the "lessons" of Sir Samuel Baker will be forgotten. It might, indeed, be possible to find an Englishman to take his place, and even an Englishwoman to take the place of Lady Baker. It might be represented that Gondokoro was a distant and nearly inaccessible shooting-box with a "merely annual" post, and that the Baris were a peculiarly fierce and active kind of game which might be slaughtered on purely philanthropic principles. Sir Samuel Baker states in a second letter, dated the 19th October, that he has been obliged to make a month's campaign against the Baris, in which he has completely subdued them. But a spirit of disaffection has appeared among the officers, and is shared in by the men, because Sir Samuel Baker insists upon the suppression of the slave trade, which, as he admits, is contrary to public opinion in Egypt. We suppose that there is public opinion as well as steam-engines in the country of the pyramids; and probably it favours a convenient trade. The Viceroy has indulged his good friends the English in this little whim of suppressing the slave trade of the White Nile, and he does not object to their opening a water route to Gondokoro, nor even to their slaughtering Baris who may resist them. Sir Samuel Baker trusts that in a few months the country will be in peace, which is quite likely if the Baris feel that they have been soundly thrashed. Peace, when it begins, may possibly continue as long as Sir Samuel Baker has a force at Gondokoro which will obey his orders. We are happy to learn that the soldiers of his army who were killed in battle died "quite unnecessarily," and perhaps the sport of shooting Baris will not be less attractive when it is found to be moderately dangerous. There are probably many worthy persons in England who regard this expedition as a great triumph of civilization and Christianity, which is exactly what was thought of the enterprises of Cortez and Hernando de Soto by their contemporaries. A hundred years ago public opinion in England did not demand the suppression of the slave trade; and it is not surprising, although perhaps disappointing, to find that public opinion in Egypt favours what we have learned to think a wicked practice.

LOCALIZATION OF THE ARMY.

IN the speech with which Mr. Cardwell introduced the statement of his contemplated measures of military reform, he claimed for his plan that it would render future panics impossible. Nearly a year has elapsed since that confident assurance was uttered, but as yet he has done but little towards the attainment of his object. He has abolished purchase, he has changed the system of regimental promotion, and he has introduced autumn manoeuvres—for which last innovation at any rate he deserves all praise; but he has not organized our military forces, or placed us in any degree in a better position than that in which we were a year ago, either for resisting an invasion or despatching a foreign expedition. There is as much cause for uneasiness now as ever, and the worst of it is that we do not see any prospect of improvement. In order to render panics impossible, or rather to remove all reasonable grounds for apprehension, it is necessary that we should possess a sufficient number of well drilled, efficiently commanded men, fully supplied and equipped, and be able promptly to concentrate them on any given spot in a fit state to take the field. We do possess a sufficient number of men, and of these the regular troops are well commanded, and regimentally well supplied, clothed, and equipped. The Militia are but indifferently officered, and are by no means well treated in the matter of clothing and equipment. The Volunteers we need hardly on this occasion take into consideration, for in case of an invasion there would be ample employment for them in garrisoning our forts, guarding communications, and performing other important subsidiary duties. Even assuming the efficiency of the Militia to be within the next few months largely increased, we shall after all possess only the elements of a field army, not a field army itself. We have both the tactical units and the material of war, but we have not the organization which is required to connect these two into an army able to take the field within the short period which would probably elapse between the warning and the blow. Our military forces are not homogeneous; they are even in some respects antagonistic. The Militia is unconnected with the line, is administered, and even disciplined, differently from the line, with which moreover it enters into rivalry in the matter of recruiting; and of that welding into one harmonious whole of which Mr. Cardwell spoke last year so confidently, there are as yet no visible symptoms. As to the regular army, we even now find it difficult, if not impossible, to keep it up to its full strength, and we have no system analogous to the Reserve of Prussia for supplying the large gaps which soon occur during even the least bloody campaign.

In our opinion, the most effectual remedy for most of the evils we have enumerated is to be found in localization, which, while increasing the comfort of officers and men and the military strength of the country, would involve no additional expense. Under such a system, moreover, Mr. Cardwell's much talked of welding process would have a fair chance of success. By localization we mean the division of Great Britain and Ireland into large districts, each permanently occupied by a complete corps d'armée, with staff, military train, and subsidiary establishments complete. As regards details, as well as in general principles, we might with advantage follow the example of Prussia—divisions, brigades, and battalions being each permanently assigned to particular circles. So likewise it would be desirable to establish in each district magazines, arsenals, and storehouses, capable of satisfying the first requirements of the corps d'armée on being mobilized. Let us see how far such a system could be carried out as regards individual regiments. It will be sufficient for our present purpose if we confine ourselves to the case of the infantry. It must be borne in mind that we are in a different position from Prussia, inasmuch as out of our hundred and forty-one battalions of infantry (not reckoning the Guards), sixty-nine, or nearly one-half, are employed on foreign service. We have also two battalions in the Channel Islands, where no recruits are to be obtained, and twenty-one in Ireland—not counting a battalion of the Guards—where it might be imprudent to localize a large number of regiments. An exact copy of the Prussian system is therefore clearly impossible. A very substantial approximation to it is, however, feasible. There are only eight battalions which bear Irish titles, and of these on an average half would be always abroad or in the Channel Islands. Only four at a time could therefore be quartered in Ireland, even if the principle of local connexion were uniformly followed, and no soldier could pass more than half his term of service in his own neighbourhood. Any danger of disaffection might further be greatly diminished by quartering Irish regiments only in loyal districts, and by furnishing them with a proportion of recruits from an English general depot. The remaining thirteen line battalions of the garrison of Ireland would necessarily be furnished by English regiments in turn. Of the sixty-four non-Irish line battalions on home service, two would be required to garrison the Channel Islands when no Irish battalion took the duty, fourteen would be stationed in Ireland, and only forty-eight would be in Great Britain. And not even all the latter would in any case be quartered in their own districts, for Aldershot would certainly have to be kept up for training purposes, though it might be desirable that the original idea of a camp should be reverted to. At present Aldershot is nothing more than a gigantic barracks. From these considerations it will be evident that a non-Irish battalion would out of every twelve years spend, say, six years abroad or in the Channel Islands, a year and nine months in Ireland, fifteen months in a training camp, and only four years in his own district. Four years of uninterrupted residence in their own neighbourhood would, however, be a great boon to the men, who would cease to feel that enlistment entailed the utter severance of all their former ties and associations. Besides, it is an essential part of the system of localization that, be the head-quarters of the regiment where they may, the dépôt should for recruiting purposes be stationary. By this means a constant connexion with the district would be kept up, and every man would have a chance of adding a year or two to his regular four years' residence at home. As a rule, it would be well that every regiment should conduct its own recruiting; and under a system of localization this could be easily managed, and with great advantage and economy. The commanding officer would scarcely require to send out recruiting parties, for men on leave to their homes would practically act as such. If recruiting parties were required occasionally, the commanding officer would from his local knowledge be able at once to fix on the most suitable fields of action; and, moreover, he could ensure that none but efficient and thoroughly respectable men were enlisted. It would also be practicable to secure a plentiful supply of good recruits by establishing friendly relations with the surrounding civil authorities, clergymen, and landowners. But, indeed, solicitation would in all probability be quite unnecessary, and men, instead of needing to be persuaded to enlist, would come forward of their own accord to request admission into the regiment. The impulse given to recruiting through localization would, we believe, be greater than the general public can well imagine. All experienced officers know well that local connexion is of the utmost value in this matter. Recruiting operates at present by fits and starts. Sometimes it does not rain at all for months together, but when it does rain it pours. Recruits, especially in country places, are like sheep; where one leads the others follow blindly. When you get one popular man from a neighbourhood, his example is generally imitated by a dozen of his acquaintances; and if, as a rule, in granting commissions, gentlemen were as far as possible appointed to their local, or at least county, regiments, their influence would secure a constant supply of the best recruits. It would, no doubt, be impossible to obtain in all cases and at all times a sufficient number of recruits by regimental arrangements; but this difficulty might be met by establishing general recruiting centres at some of the principal towns in the kingdom—say, two in Ireland, and one each in London, Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, Liverpool, and Glasgow. Only a small staff would need to be employed on this duty, and the recruits should be as far as possible sent off at once to the regiments which required them.

It is obvious that discipline would gain largely by a system of localization; for officers and men would be known to each other, and the influence of the former would consequently be much greater than at present. The connexion of officers and men would begin before enlistment, and would not terminate on discharge. The influence of friends and relations also could not fail to exercise a beneficial effect. The soldier would not, as at present, be lost in the ranks of the army, but would retain his individuality, would have a reputation to keep up, and would feel that others besides his military superiors took an interest in his good conduct. Every crime, even every petty offence of which he might be guilty, would come to the ears of those whose good opinion would affect his reputation as long as he lived. Home influence would no longer lose its hold over him, while, if he wished to desert, he would be restrained by the thought that quitting his colours meant banishment from all he held dear. Moreover, as a large portion of his military career would be passed among or near his friends and family, the inducements to desert would be much diminished. Espirit de corps also would be largely increased by localization, for the soldier would feel that he had not only the credit of his regiment, but also that of his parish and county, to keep up.

What the intention of the authorities may be with regard to the marriage of soldiers we know not. With the present short service and the constant change of quarters it would obviously be difficult to encourage it. If, however, a regiment were, during the greater part of its home service, kept in one station, and that station the centre of the district which supplied it with recruits, marriage, instead of being detrimental, might be rendered conducive to the interests of the service. A commanding officer could, under such circumstances, take care that none but respectable women able to contribute towards the family purse were placed on the list of recognized soldiers' wives. Women of this description would be desirable acquisitions to the military community, and, permission to marry being only given to the soldier as the reward of good conduct, the means of moral control at the disposal of the commanding officer would be increased. Further, no longer haunted by the dread of constant and expensive changes of quarters, soldiers' wives would be drawn from a better class of women than is the case at present, and they would be able to support themselves without that aid from the State in the shape of lodging-money which they now receive. Instead of lodging-money, employment might be found for them in the district or regimental workshops. The result of such measures would be increased comfort, sobriety, and discipline, and consequently greater efficiency and attachment to the service. Much has been said and written about employing soldiers in workshops, and enabling them to fill up their leisure by civil occupations. Under present circumstances the frequent and uncertain changes of quarters interpose great obstacles to the carrying out of such plans; but if a regiment were kept for three or four years in its own district these obstacles would vanish.

We have said that localization would involve no addition to the estimates; we believe, indeed, that, even after allowing for the cost of a few general recruiting dépôts, there would be an absolute saving. The estimates appear to be purposely drawn up so as to baffie the inquiring zeal of economists; and we cannot, therefore, venture to give more than an approximate estimate of the saving which might thus accrue. In the last estimates the cost of recruiting parties is given as 13,000*l.*, besides 20,000*l.* for local dépôts for raising and training recruits for the regular and reserve forces, and for officers and men employed at schools of instruction for officers. In the preceding year, when no schools of instruction existed, 10,964*l.* was the amount estimated. Roughly disentangling the cost of the dépôts as regards the regular forces, we may fix the sum chargeable to recruiting and training recruits for the regular army at 22,500*l.* Consequently, as no training dépôts at all, and only a few general recruiting dépôts, would be required under a system of localization, we may assume that the saving would be hardly less than 20,000*l.* Again, were localization adopted, the aimless movements of troops in Great Britain and Ireland would be diminished by at least two-thirds. In the last estimates the cost of these movements, including the hire of horses, was 152,600*l.* It will not, therefore, be unreasonable to calculate the saving under this head at 100,000*l.* The cost of transport of stores is set down as 27,645*l.*, and that of regimental travelling expenses at 11,000*l.* Much of this expense, say 10,000*l.*, would be unnecessary in the event of localization. We arrive therefore at a rough estimate of saving of about 130,000*l.* per annum. Against it, however, must be set the cost of a few—now barracks, stores, arsenals, &c., and of keeping the troops in constant readiness to take the field. Still, even with this set-off, it is probable that in the course of a few years a considerable permanent saving might be realized.

We have hitherto dealt chiefly with the matter as affecting regiments individually, but the general advantages to the army are not less worthy of attention. By localization and the establishment of corps d'armée, we should be able to place the whole of our troops in the field in a state of readiness to commence a campaign at the very shortest notice. Every corps d'armée would be complete in itself, and would require for mobilization nothing beyond the mere order to effect it; and generals, staff, and regiments, being all intimately acquainted with each other, the army would be like a man-of-war which has been a long time in commission. Whether it were required to repel a hostile landing, or to despatch an expedition to the Continent, the system would be equally effectual for the purpose. Under such a system, and only under such a system, could efficient arrangements be made, by registering carts and horses, for supplying the transport required. The military topography and resources of each district would be thoroughly familiar to all, and the arrangements for every possible variety of operations would be prepared and recorded in the offices of the Staff. Finally, the military and the civil population would be drawn closely together, and the aid of the latter could be readily rendered and fully and systematically utilized. As the merits of such a scheme have long since been pointed out by able writers and practical soldiers, and as the experience of Prussia has proved its utility, it is difficult to conceive why Mr. Cardwell should not introduce it. At the worst harmless and inexpensive, the experiment is at least worth trying.

REVIEWS.

HELPS'S THOUGHTS UPON GOVERNMENT.*

THOSE who have read Mr. Helps's numerous writings on cognate subjects will anticipate the general tendency of his opinions on government. In his characteristically perspicuous style he points out the increasing complexity of human affairs, and the consequent inefficiency of private and personal action. A man may look at the moon without consulting his neighbours, but he will scarcely be able to buy a candle unless there is a shop in the neighbourhood; and when he requires gas he becomes dependent for light on those by whom it is manufactured and distributed. From similar results of civilization Mr. Helps infers that the province of government naturally becomes larger and larger; and with mild audacity he avows himself an advocate of paternal government, the alternative being in his opinion the fraternal government which derives its first precedent and its frequent practice from Cain and Abel. Historically the antithesis scarcely coincides with experience, for democratic nominalists or professors of fraternity are also the most fanatical believers in the wisdom and power of their ideal State. Modern French theorists are almost without exception utterly regardless of individual liberty; and their disciples in Europe, and even in America, openly denounce the national prejudice against official interference. To a certain extent it is undoubtedly true that communities, as they become more artificially civilized, require additional machinery for regulating their common affairs. The settler in a forest or a prairie, untrammelled, and often mismanaged, his own sanitary regulations, while the inhabitants of towns must necessarily combine, either of their own accord or by compulsion of law, if they require effective drainage. The supply on a large scale of necessities of life, such as gas and water, also becomes legitimately subject to legislative direction and to administrative control; and it is infinitely more convenient to be protected by a municipal police than by a casual aggregation of militant householders or private watchmen. Popular education, which had in Scotland and in several foreign countries long since been secured by legal provision, is now by general consent regarded in England as a matter which concerns the State. Unluckily the system of paternal government is liable to derangement when the heads of the household find in the management of the family the most appropriate field for fighting out their own domestic quarrels. In most departments of economic affairs the participation of the local or general government in administration is by general consent acknowledged to be useful; but the point at which official intervention becomes officious is a legitimate subject of controversy. The supply of gas and water has in many places been already entrusted to municipal authorities; and within a few years the remaining undertakings of the kind will probably be transferred to similar bodies; yet the change from Companies to Corporations will have been almost exclusively due to fiscal causes, which themselves depend on modern legislation. A quarter of a century ago a limit was imposed by Parliament on the dividends of gas and water Companies; and consequently the surplus profit belongs to the consumers, who are practically identical with the local community. To the shareholders, as soon as they become annuitants, it is indifferent whether they retain their property in its original form, or receive an equivalent payment; and in the majority of instances it is thought better that the beneficial owners of the estate should develop its resources. For the most part, the transfer is unattended by improvement or practical change in the administration. The details are necessarily confided to professional agents, who serve joint-stock proprietors or elected Town Councillors with impartial fidelity and zeal. If the Government, or rather the Legislature, had interfered a little earlier, it might perhaps have made slightly better terms for the consumer; but if it had meddled with the matter too early, it would have inflicted a heavy blow on enterprise and improvement.

* Thoughts upon Government. By Arthur Helps. London: Bell & Daldy.

Mr. Helps proposes only to correct in favour of paternal government the balance which, as he thinks, inclines too far in the opposite direction; but it may be doubted whether the ancient jealousy of supervision has not already been sufficiently impaired. Among all nations, the English and Americans, while they have depended least upon the State, have displayed the greatest faculty of organized co-operation. Little perversities, such as the unexpected shunting of trains in the awkward station at York, may possibly deserve Mr. Helps's censure; but perhaps he would have abstained from gibbeting the North-Eastern Company if he had known that they are at this moment providing for the removal of similar inconveniences by constructing at a great expense a new station open at both ends, where passengers will be able to resume their seats without a moment's perplexity. There is not much paternal government at York, but there is a great deal of it at Antibes. The reverence for the consigne, which, as all travellers know, forms a national religion in France, lately caused a score or two of dead bodies to be left for days without examination or recognition; nor are the friends of missing passengers at this day able to ascertain whether they perished in the frightful catastrophe. It is a smaller evil to run once or twice up and down the York platform than to be locked up in a den after the Continental fashion until the moment comes for a scramble into the carriages under the orders of imperious station-masters and guards. It is difficult to determine whether the abject submission of Frenchmen to administrative abuses, and the indignant resistance of Englishmen, is a cause or an effect of opposite systems. The wildest Jacobin at Paris or Antibes would never think of remonstrating against the heartless stupidity of the police. A traveller slightly hurried over his midnight coffee at York either writes to the Times or consigns his grievance to immortality in his published "Thoughts upon Government." The second series which Mr. Helps conditionally announces will illustrate by special instances the extent of the functions which he proposes to vest in the Government. It might at the same time be convenient to inquire into the nature of the Government itself. Sanitary regulations, for instance, must necessarily be entrusted to local authorities, who in modern times are elected by household suffrage. The Corporations of large towns have on the whole displayed an amount of public spirit and good sense which could scarcely have been expected from their origin. In default of the marked ability which is occasionally found among the members of the local parliament, Corporations are fortunately, like that of Ephesus, largely under the influence of their town clerks, who are with few exceptions eminent solicitors. With the aid of the borough engineer, the borough surveyor, and perhaps of the accountant, the Town Clerk induces the Mayor and Corporation to administer an approximately paternal government. The professional advisers consult the interests rather than the prejudices of the constituency with which they have only an indirect contract; but there are whole classes of abuses with which it would be dangerous to deal. The engine smoke which Lord Palmerston endeavoured to suppress in London is still emitted from the chimneys of every manufacturing town in England; and the discharge of mill refuse into the rivers is still perpetrated by the conscript fathers of the municipal community. In this case a central control is evidently required; and perhaps Mr. Stansfeld or his successors may contrive an adequate remedy.

The greater part of Mr. Helps's treatise is devoted to an examination of some of the methods by which administrative efficiency may be promoted. His long experience and his practical accuracy of observation give value to the expression of his judgment. On some points in which familiarity might have been expected to correct enthusiasm Mr. Helps seems to have indulged in imaginative dreams. During his whole official career he never knew of a job; and he believes in the Privy Council as heartily as if he had never entered its doors:—

The peculiar felicity of the constitution of the Privy Council consists in its including almost all those persons who have borne high office in the country. . . . It is most useful that there should be a body formed of the best men of business of all parties, from among whom Committees may be chosen to hear and decide upon many of the vexed questions of the day.

Mr. Helps must know best; but many persons not wholly ignorant of public affairs will be almost as much surprised to learn that "the power of calling such Committees into being has by no means fallen into desuetude" as when they are informed that for thirty years past patronage has been exclusively determined by merit. It is true that one of the two Supreme Courts of Appeal is technically described as a Committee of the Privy Council, and that its members are chosen without regard to political opinion; but it is a mere accident that actual or retired Judges are decorated with the rank of Privy Councillor; and Mr. Helps treats not of judicial, but of administrative, functions. It had been generally supposed that a lay Privy Councillor enjoys a titular sinecure as fully as if he had been created a baronet or appointed a Knight of the Bath. It is true that non-official persons, and sometimes political opponents of the actual Government, are commissioned to inquire into questions of importance; but it is not as Privy Councillors, but in virtue of their special commission, that they exercise their functions. Mr. Helps describes the Privy Council as "a consultative body, not of large numbers, not of one form of politics, not inexperienced in business, but which has the power to direct the immediate execution of the measures it may resolve to take." The official reports of the proceedings of the Privy Council always record the exclusive attendance of members holding executive office in the Government of the day; and the powers which are exercised beyond mere matters of routine really proceed from the President or Vice-President of the Council, both of whom are now members of the Cabinet. It may or may not be expedient that there should be a non-political Council entrusted with certain branches of administration, but, unless Mr. Helps has betrayed an official secret which had hitherto been rigidly kept, the Privy Council is either a name, or a department of the political and executive Government.

It is satisfactory to be assured by Mr. Helps that the permanent members of the Civil Service habitually co-operate in perfect harmony with their political chiefs. There is, indeed, no reason why any jealousy should exist between the motive power and the machinery to which it is applied. Every nation, directly or indirectly, chooses the depositaries of power, who in their turn depend on the possessors of administrative skill. In former times a King bore nearly the same relation to his Ministers which now exists between a Secretary of State and the permanent heads of his department. The higher authority can alone carry into effect what the official person may suggest or arrange in detail. In England the loyalty of subordinates has hitherto been secured by the happy circumstance that both classes of functionaries have consisted of gentlemen. It is possible that the same cheap device of universal competitive examination. Mr. Helps, in common with the great majority of experienced public officers, distrusts and disapproves the Chinese system of selection. It would perhaps not have been consistent with his plan to dwell on the importance of requiring in the civil servants of the State a certain social position. The training for examinations, though it may be intellectually mischievous, has the great and unforeseen advantage of being so expensive that it seems likely to be only adopted by the upper middle classes which under a more rational practice supplied recruits to the public offices. By preference Mr. Helps discusses less hackneyed questions, such as the advantages of statesmanlike foresight, and the inconvenience which arises from the want of time for statesmanship. The appropriateness of his citation of the Girondins as examples of want of foresight might be questioned on the ground that, if they were wholly wanting in providence, the defect was not redeemed by the possession of any moral or political quality which belongs to the character of a statesman. "There never, perhaps, was an instance in the world in which so many good men, having really great designs for the welfare of mankind, were so utterly deluded and deceived." If the Girondins had been good men, instead of being unprincipled fanatics, they would perhaps not have been so absolutely devoid of wisdom. The one consolatory event in the Reign of Terror, with the exception of the execution of the leaders of the Commune, is the destruction by more unscrupulous ruffians of the cutting men of blood who had not even the miserable excuse of being deliberately bloodthirsty. Pétion and Barbaroux, Brissot and Vergnaud, were as cruel as Robespierre as long as they had enemies or rivals to suppress, and they were almost exclusively responsible for the war which Robespierre desired to avert. They were parties to the massacre of the 10th of August, and to the judicial murder of the King; and they only ceased to promote the activity of the guillotine when their own necks were in danger. The great designs for the welfare of mankind, which consisted in a thorough-and ignorant devotion to a republican form of government, however much it may be a subject of sympathy and approval.

Criticism of such a work as Mr. Helps's Thoughts on Government is necessarily desultory. A thoughtful man who has passed a busy life notes reflections, not as they might be arranged in a systematic theory, but in the casual order which depends on events and opportunities. The work is the result of thought and experience, and in every part it is suggestive of thought. The prophet of organization, who has often commented on the importance of details, unconsciously perhaps exemplifies his own doctrines in the transparent lucidity of his style, in the clearness of the print, and in the fulness of the index. There are no wanton obstacles to the convenient study of an instructive disquisition.

SOUTH SEA BUBBLES.*

THIS is one of the liveliest books of travels that we have met with for some time. It records the experiences of two gentlemen during a yachting cruise in the South Seas. They describe themselves on the title-page as the Earl and the Doctor; and to the information so conveyed we can only add that the Earl, who is apparently the chief author, calls himself P., whilst the Doctor is described as K. As the number of earls' titles beginning with P. is decidedly limited, and as there are few amongst that limited number who are likely to have been yachting in the Pacific during the autumn of 1870, many of our readers will probably have little trouble in raising the thin veil of anonymity. We, of course, shall not attempt to do it for them; but we fancy that, from the internal evidence of the book itself, we can form a pretty fair guess at the author's character. He is obviously a young man, running over with a superabundance of animal spirits; he is a little inclined to indulge in downright slang—as, for example, when he calls one of the native rulers an "awful sweep"—and, in fact, to write with a free and easy disregard of the stricter proprieties of style. He has no scruple at occasionally firing off an outrageous pun; and he has no objection to something between a jest and a sneer at the most critical moments, and on the most serious subjects. Leaving a desert island in a small boat after a shipwreck, he remarks that the "proper platitude" on such occasions is "trust in Providence"; but he proceeds to explain, though meaning "no irreverence," that his view of his duty does not imply a belief in what is called a particular Providence; "two sparrows," he remarks, "do not fall to the ground without God knowing it, but the sparrows fall all the same." The Earl so far resembles a good many young English gentlemen of a lively, or, we might almost call it rollicking disposition, enjoying any pleasure that comes in their way without excessive scrupulosity, and inclined to make fun of everything, from lovely scenery up to theology. If he had been nothing more his book might have been one of those which, by revealing to us the character of the inferior variety of British traveller, unintentionally explain why he can be one of the most offensive of mankind. The Earl, however, is a good deal more. He has a very lively sense of beauty of all kinds, including that of the male and female islanders of the Pacific; he has plenty of humour; he shows a very kindly feeling towards his hospitable entertainers, and he writes with much apparent shrewdness as to the character of the missionaries and the queer white population of the Pacific. In short, he gives us the impression that there is genuine sense and feeling as well as humour under the superficial exuberance of slang and nonsense. If at times the latter qualities are a little too exuberant, we can forgive him in consideration of his merits, and we may hope that in the atmosphere of the House of Lords he will, as it were, become sufficiently oxidized with respectability. Yet even when that consummation is attained, we have no doubt that he will occasionally look back with a sigh to his picturesque Bohemia in the Pacific.

We have lately been inclined to fancy that the hero of Locksley Hall would find himself rather mistaken in seeking refuge from civilization in "the gateways of the day." Missionary reports will give you the impression that the valleys are filled with the sound of the churchgoing bells, that the inhabitants have ceased to be cannibals, have given up tattooing themselves, and have adopted white ties and black coats. The Parliamentary blue-books, on the other hand, make one fancy that a new slave trade is springing up which will speedily sweep the harmless islanders from the face of the earth. In each of these views there is some truth; but it is also true that many happy regions yet remain where the natives, still unspoiled by the white man's intrusion, remain what they were in the days of Captain Cook. The Earl is never tired of commending the graceful forms and the exquisite natural taste of the fair inhabitants. The glorious scenery and climate are propitious to happy indolent loafing. We have endless pictures of deep still lagoons, guarded by coral reefs from the ocean swell, the shores covered to the water's edge with rich vegetation, and a background of precipitous peaks rising in the distance. The natives are in harmony with the country. In an incredibly short time, says the Earl, "You feel a kind of really Christian brotherly love coming over you, a delicious indolence, a refined gentleness of temper, and a blunting of the edge of your moral sense." We know not how far it was owing to the personal qualities of their visitors, or how far it was in accordance with the ordinary customs, that the inhabitants of all the islands visited appear to have given him an equally warm welcome. "Whenever he lands the nearest native receives him like a brother, presents him with coconuts, bananas, pigs, and fowls, and is absolutely sure if any hints are made at payment. The young ladies think nothing of proposing to accompany him back to his native land or elsewhere ten minutes after the first introduction. He goes with uncomfortable forebodings to a school inspection, remembering the nature of such performances at home. There girls, boys, and women are one and all crowned with wreaths of the loveliest flowers; the whole instruction appears to be carried on by singing and dancing, even the alphabet being converted into a "really pretty song"; and the girls manage to combine diction with arithmetic. At Raiatea we come upon the one disagreeable native encountered—namely, the "awful sweep" before mentioned; but even of him it is written that he has his good points, "the chief one being that when he is drunk he goes away on the loose, and when he is sober shuts himself up altogether." Moreover, his Queen, a "wonderfully pretty girl," called Moa, and described with infinite enthusiasm, made herself in every way so charming that the Earl was strongly inclined, on hearing of the "sweep's" death, to go back and make her an offer. At Raritonga, whilst attending church service, he remarks a native elder in proper clerical costume, with a mighty pair of spectacles, joining vigorously in the hymn, and precisely resembling a "very bilious Scotch preacher." Next day he is treated to a state reception by the King of the country. Sitting at the doorway of the palace, he remarks a crowd advancing, in front of whom, frisking, bounding, and gambolling with the wildest antics, comes a native in a coat of many colours, flourishing a strange weapon, half spear, half paddle, and delivering an address interrupted at every three words by a series of frantic howls. The orator, as it gradually becomes evident, is no other than the preacher aforesaid. Following his lead, deputation after deputation advances, with strange drummings, with inconceivable bellowings, with wild Pagan dances, in which the surrounding crowd joins with a will, and each deputation brings fresh heaps of presents—bananas, and pigs, and fowls, and mats, and ancient weapons, and shells, and, in short, specimens of all native "objects of art and science." The deputations plunge furiously at the Earl; "they embraced him whenever they could get hold of him; they crowned him with riva-riva crowns; they girded him with strange belts, and clothed him with wild-coloured matting, till he looked like a cross between a Roman Catholic priest in full canonicals and a youthful Bacchus." When the storm of kisses and embraces had partially lulled, the King's life-guard performed such a drill as never was performed before; in fact, by the description, it appears to have partaken far more of a scene in a ballet than of any operation known to military sciences. The overflowing enthusiasm of the simple savages was not satisfied even with these demonstrations; the yacht was speedily flooded with a crowd of excited girls and men, and the proceedings ended with a national dance so expressive and picturesque that the Queen finally interposed in the interests of propriety.

This appears to have been the culminating point of the festivities by which the fortunate Earl was everywhere greeted. We have no space to quote more—not even to tell how the lovely princess, the beauty of Samoa, chewed cava for him with her own fair mouth, and ultimately produced a drink which, though he describes it as tasting like "thin gruel, into which the slightest suspicion of white pepper and rhubarb had been cast," was delicious for the sake of the giver. This was unluckily the last entertainment of the travellers, for shortly afterwards their yacht was hammered to small pieces against a coral reef, and they escaped after considerable danger in their boats. The main object of the narrator is to explain to us how admirably his captain and crew behaved, and to express his own extreme dislike to figuring in a romantic adventure. He calls himself a fool, and denies that he is a hero. It would be uncivil to contradict a gentleman, and we will therefore only say that, when we are wrecked on a desert island in the Pacific or elsewhere, we shall be very willing, in spite of these little drawbacks, to accept him for a companion. We could at least depend upon him to see the comic side of the most tragic occurrence. Meanwhile we must add a word or two as to the more serious reflections which, in spite of his rollicking tone of high spirits, he has added in the last chapters of his book. Without attempting to analyse his account of missionary enterprise, his view would seem to be to the following effect. The good-natured kindly savages—if it is fair to call them savages—are thorough gentlemen, and possess every virtue under heaven, with two trifling exceptions; they are hopelessly lazy, and they hardly know what chastity means. The missionaries have succeeded in putting upon them a superficial varnish of Christianity, but the old character remains substantially unchanged. The old heathen dances, which were supposed to have been long ago suppressed, break out, as we have seen, at a moment's notice; and at intervals, people like the Maoris, who were supposed to be model converts, sometimes cast off their new creeds as easily as their clothes. The genuine South Sea islander appears to be, like Pope's women, "matter too soft a lasting mark to bear"; and though he may be easily governed, he can hardly be transformed in character. The Roman Catholic missionaries have great advantages over their Protestant rivals in the superiority of their discipline, and the more picturesque character of their worship. Yet if the Earl, who seems to have a hearty dislike to that form of religion, is to be trusted, these advantages are counterbalanced by their tendency to introduce political disturbances, by the con-

* South Sea Bubbles. By the Earl and the Doctor. London: Bentley & Co.

picion with which the French are regarded in those seas, and by the more special and characteristic circumstance that the natives utterly refuse to see the advantage of celibacy:—

I will back [he says, in his characteristic style] half-a-dozen enthusiastic Jesuits or Marists, going the round of Polynesia, to do more to demoralize the people and shake what hold Christianity has upon them than five hundred of the most dissolute sailors.

The Wesleyans, on the other hand, are, we are told, not only tyrannical and given to insist upon Sabbathical observance and teetotalism, regardless of consequences, but are given to mixing commerce with conversion in a very questionable manner. The most successful missionaries, according to the Earl, are those employed by the London Missionary Society, principally because they take things more easily, and do not try to force ideas upon the natives for which they are not yet prepared. The great advantage of the Protestant labourers generally is in their wives, whose example does more than any number of sermons to teach the virtues of fidelity and domestic affection.

We give these opinions for what they are worth, and it is to be remembered that a very lively young gentleman receiving a series of "ovations" during three months' cruise in a yacht is hardly likely to get to the bottom of all the social and religious problems involved. His merits as a lively describer of a thoroughly free and easy and utterly unconventional mode of life are so great that he need not be ambitious to rival amateur compounders of blue-books.

FREEMAN'S NORMAN CONQUEST.—VOL. IV.*

(Second Notice)

AT the very opening of his reign, in the year of peace which followed his accession, William had already sketched out the main features of his policy—his conception of his own position as an English King, his resolve to unite England into a centralized kingdom by the destruction of the great Ealdoms, his system of administrative balance in the preservation of the Teutonic system of government and law face to face with the feudal institutions of the new military aristocracy. In the later chapters of the present volume Mr. Freeman has described the gradual working out of this conception when the ground had been thoroughly cleared by the years of gradual conquest. The ecclesiastical reforms of the King and his Archbishop, Lanfranc, are described carefully and with remarkable fairness; but "the general effect of Lanfranc's administration, the reform and revival of monasticism, the impulse given to learning," is reserved for an after volume. Even so, however, some use might, we think, have been made of Gundulf, whose personal life, so recently illustrated by Dean Hook, is passed over in silence to make way for his architectural efforts. On the other hand, Mr. Freeman has for the first time shown "the friendly relations which existed at the time between churchmen of Norman and of English birth," by his examination of a very curious document, a sort of bond of spiritual confederation between Bishop Wulfstan and his house at Worcester and the abbots of six monasteries, two of whom were foreigners and the rest English. The seven Abbots bind themselves into a brotherhood of devotion and mutual charity, and it clears away a good deal of misunderstanding about the real effects of the Conquest on the Church, when "we find prelates of foreign birth so readily taking their places alongside of the men of the conquered nation with whom they were brought into spiritual alliance." Here again Mr. Freeman is strongest on the constitutional side of the question. He dwells with much force on "the purely ecclesiastical character, unknown to English usage," which Lanfranc, with William's sanction, gave to the Councils which he held year after year for the reform of the Church.

In earlier days ecclesiastical and temporal causes had been heard, and ecclesiastical and temporal decrees had been passed, in the same assemblies, local and national. The practice of separating ecclesiastical and temporal affairs had even been solemnly condemned by a formal decree of a national Council. But this state of things was altogether opposed to the theories of ecclesiastical propriety which were held both by Lanfranc and by William. The episcopal laws which had been hitherto in force in England were now declared by King William and his Witan to be bad and contrary to the sacred canons. The Bishops were now forbidden to bring any cause which involved questions of Canon Law, or questions concerning the cure of souls, before the ancient courts of the shire and the hundred. Hitherto the Bishop had presided alongside of the Ealdorman, and the men of the shire had given judgment in matters alike ecclesiastical and temporal. The Bishops were now to hold courts of their own, in which alone matters of ecclesiastical concern were to be judged, and in which every man was bound to appear when summoned, no less than in the court of the civil magistrate. Here we have the beginnings of those specially ecclesiastical tribunals which, with lessened powers, have survived to our own day.

Of the conscientious motives which influenced both the King and the Primate there can be no possible doubt. But Mr. Freeman has omitted to notice how remarkably the arrangement suited both of the parties who concurred in it. The ecclesiastical theory of the time was flattered by the severance of the spiritual power from the civil; while the isolation of the Episcopate from the nation threw it during the Norman and Angevin reigns helplessly into the hands of the King.

There is, as we cannot help fancying, a certain tone of languor and weariness towards the close of the volume which perhaps accounts for Mr. Freeman's treatment of a part of his work which we should have supposed would have especially called out his powers. The various measures by which William engrafted his peculiar modification of feudalism on the older English Constitution are all accurately described, but we have no such general picture of the new Norman Constitution as Professor Stubbs has given us in two or three pages of the wonderful Introduction which he has prefixed to his little volume of Documents Illustrative of English History. The new administrative developments which, if they do not begin with William, were rapidly pushed forward by him; the increased jurisdiction of the King's Courts; the silent growth of a ministry and judicature in the King's Chapel; the germs of the Exchequer which one finds, for instance, in the Domesday Commissions, are passed over with little notice. Nor, again, do we find the special character of English feudalism, or the differences which separated it from the feudalism of the Continent, insisted on with Mr. Freeman's usual vigour. On the other hand, he dwells with especial animation on William's love of the chase:—

We must remember that in those days hunting had, in many parts even of our own island, not yet wholly lost its original character of defensive warfare with the wild beasts. Scottish traditions speak of the bear as still lingering on in the eleventh century, and it is certain that, at all events in the less cultivated parts of Britain, the wolf still survived to prey on the flocks, and the wild boar to ravage the fields, of men who were striving to turn the wilderness into a fruitful field. The stag and the roe, in northern Britain even the rein-deer, were still untamed rangers of the wilderness, whose flesh was sought for as food, and whose haunts might be profitably cleared for the service of man. In such a state of things hunting might be a sport, as war might be a sport, but it was something more. It was always a business; it might often be a duty.

With Ælfred, for instance, the chase had been as much a part of his Royal office as war or government; and even in the later legislation of Cnut, in the earliest Forest Law, the special claims of the Royal hunters had not interfered with the general right of every subject to slay the wild beasts on his own ground. But "with William a new period in these matters begins." What had been every man's duty was changed into the mere sport of a few privileged kings or barons, and Mr. Freeman finds in the Conqueror and his sons the first instances of that peculiar form of modern enjoyment which seeks pleasure "in the wanton infliction of suffering and death." He has perhaps borne a little too hardly on the Norman Kings, in failing to remark how inevitable such a change was as the waste progressively disappeared before the efforts of the cultivator while the habits of the Kings or nobles remained unchanged, and while the chase afforded their one means of escape, save war, from the tedium of their homes. But the observation is a very striking one, and it throws a new and satisfactory light on the bitter outbreak of the Chronicler against the new Forest Laws, and the resolute opposition of the people to them through two centuries of struggle with their Kings. As to the New Forest itself, Mr. White has, if we remember rightly, shown that there is a vast deal of exaggeration in the contemporary accounts of William's devastations, that the villages and churches, for instance, which he is said to have demolished, went on quietly enough within the extended bounds of the Forest itself. The moment indeed we get rid of the modern notion of "Forest" as woodland, and conceive of it in the mediæval fashion simply as land exempt from the common law and subject to peculiar provisions respecting the chase, the creation or extension of Forests ceases to be a very terrible matter, and certainly does not necessarily mean the "devastation of a large tract of fertile country." Any one who knows the New Forest knows that very comfortable villages and homesteads still exist within its bounds.

This enclosure of the New Forest, however, plays, next to the execution of Waltham, the most prominent part in Mr. Freeman's theory, or rather in the contemporary English theory which Mr. Freeman has taken whole from the Chronicler and Orderic, respecting the later years of the Conqueror. With these crimes his glory is supposed to have been changed into shame, and his reign to have died out in disappointment and defeat. The theory was a natural one with any Englishman of the time, and it harmonized with the feeling of the age on the vanity of earthly glory, which we find in Orderic, as we find it in Henry of Huntingdon:—

On the guilt [says Mr. Freeman] followed the punishment. William's later days of domestic trouble, of shame and defeat, the disgraces of his arms, the mysterious deaths of his offspring—events which have no parallel in the history of his earlier days—were, so men then deemed, so many strokes of the avenger to requite the blood of Waltham, and the ruined homes and churches of Hampshire. To speculations beyond this range the historian can say neither "yes" nor "nay."

Facts, as is very often the case, will save the historian from the necessity of deciding on speculations. During the eleven years which are used to "point a moral and adorn a tale," William remained, beyond doubt, the most powerful monarch in Christendom. Without, he was strong enough to hold even Hildebrand at bay. At home his rule was unbroken by a single revolt. He was strong enough to crush the intrigues of Bishop Odo with a single blow. After two years of preparation the Danish fleet did not venture to attack him in his island realm. The Great Harry, and the completion of his system of legislation, mark these years off supposed decadence. His "domestic trouble" arose simply from the worthlessness of Robert; and the rebellion of one son—a rebellion extinguished almost without an effort—was more than compensated by the fidelity and affection of his two younger sons. The death of a single son is no very rare calamity in a family. The "mysterious" death of his daughter rests on a slender legend. The "shame and defeat" involve themselves into a round about at the hand of his son and a repulse before Dol, for his withdrawal from St. Beanne was simply to meet danger elsewhere. Such events, at any rate, are too small to overload the greatness and glory of the last eleven years of William's reign. The view of his government during this period is fair and just, both in its notice of the order he preserved and of the peculiar character of the oppression which was practised under the forms of law. In his mention of the Judicial Duel, Mr. Freeman might have noticed the abhorrence with which the introduction of it seems to have been regarded by the English. The later history of either Leicester or St. Edmondsbury shows how dearly they were ready to pay to free themselves from its yoke. But the most novel part of Mr. Freeman's close lies in his narrative of the revival of the Benedictine monasticism in the North. From all the country north of the Humber the monks had been cleared away by the sword of the Danes, and Selby was the first religious settlement in the old Northumbria. The true revival, however, dates from the arrival of Prior Baldwin of Winchcombe with two brethren from Corham. "The three set forth on foot, with an ass to carry their books and vestments," and finally settled in the ruins of Jarrow. Among those who followed their example was one whose story furnishes an admirable illustration of the time:—

* The History of the Norman Conquest of England, its Causes and its Results. By Edward A. Freeman, M.A., Hon. D.C.L., late Fellow of Trinity College. Vol. IV. The Reign of William the Conqueror. Oxford: at the Clarendon Press. 1871.

Turgot, in after days Prior of Durham, Bishop of Saint Andrews, and biographer of the holy Queen Margaret, was an Englishman of noble birth in the parts of Lindsey. Already, it would seem, a priest, he was given to William as one of the hostages for the obedience of his shire. Kept in ward in the castle of Lincoln, he escaped by dint of a bribe to his keepers, and made his way to a Norwegian ship in the haven of Grimsby. In that very ship certain ambassadors from King William to King Olaf of Norway had already taken their passage. The hostage had been sought for in the ship by the King's officers, but the friendly Northmen kept him hidden till the ship had actually sailed. Then the hostage for whom such search had been made suddenly appeared before the astonished eyes of the envoys. They called on the sailors to turn back again, that the King's fugitive might be delivered up to him. The Northmen refused, and William's ambassadors had to put up with the company of the man who was fleeing from William's prison. The English priest was received in Norway with all honour, and the pious King Olaf took him as his master in divine things. But the heart of Turgot was ever and anon stirred by calls to the monastic life. At last, enriched with the gifts of the friendly Norwegian King, he set sail to return to England.

Eventually Turgot settled at Wearmouth, and revived the old religious house of Benedict Biscop. The story throws light on the dispersion of the English exiles after the Conquest, which is yet more remarkably brought out in Mr. Freeman's monograph on the Varangian body-guard at the Court of Constantinople.

In any review of such a volume as this it is impossible to do justice to the amazing research and critical judgment displayed throughout, or to notice all the points on which light has for the first time been thrown. The Hereward story, for instance, is cleared from its veil of legend; and William's policy towards Ireland is explained by his design of adding it to his dominions. The appendices are, as before, models of critical investigation, though we are sorry to find that the mystery about the siege of Oxford remains, after all Mr. Freeman's trouble, as great as before. The merits as well as the faults of his style remain unchanged. He is still forcible and exact, he still rises to a severe eloquence on great matters; but there is still the same tendency to diffuseness and repetition, and what we must call, for want of a better word, allusiveness. People are described by their titles or their fathers' names, or by some exploit or characteristic, when their own names would serve the purpose far better. The least satisfactory bit in the whole volume is unfortunately the description of William's death. But if anything could atone for this, it would be the new touch of interest which Mr. Freeman has added to the after-story in his description of the fire which broke out at the Conqueror's burial. There are a few minor points which suggest themselves as we close. "Cenomanians" is an awkward phrase when "Mancels" exists in Wace and the dialect of the country to-day. The special meaning of the word "Commune," the founding a new liberty on the "conjuratio" of the guild brethren rather than on any traditions of the past, is hardly brought out in the account of the rebellion of Le Mans. A false impression is produced when Mr. Freeman translates the "barbari" of Orderic or William of Poitiers as "barbarians." It is merely a bit of the false classicism of the time; and Lanfranc, in using the phrase of the English, simply meant "strangers," as Lambert did when he used it of the Normans themselves. But specks of this sort do little more than bring out the general accuracy with which the vast mass of information which Mr. Freeman has brought to bear is treated throughout. We shall look forward with interest to the new volume which is to complete the history of the Conquest.

HENCE JONES ON THE ROYAL INSTITUTION.*

IT can hardly have been possible to make a book of very lively or absorbing interest out of the history of the Royal Institution. But it cannot in fairness be denied that Dr. Hence Jones, out of the materials at his disposal, and within the scope to which his subject naturally limited itself, has succeeded in making up a volume of much value as the record of a movement which has had an important influence upon the progress of science in this country. Besides availing himself with due effect of the opportunities afforded him by his official position at Secretary to the Institution in Albemarle Street, he has searched widely and for the most part forgotten facts bearing upon its history and development.

* The Royal Institution, its Founder, and its First Progress. By Dr. Hence Jones, Honorary Secretary. London: Longmans & Co. 1871.

A great part of the volume, and that which will largely attract have the chief interest for readers at large, naturally treats of the history of biographical notices of the founder and of the successive generations of scientific men whose discoveries or teachings have given to the Institution a place of power in the world of intellect. The rapidly evanescent as regards the public at large is the glory of the pioneers or conquerors of nature, that the achievements, if not the very name, of Count Rumford may need to be recalled by somewhat of an effort to the minds of the existing generation. The "phenomenon" of his day, who, in a term of years within the ordinary span of life, had made his mark upon well nigh every department of human energy and knowledge, may well claim to have the monument of his genius and toil set in its fitting light before the eyes of posterity, and the lines which record his merits chiselled, so to say, afresh after half a century of decay. A life of Rumford, written by Dr. G. E. Ellis, of Boston, for the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, has furnished many particulars unattainable before, which have been supplemented by despatches and letters in the manuscripts relating the American War in the library of the Royal Institution, as well as by the unpublished correspondence of Sir Joseph Banks in the archives of the Foreign Office and in the State Paper Office.

The descendant of a certain James Thompson, who in 1630 landed at Charlestown, Massachusetts, as one of Winthrop's company, and settled at Woburn, about ten miles thence inland, Benjamin Thompson was born March 26, 1753, at his grandfather's farmhouse at Woburn. At the age of three the child lost his father, Captain Ebenezer Thompson, and his mother married again. He was not however neglected; but, though described as fickle and careless and disliking regular work, he had the benefit of a good grammar school, such as the law of Massachusetts required in every village, and he made special progress in arithmetic. Quick and energetic in his own way, he had a special aptitude for mechanical work, and at fourteen turned out a machine of his own for solving the problem of perpetual motion. Seeming unfit to be made a farmer, he was apprenticed for a while to a general goods dealer at Salem, and at the age of seventeen to a store-keeper of the same class at Boston. As early as this he was writing upon light, heat, and the wind, making fireworks, getting himself an electrical machine, and drawing caricatures. After grounding himself for eighteen months under Dr. John Hay in anatomy, chemistry, materia medica, surgery, and physics, followed by a medical course at Cambridge, he became master of a school at Concord, New Hampshire, formerly called Rumford. Here was the crisis of his life which doubtless in later years prompted his choice of a title. His marriage with a rich widow, Mrs. Rolfe, made him one of the chief men of the place. A major's commission in one of the provincial regiments introduced him to a military career. The breaking out of the War of Independence seems to have found him wavering in his choice of a side, but he is ultimately found in the King's service, and sent to England in March 1776 with the news of the evacuation of Boston. Here his scientific tastes brought him into notice among the leading men of intellect, and he was made a Fellow of the Royal Society in 1778, after having contributed to the Philosophical Transactions several papers upon gunpowder and projectiles, a subject which he had experimentally studied during a cruise on board the fleet. Meanwhile he had been engaged in the political service of the Government, and served as Under-Secretary of State for the Northern Department. In 1781 he was appointed Colonel of the King's American Dragoons, and was despatched with his regiment to Charlestown, serving with distinction until the disbanding of that corps at the close of the war. Love of a military life induced Colonel Thompson to embark in 1783 for the Continent, intending to seek service in the war expected to come off between Austria and the Turks. The "grand Gibbon," as the vainglorious historian styles himself, mentions meeting "Mr. Secretary-Colonel-Admiral-Philosopher Thompson" on board the Calais packet, September 17. An accident changed the course of Thompson's career. Such was the impression produced by him at Strasburg upon Prince Maximilian, afterwards Elector and King of Bavaria, that an offer was at once made him of military service under the Bavarian crown. Knighted by George III., Sir Benjamin Thompson received the King's permission to close with the offer.

The wonderful energy and versatility of his character now found a fitting field for its exercise. His first work in Bavaria was to rearrange the military service, and to introduce a new system of order, discipline, and economy among the troops. Ever mindful, he writes, of that great and important truth, that no political arrangement can be really good except in so far as it contributes to the general good of society, he made it his endeavour to render the military force even in times of peace subservient to the public weal, "to make soldiers citizens, and citizens soldiers." Fixed garrisons were formed, to which were attached military gardens, especially for the culture of the potato, and work-houses for the manufacture of clothing and accoutrements for the army, upon which, after six years, a net profit was declared at Munich alone of 100,000 florins. Of none of Thompson's measures was he more proud than of employing the army to sweep away the swarms of beggars, thieves, and vagabonds by which the country was infested. A system of mounted police was formed out of four regiments of cavalry. To make the soldiers and abandoned happy, the general idea had been first to make them virtuous. Reversing the maxim, Thompson would make them "first happy, and then virtuous." A public building on a large scale was made to comprise a public kitchen, a bakehouse, an eating-room, workshops for carpenters, smiths, turners, tool-makers, spinners of cotton, wool, and worsted, weavers of all kinds, dyers, fullers, and those engaged in washing. At this house of industry as many as 1,500 people were sometimes fed in one day, at a cost for fuel of no more than twelve kreutzers—fourpence-halfpenny. There is no little mystery as to how the funds for this gigantic phalanstery, which seems to combine much of the national workshops of French Socialists with sundry of the objects of Mr. Scott Russell's Committee, were forthcoming, and what was its ultimate financial or social success. We hear of subscriptions being invited, and gifts of bread, meat, and clothing being taken in. The work done was paid for; and the greater part being destined for the army, the result was doubtless for a while a great stimulus to trade and manufacture at the public expense. No wonder that when the great director of all this combined philanthropic and economic machinery was reported to be dangerously ill at Naples, the poor of Munich in multitudes put up prayers in church for him, Protestant as he was. In 1791 he was made a Count of the Holy Roman Empire, having been previously raised to the rank of major-general and Privy Councillor of State, and placed at the head of the War Department.

In 1795 Count Rumford again visited London, and here he promulgated, in an essay upon provision for the poor, with especial reference to his Munich establishment, the original idea of the Royal Institution. A light which will be entirely new to most people in this country is thrown by Dr. Bence Jones upon the primary design of this establishment, by the publication of Rumford's prospectus, dated January 1, 1796. This was a proposal for "forming in London by private subscription an establishment for feeding the poor, and giving them useful employment, and also for furnishing food at a cheap rate to others who may stand in need of such assistance." Connected with it, yet essentially subsidiary to it, was an "institution for introducing and bringing forward into general use new inventions and improvements, particularly such as related to the management of heat and the saving of fuel, and the various other mechanical contrivances by which domestic comfort and economy may be promoted." A public kitchen was to form the first nucleus of this institution, which was taken up by a number of distinguished and benevolent personages, the King himself accepting the office of patron. It was as a Society for Bettering the Condition of the Poor that its founder continued to refer to it in his letters from abroad to the managing Board after the scheme had been fairly launched. It is interesting, and we need scarcely add gratifying, to note, by the aid of Dr. Bence Jones's records, the steps whereby the philanthropic element of the design gradually merged in the scientific. The process was aided in the main by an intermediate portion of Rumford's scheme—the formation of a class of working mechanics, whose lack of knowledge was to be supplied by instruction in science and the arts, while work was to be allotted to them under the eye of the officers and lecturers of the Institution. In a large room on the ground-floor "we built up," writes Webster, the architect of the Institution, "for practising the men, chimneys and fireplaces of all kinds in a slight manner, pulled them down, and built up others. We fitted up improved fireplaces within, models of old-fashioned cottage chimneys, also boilers of various kinds, and showed how smoky chimneys might be cured," &c. Eighteen or twenty young men were to be boarded and lodged in the house. It was not till the second and much ampler prospectus of 1800, put forth by Count Rumford, that anything was said about providing attractions for the rich and diffusing a spirit of experimental investigation among the higher ranks of society. The setting up of a printing-press within the premises, primarily for the publication of the journals of the Institution, together with the appointment of a professor of natural philosophy and chemistry, "to the end that no false scientific doctrine might be taught at the Institute," and for the superintendence of all the philosophical experiments to be carried on thereat, were steps of progressive importance towards the mission which the Institution has since fulfilled in the world of science.

Its later history is bound up with the lives and the scientific discoveries of the able men who have in succession worked in its laboratory and lectured in its theatre. Of Dr. Garnett, the first lecturer, who held the post for less than two years, there is not much that Dr. Bence Jones has found to tell us. Nor in his lives of Young and Davy has he added much to what was generally known of the careers and labours of those distinguished men. His pages are more occupied with minute details from the journals of the Institution than with the strides in scientific progress which, by the agency of its illustrious staff, it has been the means of making good. There can be little doubt that the crisis in its life coincides with the retirement of its founder from the dictatorship which he exercised over it, and the consequent abandonment of the philanthropic crotchets which would have made science a mere stalking-horse, if not a laughing-stock. Of Rumford's personal qualities Dr. Bence Jones speaks with a tenderness which is pardonable in one writing, so to say, as the mouthpiece of the eccentric Count's darling creation. But it is impossible to keep back the impression of egotism, of fustian, and of inordinate self-sufficiency which every word and deed of his went to form in the minds of those who had to do with him. This idea of his character breaks out most fully in the otherwise friendly éloge of him pronounced by Olivier before the French Academy, January 9, 1815. In his public services and benevolent enterprises, it was not love for mankind so much as the love of dominating and ordering them about that animated Rumford. He had the ideas of a show-master or the pedantic absolutism of a mandarin. It seemed, said Olivier, as though all the low passions which he had been wont to observe in the wretches under his care, or in those whom his own good fortune had made jealous, had poured him against human nature. In milder terms Dr. Young speaks of Rumford as "ambitious of fame and distinction, and having too great a propensity to dictate without sufficiently regarding the opinions of those who were of equal authority with himself." The closing years of Rumford's life were clouded by domestic troubles as well as by bickerings with the French savants. Having lost his wife in 1792, he was induced to contract, in 1804, a marriage with Madame Lavoisier, the widow of the celebrated chemist, which ere long resulted in bitter quarrels, and eventually in a formal separation. To his daughter by the earlier marriage he writes of the "horrible purgatory" of the three and a-half years that he was living with that "tyrannical, avaricious, unfeeling woman." On the other hand, his daughter, even after the separation, was charmed with her, and speaks of her "truly admirable character." With this more favourable view agrees M. Guizot's glowing picture of her, drawn in 1841, five years after her death. The source of difference is probably to be found in the intense individuality and irrepresible force of will which belonged to each partner in the ill-assorted match. With all Rumford's faults of temperament, there can be no dispute as to his powers of intellect or his services to science. Not to speak of his indirect contribution to the cause of knowledge in the Institution which owes to him its existence, there were in his multitudinous writings the germs of not a few of the leading discoveries of the last half-century. On the subject of light and heat in particular, with their relation to motion, his experiments and reasonings entitle him to a permanent place among the foremost ranks of physical discoverers. Rumford's genius, energy, and fertility of resource were such as could not fail to leave their mark upon any age. We cannot help wondering at what particular point they would have placed him among the political schemers and scientific workers of our day.

ANDREW BORDE.*

WE have been too slow in noticing a very curious book. We will lay aside all cavils whether books of the reign of Henry the Eighth come within the natural scope of an Early English Text Society, when we get matter of such intrinsic interest as Mr. Furnivall has now given us. Nay, we will go further. In consideration of the curious descriptions of foreign parts given us by Andrew Borde, we can even forgive the astounding gambols of his Editor. We feel fairly carried into Wonderland, or into regions behind the Looking-Glass, when a grave philologist at the end of his preface—we beg pardon, his Forewords—scries out, "Oh, fair-haired Alice, how well you waltz!" We can smile complacently while Mr. Furnivall tells us about his games with his boy, his long walks with his wife, his races, picnics, drives, visits, dances, and chats, and how "the angry roar of war came to trouble his sweet content, and made him feel it wrong almost to think of private pleasures or Society's work." While Mr. Furnivall was waltzing with fair-haired Alice, and otherwise so enjoying himself with "pleasant outdoor country life" that he could not work in the midst of it, the German war came into his Paradise like the Jabberwock, and made it impossible to take any interest in "printer's dates, or Bourde's allusions." Mr. Furnivall heads the last page of his Forewords, "Hard to work in the country. Woe to Louis Napoleon." Let Mr. Furnivall speak for himself. There are those who willingly said Amen to Mr. Furnivall's anathema, but who are so far from admitting Mr. Furnivall's dogma that it is impossible to work in the country that they do not understand how anybody can work anywhere else.

But, leaving the caperings of Mr. Furnivall, and stifling our desire to learn something more as to the adventures of the fair-haired Alice, we will turn to the life and works of Dr. Andrew Borde. His life was a strange one. He was brought up at Oxford, and became a Carthusian monk while still under age. Mr. Furnivall thinks it necessary to refute the opinion of Mr. Lower that he was the same as a certain Andrew Borde, a notions or villain regardant who was set free by a deed of George Neville, Lord Abergavenny, in the second year of King Henry the Eighth. The personal question is of no great moment; but the existence of villains to enfranchise so late as 1510 is a fact to be noticed. It is well known that villainage was never formally abolished in England, but that it died out by the gradual enfranchisement of all the members of the villain class. It is also well known that cases of villainage can be found a good deal later than 1510. Still by that time we are getting so near to the disappearance of the class that each case of enfranchisement may be looked upon as a personal step towards its extinction. What whether or not Andrew the monk was or was not the same person as Andrew the villain, we presently, in 1521, hear of his being "dispensed with the religion" by a Papal Bull, in order to be a villainum to

* The First Book of the Introduction of Knowledge made by Andrew Borde of Physicke Doctor. A Compendious Treatise or a Summary of Health, made in Hightyngton, Composed by Andrew Borde of Physicke Doctor. Borne in the Defence of the Bishop of Tournay, and was the first of Doctor Borde's upon his travels. Edited with a life of Andrew Borde, and large extracts from his writings, by F. J. Furnivall, Esq. London: Published for the Early English Text Society by Trübner & Co. 1870.

Robert Sherton, Bishop of Chichester, an aged prelate, who had been largely employed in diplomacy under Henry the Seventh, and who is locally famous as the founder of certain prebends and as the builder of the episcopal dining-room. It seems, however, that Borde never actually became a Bishop, and eight years later, in 1539, he was again "disposed of religion" for quite another purpose—namely, in order to go abroad and study medicine. Somehow or other, whether at Montpellier or anywhere else, he must have taken the degree of Doctor in that faculty; but the notion that he took such a degree at Oxford is by Mr. Furnivall vigorously scouted as "gammon." He seems to have led a strange, wandering, and not altogether reputable life, being several times charged with incontinence, and getting into prison more than once on different charges. In fact he seems to have died in the Fleet Prison; at all events he was there when he made his will in 1549. His story is chiefly made out from his letters to Cromwell and others, many of which Mr. Furnivall prints at large. In one letter, bearing date 1536, he tells Cromwell "pat I am now in Skotland, in a litle myuersyte or study namyd Glasco, wher I study and practyse physsyk, as I have done in dyverser regyons and prouncees, for pe sustenacyon off my lyuyng"; in another place we come once more across the city of Chester and the impenetrable darkness which seems to brood over its ecclesiastical foundations, handed on perhaps from the days of the Chester mysteries. Borde has occasion to mention "pe ryxth honorable eschyre master Cromwell, and my lord of Chester." Mr. Furnivall puts in a note—"A Prior. Henry VIII., when Prince of Wales, was Earl of Chester. The Bishopric of Chester was erected 4 Aug. 1542." We do not see what these two indisputable propositions, the former of which is as true of the present Prince of Wales as it was of his predecessor, have to do with Borde's very natural description of "my lord of Chester," by which he of course means the Abbot of St. Werburgh's. Borde's writings were very miscellaneous and very curious. Mr. Furnivall gives us in the Forewords large extracts from those which he does not print at length, but we have the full text of what is doubtless the most curious of all—"The fyrst boke of the Introduction of Knowledge." "Dedycated to the right honorable and gracious lady Mary, daughter of our souerayne Lorde Kyng Henry the eyght." Here we have the text with the original woodcuts, the whole fairly answering the promise in the title:—

The whych dothe teach a man to speake parte of all maner of languages, and to know the usage and fashion of all maner of countreys. And for to know the most parte of all maner of coynes of money, the whych is currant in every region.

The book is most curious and amusing throughout. Borde goes through nearly all Europe, besides some small excursions into other parts of the world, and everywhere he gives both a verified and a prose account of the country and its inhabitants, headed by a grotesque woodcut. In most cases, but not in all, the description is followed by a specimen of the language of the country, with an interlinear English version. Like a good philologist, he commonly chooses the numerals among his specimens. We thus get the exact measure of Borde's attainments in the matter of language, and we see how different tongues sounded in the ears of an intelligent Englishman of the sixteenth century. He begins with England, and, whereas in other cases the inhabitant is drawn in the costume of his country, the Englishman appears unclothed, with a piece of cloth and a pair of shears ready to cut his garments according to the fashion of the moment. Of the English language he unpatriotically says:—

The speche of Englande is a lase speche to other noble speches, as Italian, Castyllon, and Frenche; howbeit the speche of Englande of late dayes is amended.

This amendment, as Mr. Furnivall hints in a note, doubtless means the displacement of true English words by "long Latin and Greek coinages." The accounts of Cornwall, Wales, Ireland, and Scotland are most curious. Of Cornwall he says that it has two languages, "the one is naughty Englyshe, and the other is Cornyshe speche. And there be many men and women the whiche cannot speake one worde of Englyshe, but all Cornyshe." The naughty English would seem, as might be expected, to be West-Saxon; at least the Cornishman is made to say iche where the Englishman says, in modern form, I. He gives a specimen of Cornish and afterwards a specimen of Welsh; but he makes no remarks on the likeness between the two tongues. But after he has given his specimen of Irish, and moves into Scotland, he says with great truth:—

In Scotland they have two sondry speches. In the northe parte, and the parte luyng to Ierland, that speche is muche lyke the Iryshe speche. But the south parte of Scotland, and the vssall speche of the Peeres of the Realme, is lyke the northern speche of Englande.

Borde's verses on the Welsh, Cornish, Irish, and Scots are throughout bitterly satirical. And he takes care to tell us that "Scotland is a kyngdome, the kyng of the whyche hath in olde tyme come to the parliament of the kyng of England, and hath be subject to England." He has also a curious remark on the ecclesiastical position of England. It would hardly have done in his time to talk about "alterius orbis Papa," but he sets forth the same doctrine in another shape:—

In Englande is a metropolitane, the whych is a patriarche; and there be now but few; for there was a patriarche of Iherusalem, there is a patriarche of Constantinople, and there is a patriarche of Antioch; but different patriarches, not one for one, so many byschops under them as the patriarches of metropolitane of Englande.

After Scotland he goes to Shetland, &c., as he writes St. Shetland, and then to "Fryce" or "Fryceland," where he comments on the freedom still retained by the inhabitants, who "while they be subject to no man, although they be vnder the Emperours dominion." "Theyr speche," he adds, "is lyke to base Germanys spech; it doth dyffer but lytle." He makes the same remark on the speech of Flanders, Holland, Brabant, "Hanago," Gelderland, "Cleuelonde," "Gulyk," and "Lowke." The speech of all these countries is "Base Doche," though in "Hanago," "they do spake in diuers places, as well Frenche as Doche." At last we get a special chapter of "base Almayn," with a specimen of the speech, and the geographical description of its extent:—

Base Almayne, or base Doche londe, rechyth from the hydermost place of Flaunders and Hennago, to the cite of Menne, and to Argentyn, as some Doche men holdeth opynyon.

Argentyn, we suppose, is Argentoratum or Strassburg. He goes on to tell us that "the cheefe Cyte of Doche land or Almayne is the noble cyty of Colyn."

Then follows "Hyghe Almayne or hyghe Doch lond," and Borde has hardly got there before he begins to make mock of "yonkers." As for the geography of the country:—

Hyghe Almayne, or hyghe Dochelond, begynneth at Mene, and some say it begynneth at Dorne, and contayneth Swaerlond, or Swachlond, and Baselond, and the hylles or mountayne of the most part of Alpes, stretching in length to a town called Trent-by-yonde the mountayns; half the towne is Doche, and the other half is Lombardy. There is a greates difference betwixt Hyghe Almayne and Base Almayne, not only in theyr speche and manere, but also in theyr lodgyng, in theyr fare, and in theyr apparell.

He then goes to Denmark, where he remarks that "theyr speche is Doucho," a remark true only in the widest sense of the word. Thence he comes into Saxony, which he describes as a "Dukedom-shyp, And holdeth of hymselfe." Led astray by a name, he begins to "maruel greatly how the Saxons should conquere Englonde, for it is but a smalle countre to be compared to Englonde." Their speech, we need hardly say, is "Doch speche," but what chiefly strikes Andrew Borde in Saxony is the prevailing innovations in religion:—

They do not regarde the byshoppes of Rome, nor the Romayne, for certayne abusions. Martyn Luter and other of hys factours, in certayne thynges dyd take synistrell opinions, a concernyng prelates to hau wyues, with such like matters.

This description Mr. Furnivall seems not to understand, for he adds in a note:—

Andrew Borde speaks, I suppose, as a Saxon heretic here (Pope = Bp. of Rome), Romanist though he had been, and condemning Luther as he does in the next lines.

Andrew Borde does not at all speak as a Saxon heretic, but as a dutiful subject of King Henry the Eighth, who dedicated his book to that King's daughter. In the eyes of such a one the Saxons were praiseworthy in so far as they had cast off the usurped authority of the Bishop of Rome, blameworthy in so far as they had fallen into the heretical innovations of Martin Luther. Then comes the kingdom of "Boeme," where also Borde is scandalized at the heresies of the natives, and somewhat strangely reports their speech, without any qualification, to be "Doch." Yet more strangely, in the kingdom of "Poll," he pronounces the speech to be "corrupt Doche," and in his eyes "the speche of Hungary is corrupt Italian, corrupt Greke, and Turkeysh." It is plain that Borde, who seems to have been a fair Teutonic and Celtic scholar, had not ventured on Slavonic, much less on Magyar; but when he reaches Greece he carefully distinguishes between "the trewe Greke" and "such Greke as they do speke at Constantynople and other places in Grece," and he gives specimens of both. But here we cannot exactly follow Andrew's geography. Greece in his eyes is a land "by-yonde Hungary; it is a great region and a large countre." It contains seven provinces:—"Dalmacye, Epire, Elades, Tessely, Macodyny, Acayra, Candy, and Cicladea." He knows that now the Turk has it under his dominion, but he still seems to think that St. Sophia is a Christian church "in the whyche be a wonderfull syght of prelates." He has elsewhere a separate chapter of the Turks and of Turkey, but he gives no geographical limit to the country. He gives the Turkish numerals, and also the Egyptian, and ends with the Jews and "Jury," where he draws much the same distinction between good and bad Hebrew which he had already made between good and bad Greek. We hurry over the Italian part, curious as it is, but we must notice that when he comes to France he strongly asserts the right of England to "Aqynty, Gascony, Bion, and Normandy." In the Spanish peninsula he somewhat curiously distinguishes "Catalony and the kingdom of Aragon," "Andalase," "Cyuel," "the kyngedome of Portygale," "Spayne," "the kyngedome of Castyle and of Biscay," and "the kyngedome of Neuer." It is not easy to see what he meant distinctively by Spain. He tells us that "Byskay and Castyle is under Spayne." "The cheife cities and townes in Spayne is Burges and Compostel," and "theyr spech is Castylion." "The spech of Portygale" also "is Castilyone; how be it in some certen wordes they doth swerue from the true Castylion speche." But it marks Borde's accuracy that, in counting up the Spanish kingdoms of Charles the Fifth, he reckons only "part of the kingdom of Neuer." He remarks that "the Emproure doth ly much in Catalony," and heads the chapter with the image of Charles so clearly marked by his imperial crown as to need no superscription. Mr. Furnivall adds in the margin the strange comment, "The Emperor of Austria dwells in Catalonia." The important bearing which these descriptions of Borde's have on various points will be easily seen by the discerning reader. We confess that we envy him his power of talking of "Acon," "Colyn," and "Lewke," but anything is better than betraying cities of the Empire to the Welsh enemy.

MORLEY'S VOLTAIRE.*

THERE is an amusing passage in one of Sainte-Beuve's Essays in which he complains of the difficulty not only of getting at the truth about men and things in the first instance, but of keeping to it afterwards. He gives humorous expression to the distress of an elderly scholar who has been at some pains to investigate various subjects, and to arrive at careful and nicely balanced conclusions respecting them, and who finds everything challenged and all the old questions reopened by impetuous young men who are anxious only to make out a case for their own theories, and who set up all manner of imaginary characters to represent their predilections or aversions. Voltaire has always been a favourite subject for treatment of this kind. In his own day he was known not only to France but to Europe. He had visited England, Holland, Prussia, and Switzerland; he was always flitting about, and always making talk and attracting attention. He carried on a wide and varied correspondence; he published a great deal in his own name, or under assumed names which were readily penetrated; and his writings and adventures gave rise to quite a voluminous body of literature. Everything that it was essential to know about him was known either in his lifetime or soon afterwards. Nothing has since been discovered which could materially affect our judgment of him. And yet there have been repeated fluctuations of opinion as to his character and philosophy, and the controversy seems to be perpetually renewed. During the greater part of his life, while he was an active member of society, he was thoroughly understood and appreciated by the people around him, and a very fair impression of him can be obtained from their correspondence and memoirs, after making due allowance for malice on the one hand or partiality on the other. In his last years, after he had shut himself up at Ferney, he was contemplated from a distance with admiring awe by a generation which knew nothing of his youthful freaks and exhibitions of temper, and which revered him as an oracle of universal wisdom and authority. People wrote to him from all parts of the country humbly soliciting his interest or advice. If a man had any grievance against the Government or the Church, or any doubt on a point of history, literature, or philosophy, it was to Voltaire that he applied for assistance. "A burgo-master of Middleburgh," he informs Madame du Doffand, "whom I do not know, wrote to me a little while since to ask me in confidence whether there is a God or not; whether, in case there be one, he takes any heed of us; whether matter is eternal; whether it can think; whether the soul is immortal; and begging me to answer by return of post." And, in the same way, it was to Ferney that reference was sure to be made if a young author wrote a book and wanted a publisher, if an actress thought she had been wrongfully deprived of the lease of a country theatre, if a couple of cavalry officers fell to disputing at the mess-table on a question of grammar. When the patriarch was seen at Paris—a comical little figure in a red coat lined with ermine, half buried in a huge Louis XIV. peruke, black, unpowdered, in which his withered visage was so hidden that only two eyes glittering like carbuncles could be seen, topped by a square red cap in the form of a crown—his oddity and affectations were perhaps somewhat of a shock to the enthusiasm of his votaries; but death speedily withdrew him from the public gaze. After the Revolution his reputation declined, for he was regarded as, in some degree, the accomplice of its crimes. Napoleon, who dreaded Voltaire dead almost more than Madame de Staël living, hired writers to blacken his memory, and the priests of course spared no effort on the same side. Dr. Johnson's saying that he would sooner sign a sentence for Rousseau's transportation than for that of any felon who had appeared at the Old Bailey for a long time, and that the difference between Rousseau and Voltaire was so slight that it would be difficult to settle the proportion of iniquity between them, probably represented for a great many years after it was spoken the prevailing English opinion of the rival philosophers who were thus bracketed in a common anathema. Even after the horror and alarm with which Voltaire was once regarded by all orthodox people had passed away, although he was judged more fairly, he was far from being popular, for his scoffing was out of harmony with the more earnest spirit and passionate humanity of the age. In our own day Voltaire's true character and position have been very clearly marked out both by French and other critics; his good qualities and his bad qualities, his greatness and his littleness, have alike been acknowledged. He has been recognized as something more than a mere smart free-thinker with a fluent pen and biting tongue, though not exactly as the mouthpiece of a new religion. There has been a tendency perhaps to dwell rather too exclusively on the comic side of his character, to laugh at the philosopher who would storm and rave about the most insignificant trifles, at the high priest of humanity who had a shrewd eye for the funds and bits of land and loans to needy noblemen, who never scrupled to tell a lie if it suited his purpose, and who was perpetually scheming and intriguing to augment his fortune and to puff his reputation. But at the same time the great intellectual force which lay beneath these outward eccentricities and deformities has also been discerned and respected. Mr. Carlyle, in one of his early essays, has summed up Voltaire's character very fairly and temperately as an unparalleled combination of many common talents, and as more remarkable for adroitness and expertness than for really heroic qualities; and in this estimate Sainte-Beuve substantially concurs. Voltaire, in fact, was rather a great intellect than a great man; his philosophy, which had its force possibly among the accumulated impostures and corruptions of his own day, was at best partial and inconclusive; and his system, as far as anything that can be called a system is deducible from his writings, is one of mere negation and destruction.

We do not think that the accepted estimate of Voltaire is in any danger of being seriously disturbed by Mr. Morley's volume; or indeed by anything that is likely to be discovered or written about him in these days. Mr. Morley is disposed to rank Voltaire with Luther and Calvin, among the spiritual regenerators of the world. "The existence, character, and career of this extraordinary person," he says, "constituted in themselves a new and most prodigious era. The peculiarities of his individual genius changed the mind and spiritual conformation of the West with as far-spreading and invincible an effect as if the work had been wholly done, as it was actually aided, by the sweep of deep-lying collective forces." While Luther and Calvin in their separate ways brought into prominence new ideas of moral order and Divine government, Voltaire proclaimed the power and rights of human intelligence. He led a powerful reaction against the subordination of the intellectual to the moral side of men; and henceforth, "a new type of belief, and of its shadow, disbelief, was stamped by the impression of his character and work into the intelligence and feeling of his own and the following times." Upon the facts of Voltaire's life Mr. Morley does not pretend to throw any new light. He takes them as he finds them, and except on some minor points he has so far no quarrel with the familiar biographies. He thinks, as we think, that a too exclusive prominence has been given to the grotesque side of Voltaire's career, and that even in what have been considered its most ridiculous aspects—the hardships of his life with Madame du Châtelet, his unhappy experiences at Frederick's Court, his tempests about trifles with printers, booksellers, and other people—there was almost as much to command sympathy as to provoke laughter. There was sincere affection and good faith in his attachment to the Marquise and his patience with her caprices; his relations with Frederick redound less to his own discredit than to the King's; and if he stormed over much about small things, it was because of his passionate abhorrence of injustice of any kind, irrespectively of the measure of material damage. To Madame du Châtelet we think Mr. Morley is rather too favourable. He has apparently overlooked an acute bit of French criticism which shows that the femme savante, according to Voltaire's ingenuous confession of the perplexity into which they had both been thrown by a remark of Descartes on an elementary proposition, was about as loose in her mathematics as in her morals. On the whole, Voltaire's own life was superior to his philosophy. His vices were the vices of his time, and he displayed many high qualities which proved that he was in advance of it; in spite of his explosions of temper, his shifts and subterfuges, it is necessary to do justice to his generous temper, his passion for truth, and his intellectual courage and sincerity. Even with all the precautions to which he resorted, it was a very daring thing to speak out as he did constantly and vehemently in defiance of authority. Nor was his eagerness to take part in politics, to perform diplomatic feats of intervention, and so to connect himself in some direct and practical manner with the course of events, a sign of a shallow or vulgar vanity. It showed no doubt an imperfect consciousness of his own power as a thinker and writer, which was infinitely greater and wider than that of any statesman or diplomatist; but it must be remembered that this power was not so visible to himself or to any of his contemporaries as it is to us, who can look back not only on its operation, but on its consequences; and it was natural that a man with Voltaire's vivacity and strong practical bias should at times grow weary of the slow, unseen force of words, and long to make his mark on public affairs in an unequivocal manner. "Everything," he wrote in one of his latest letters, "that I see, appears the throwing broadcast of the seed of a revolution, which must inevitably come one day, but which I shall not have the pleasure of witnessing. The young are very happy; they will see fine things." But this was just after the inspiring reception which he had met with in Paris, and he was not always in this sanguine mood. Ten years before he had wished a friend, as his best wish, "another age, other authors, other actors, and other spectators." Voltaire, like Swift, was essentially a man of action; he wrote for the most part with an immediate practical purpose, just as a Minister might write a despatch, or a Parliamentary leader join in a debate; and in a later generation it is not improbable that he might have distinguished himself as an active politician, though whether altogether for good is another question.

It is not perhaps worth while to go into the old question, how far a man like Voltaire influenced, or is influenced by, the age to which he belongs; but it seems to us that it was, above all, Voltaire's susceptibility to external impressions, his faculty of reproducing in himself and his writings the image of his generation—his capacity, in short, as an interpreter—which constituted in a great measure his peculiar force. It was said of him that he was the very first man in the world for writing down what other people thought; and the observation is true, though not in the disparaging sense in which it was made. His originality lay in his unparalleled power of comprehending and reproducing in the most vivid and lucid manner the dumb, struggling thoughts and sensations of the world around him. An attorney's son, trained by the Jesuits, and caught up into the ante-chambers of the Court, he was the petted plaything of dukes and princes, who were amused by his sprightly grace and saline vivacities, till suddenly there was a suspicion of claws, and next a real scratch; and then a shameful beating by lacquies, the Bastille, and exile warned the aspiring genius of the terms on which he was admitted to the tables of the great. Voltaire was the natural Nemesis of the insincere and contemptuous patronage of intellect which distinguished the "grand age." Although he never bore towards the aristocracy the conscious and open hostility which he indulged towards the Church, his shafts struck at all authority alike, and at everything which rested on reverence and prescription. He taught the people the trick of scoffing which he had learned at Court. The present perhaps is hardly an opportune moment for the publication of an eulogium on the Voltairian spirit, the practical effects of which are still so painfully conspicuous in France. Mr. Morley admits that we search Voltaire in vain for a positive creed which logic may hold in coherent bonds, or which social philosophy may accept as a religious force; and that his system is essentially one of negation. What he has to say in vindication of it is that it is the negation of darkness, and that this leads inevitably in the direction of day. This, however, is an argument which can be accepted only with considerable qualification. It may be admitted that Voltaire was honest in his passion for truth, that the exposure of what is false is a necessary step towards the manifestation of what is true, and yet we must hold that Voltaire's system was a bad one, and did more harm than good. No doubt, as Mr. Morley says, the surgeon who has couched his patient's cataract has done good service, even if he do not straightway carry him to enjoy the restored faculty on some high summit of far and noble prospect; but the question is, whether such a method of surgery as that which Voltaire brought into fashion does not tend, while perhaps removing a film from the eyes, to distort and weaken the vision. There is a long sight as well as a short sight, and an imperfect long sight may be better than a perfect short sight, especially if the latter is accompanied by a fixed and confident belief that it goes as far as it is possible or necessary to see. The mischief of Voltairism is not that it does not carry the patient up to a far and noble prospect, but that it prevents his seeing it even if it lay before him, and leads him into a false assurance that there is nothing to see, or worth seeing, except his five fingers before his nose. It is impossible to turn over any of Voltaire's writings without being struck by the inherent shallowness and superficiality of his reasoning. Examples are to be found even in Mr. Morley's own pages. Voltaire, fresh from the Bastille, rejoices over the English freedom of speech and criticism, but he happens to find a man who has been seized by the press-gang for service in the fleet, and he is immediately "afflicted at there being no liberty on the earth." He appreciated the privileges without realizing the obligations of a free society and the necessity of providing for its defence. Again, take his treatment of religious questions. The immortality of the soul is a childish delusion, because nobody would think of attributing an immortal soul to a flea, and if not to a flea or a monkey, why to his Champagne valet or village steward? Or there is his well-known argument as to the resurrection of the body. A Breton soldier goes to Canada, and, when famishing, eats a piece of an Iroquois who had fed on Jesuits for several months:—"So there is the body of the soldier with Iroquois, Jesuit, and whatever he had eaten before entering into it. How then will each resume exactly what belongs to him?" A system of discovering the truth which leads only to the discovery that there is nothing true carries its own comment on the face of it. Mr. Morley attributes Voltaire's power not merely to his exquisitely clear keen sight and lucid expression, but to the fact that he saw much that was hidden from others. We should be disposed to attribute it rather to the fact that his vision, though clear and keen, was limited in range, and to the confident dogmatism with which he conveyed the impression that he saw all that was to be seen. Truth on any great subject is seldom so clear and plain as Voltaire's incisive sentences imply; and his very lucidity should perhaps suggest suspicion. The value of a system of destructive criticism must be measured not only by what it destroys, but by what it spares.

* Voltaire. By John Morley. London: Chapman & Hall. 1872.

We find that our space has been occupied in discussing Voltaire, and that we have little left for Mr. Morley. It is impossible to read his volume without being struck by its independence of thought, its sincerity and candour of expression, as well as by its ability and literary power. We have freely expressed our dissent from the views which it presents of the value and wholesomeness of the Voltairian philosophy, if that name can fairly be applied to anything so essentially unphilosophical; but at the same time it is well that such views should be fairly argued out, and that, whatever inconvenience it may occasion to people who, having once made up their minds on a subject, dislike to have them disturbed, accepted conclusions should be occasionally tested over again. Mr. Morley has given us a valuable and highly suggestive study of the great man of a very critical age, and we only wish he could have persuaded himself to give us this and nothing more. It would have been better, we think, if he had adhered to the plan of his admirable sketch of Burke, and refrained from loose digressions upon questions of the day, which distract the artistic unity and diminish the scientific value of the work, without supplying an adequate or satisfactory discussion of the grave subjects which are touched upon in this sidelong and incidental manner.

DISEASES OF THE HAIR.*

THIS book is an answer to a demand for more light on a curious and interesting question. A writer in the Lancet, it seems, has stirred a subject which comes home to many of us. In every public concourse he had found his eye attracted, fascinated as it were, by one phenomenon—the number of heads wholly or partially bald. Go where he might, to theatre, church, or Exeter Hall, wherever educated men congregated, at least one-tenth of them would certainly be either altogether bald or would show but a coronet of hair. Taking smaller assemblies, the result was the same. In one of the largest medical schools in London, out of a staff of twelve medical officers, all under fifty, only four had their heads covered with hair; and even among the students he noticed from fifteen to twenty whose crowns were only saved from visible baldness by the adroit manner in which the hair was brushed. "What is to be done?" he concludes; "where is this to stop?" It is very true that where there is a view to be established men can always see what they look for. It is not everybody who could count as many bald heads as this alarmist. Nevertheless we are disposed to think there is something in it. In the biographical literature of two or three generations back we find no personal description complete without some notice of the sit of the hair on the brow and temples. Look at the portraits of the time; they have all hair on their heads. Men who had achieved fame had still hair enough to be regarded as a feature. Walter Scott's portraits show a shaggy abundance of hair, Campbell's a fine Brutus head. De Quincey, among his points of likeness between Wordsworth and Milton, finds one in the way in which the hair lay upon the forehead. Talfourd speaks of Charles Lamb's black hair curled crisply about an expanded forehead, and so remaining for the twenty years he knew him; and of Coleridge's hair silvered all over. Haydon surveys Bentham, the white-haired philosopher, from his window, "his head the finest and most venerable ever placed on human shoulders." He maliciously records Hazlitt at the glass arranging his hair, trying different effects, and asking his advice whether he shall show his forehead more or less. What temptation has poet or philosopher to make a fool of himself by such a question nowadays? It has long ago ceased with him to be a possible alternative whether to cover his forehead or reveal its magnificent development. Time and nature have taken the matter into their own hands. In those days, to be sure, men had nothing but their hair to exercise fancy upon. The beard was an impossible archaism. Even the whisker, taking, as has been said, the form of the British mutton-chop for its model, exercised the foppery of the dandy—the lady's man—rather than of the poet or the thinker; whose intellectual credit with the multitude was best sustained by hair on the brow alone—hair suggestive of laurels, at once shading and setting off the expansive forehead, wavy, abundant in its proper place, but strictly confining its abundance to the seat of the higher faculties.

Have beards added to the number of bald pates, on the principle that you cannot have it in meal and in malt too? If they have, it is an argument against them. Or are they a natural resource under a privation peculiar in its degree to this generation? On this point our author does not commit himself. On baldness itself he expends hard names. It is an hereditary infirmity; bald fathers have bald sons. It is a disease, he tells us; an ugly word, but carrying with it the consolatory hope that, as such, it may be cured. Yet, turning over the pages rapidly, we find the matter assume sometimes a very serious complexion. More than once we come upon the ominous summing up, "Death ensues"—a very common issue of antiquated baldness it must be allowed, but discouraging to youth under the same condition; until we learn that death ensues, not to the patient, but to the roots of his hair. We would not willingly expose a nervous subject unprepared to the perusal of a diagnosis such as the following:—

The root, unable to make any coloured material, goes on forming the fibrous structure until the last, but when the last comes, and the conical cavity in which the papilla lived becomes obliterated, no new cells are formed, and death is the result.

The only reserve or tenderness we notice in our author towards the consulters of his book is to be found in the veil which he habitually throws over its subject. He will talk of scalps as bare as the head of a barn-door turkey, but he rarely calls the hair by its own name; and a simple reader may get a long way into his treatise without knowing how nearly it concerns himself. It is the "hirsute covering," or "hairy covering," or "cranial covering," or "comate covering," or "comate treasure," or "hirsute visitor," or "hairy filament," or "hirsute appendage." We cannot say that any of these sound like pleasant personal belongings; but clearly it is a matter of delicacy not to say hair too often outright. In fact, it may be noticed that nobody can write of hair in a simple manner. The style invariably curls and oils and frizzes and disguises itself after the caprices of its subject matter. For the same reason, as a sort of inevitable wash and dressing, it is always set off by a vast amount of learning, as what Galen, and what Celsus, and what Hilny said and did, with a catalogue of all the hairy people and all the bald people on record, whether in history or in pre-historic times. But when this display has exhausted itself and subsides into repose, we come upon what seems both good sense and knowledge of a more practicable and modern date. The youth threatened with "alopecia" is encouraged to make a struggle for it. He must leave off stimulants, and beware of the Yankee prescription "to use brandy externally till the hair grows, and take it internally to clench the roots." He must eat fat in some form or other; he must apply tincture of cantharides to the sterile parts; he must shave down until it develops into stubble; he must try what arsenic and iron will do; he must follow it up with electricity, employing Smee's battery; and if all won't do—and there are obstinate cases—why wigs are very nice things, and beautifully made now; he must wear a wig.

* Diseases of the Hair. By Benjamin Godfrey, M.D., F.R.S. London: Churchill.

From baldness we pass naturally to greyness; from alopecia, that is, to trichonosis cana. What is greyness? the reader is asked:—

It is analogous [in the reply] to caries of teeth; it is a nutritive change and a pigmentary degeneration resulting from nervous derangement, which leads to a degradation of nutrition, and is an unmistakable index of diminished physiological force.

Greyness Dr. Godfrey considers a surer sign of age than the parish register; and perhaps our own observations would take the same direction. Not that it indicates at all the date of death, but some people are a long time young and only a few years old, and others a long time old after but a short youth. Wordsworth lived to eighty-two and kept his hair; but from brown it changed to a harsh grizzle, very unbecoming, so Dr. Quincey says, to his complexion, which had in its time changed through exposure to wind and weather from a fine sombre Venetian tint to red or sanguine; these changes being consequent on a temperament which lived its life faster than the generality. When under forty he was assumed by a coachful of strangers to have passed his grand climacteric; one of them, on being undeceived, exclaiming, "God bless me! so then, after all, you'll have a chance to see your childer get up like and get settled! Only to think of that!" We have known premature grey hairs on a very wise head excite a rapture of scarcely welcome veneration for the years they were supposed to crown. An early induction into the honours and privileges of old age may console the man of philosophic mind for the loss in youth of "nature's greatest ornament"; but what compensation is there to a woman for premature greyness, especially should her complexion incline to olive?—the greyness following upon neuralgia and adding gloom to dyspepsia. It is consolatory to find that medical skill can do something in this extremity, though, mindful of the old fable, we would not recommend the following practice except under experienced direction:—

In the greyness produced by neuralgia epilation is the best method. Pull out every grey filament, and keep the power of the body up while the new hair is growing. Quinine, arsenic, and iron, given internally, will help the cure, especially if there should be any pain remaining. A young lady consulted me once for this condition. She was but twenty-three years of age, and was about to be married. It took her several hours to remove every light-faced intruder, and when finished a large heap remained upon the dressing-room table. Her honeymoon was enjoyed and the grey hairs did not return. The same plan should be followed for greyness the result of disease of the stomach. But the indigestion must be cured, or all treatment for the hair will be in vain. Blanching from fright is incurable.

Our author remarks, in cases of disease and malformation, a connexion between dental and hirsute life not yet fathomed. May we not note the same in health? Every large concourse in street or market presents some vigorous physiognomy remarkable for an exuberance of both; a flash of teeth, a curl of hair, a bushiness of beard, which concentrate all notice on themselves. Such an aspect we have known rudely, but aptly enough, summed up as "all hair and teeth like a ratcatcher's dog." We do not care to enter into those points in the book which are of a more strictly medical character, however fascinating the Medusa-like Pilea Polonica may be in its horrors. But facts on every topic interest the inquiring mind. Therefore our readers may like to know certain facts of length and strength and weight and numbers brought out here, which we leave it to them to verify by experiment. A woman's hair may grow to the length of six feet. A young lady of Massachusetts refused a thousand dollars for her "crinal covering which was only one inch short of" this measurement. The thickness of hair averages the four-hundredth of an inch—that is, four hundred hairs side by side would cover an inch of ground. The thickness of hair depends much upon the colour. "The blonde belle has about one hundred and forty thousand filaments to comb and brush, while the red-haired beauty has to be satisfied with eighty-eight thousand"; the brown-haired damsel may have one hundred and nine thousand, the black-haired but one hundred and two thousand. How few ladies, is the reflection, consider that they carry some forty or fifty miles of hair on their head! the fair-haired may even have to dress seventy miles of threads of gold every morning. A German experimentalist has proved that a single hair will suspend four ounces without breaking, stretching under the process and contracting again. But the hair thus heavily weighted must be dark brown, for the blonde breaks down under two and a half ounces.

We believe it will be observed that rustics, both men and women, and all persons engaged in outdoor labour little stimulating to the brain, keep their hair, and keep its colour unchanged, better than men in cities, or men of sedentary and intellectual employments. To such, under the deprivation to which thinking on the one hand, or hereditary indigestion on the other, exposes them, we would offer the consolation that, as our indications sometimes serve us well, so do our natural defects. Thus a bald head in a churchman may stand voucher for austerities, and may supplement and exaggerate a natural air of sanctity; while white hairs fostered, combed, and curled will impart benevolence to any set of features.

THE NUSR-I BE-NUZEER.*

WE have here the text and two independent translations of an Indian fairy tale. The original is written in Urdu, or Hindustani, and both the text and the two translations have been published for the benefit of students in Hindustani, the book being "one of the Test-books for the Examination for a Certificate of High Proficiency." The two translators have been engaged upon their work simultaneously, and probably were, and may even yet remain, unacquainted with each other's labours. Both translations profess to be literal, and make no pretensions to elegance of style. Indeed the English is sometimes so obscure as to make a reference to the original necessary for its comprehension. The story itself is of the slightest, and is one of those extravagant fairy tales which seem to excite equal interest in the Oriental adult and in the occupants of European nurseries. But in the estimation of Orientals the chief charm of the original story is the style in which it is told. It abounds in those pretty conceits, puns, doubles-entendres, far-fetched allusions, and turgid metaphors which are so agreeable to the Eastern mind, but which are untranslatable, and are utterly uncongenial to the more disciplined and less imaginative intellects of the West. The title of the work is indicative of its character. The word nusr signifies "prose," or a work in prose; be-nazir means "incomparable," and is the name of the hero of the book. So one of our translators renders the title as "Incomparable Prose," and the other as the "Story of Be-nazir," and both are right. The equivoque and alliteration of the title must have cost the author no little pains, and its accomplishment was no doubt regarded with some complacency.

The translators confine themselves to the mere work of translation, and tell us nothing of the origin of the book beyond what is to be gathered from its own pages. The original work was a masnawi, or poem written by Ghulam Hasan of Dehli. This poem, called Sitr ul Bayan, or "Magic of Narrative," obtained a considerable reputation. Hasan died in 1786, and his poem was printed at Calcutta in 1805. Just at the close of the last century our Government in Bengal became impressed with the importance of the Urdu or Hindustani language. It was clear that their servants must acquire a knowledge of that language, and that the old rough-and-ready way of learning it by using it could no longer be trusted to. But the language at that time had little or no literature, no books suited for learners, no settled grammar, and but few teachers. There were poems like the Sitr ul Bayan of some length, and plenty of minor poems and songs, but these were unfitted for the purposes of education. Fortunately the Government had at their command a man suited to the emergency—Dr. John Gilchrist, a hard-headed, self-satisfied, and somewhat crotchety Scotchman, who knew the language well, and understood what was wanted. He wrote a grammar and compiled a dictionary, and under his direction several educated natives were employed in translating works from the Persian, or, as in the instance before us, in reducing a Hindustani poem to a prose narrative. Turning now to our author's preface, he tells us that he had previously written "the tale in the vulgar tongue for beginners in an easy style," but that, under the directions of "John Gilchrist, Esq., of enlightened mind, great ability, and lofty counsel," he reproduced it "in prose and refined language, in such a style that every learned man and poet might find pleasure in hearing it, and that a memorial of his unworthy self might remain in the world." This translation was first printed in 1802, three years before the poem from which it is derived, and of which it speaks in the highest terms of eulogy, declaring every line of it to be be-nazir, or "incomparable," and every verse a bad-munir, or "glorious full moon."

The story opens by narrating that "there was a King with the dignity of an Emperor, who protected his subjects and was the asylum of the world." "His country vied with Paradise, and was very large and well populated." "He had no grief of any kind, except the pain of want of offspring," but this made him resolve upon abandoning his throne and adopting a religious life. His friends and ministers opposed this resolution, and recommended medicine, prayer, and hope. So fortune-tellers and astrologers were consulted, and they promised the birth of a son; but the king's twelfth year was predicted to be fraught with danger, and he was not to go on the housetop to see the heavens until he was full twelve years old. The child was born, and great rejoicings followed. To preserve him from the threatened calamity, the King ordered a garden house to be built, such as should have "no equal in the flower-garden of the world." The author goes into raptures over this edifice, and enters into the most minute details and extravagant praise of all its appointments. But the evil could not be averted. The fairy Mah-rakh (moon-face), as she was flying through the air, perceived the young prince, and fell in love with him. She bore him off to fairy-land, and exercising what we may presume to be a fairy's privilege, she made desperate love to him, but with only indifferent success. To divert his melancholy, she lends him, upon his promise not to return home, an aerial steed like that of our old friends Valentin and Orson. Roaming abroad he passes over a garden in which he espies a lovely maiden, Badr Munir, the lustrous full moon. We have a full description of her person and her charms; and her dress and ornaments are all detailed with the most minute precision and extravagance of metaphor:—

* The Nusr-i Be-nuzer. Reprinted for the use of the Junior Members of Her Majesty's Indian Civil and Military Services. Second Edition. Revised and Corrected by W. Nassau Lees, LL.D., Member and Secretary of the Board of Examiners. Calcutta. 1866.

The Nusr-i Be-nuzer; or, the Incomparable Prose of Nusr-i-Hasan. Literally translated into English by Major Henry Claret, Distinguished Bengal Cavalry. Officiating Personal Interpreter to H.R.H. the Commander-in-Chief Simla. 1853.

The Nusr-i Be-nuzer; or, Story of Prince Nusr-i-Hasan. An Indian Fairy Tale, translated from the Urdu by C. W. Howarth, B.A., Lieutenant of the 1st Irish Lanciers. Ball: Book & Map. Calcutta: Thacker & Co. 1853.

What shall I say regarding her hair!
No night has ever been the scene of such beauty.

Its blackness was wonderful, and gave lustre to the eyes; the curls were ravelled in such a way, that, in unravelling them, the heart would become ravelled, and their elegance would fascinate the soul. Her back hair was drawn tight, the parting in it was very clear, and her golden hair ribbon shone brightly; what shall I say of its colour and brilliancy, for it glowed like the Ursa Major in the last watch of the night, and underneath her veil appeared like the lightning flashing in a thin cloud; whoever saw its glitter began to call out without being able to help himself,

The golden hair ribbon has created great havoc!
It has tied the tail of the night to the day.

Or, as Mr. Bell renders the last line—

It has given a planet (or knot) to the day at the end of the night.

An obscure allusion, in which "the back hair" is referred to as "the tail of night." The two young people, of course, fall desperately in love, but Be-nasir is forced to return to the fairy. He goes again to visit his charmer, and the fairy discovers his amour. In her jealous rage she confines him in a deep well covered with a ponderous stone, and there he remains for some time, while the fair damsel pines and consumes with love and sorrow. At length her faithful friend and attendant, Najm un Nissa, "the star of women," resolves to go in search of him. Dressing herself as a wandering devotee, she roams lute in hand from place to place, until she finds the place of his imprisonment. Then, by the help of a good genius whom she has charmed, she effects his deliverance. The prince is conducted home to his father's Court, and his marriage is shortly afterwards celebrated with Badr Munir. The pomp and splendour of the ceremony form a theme worthy of the writer's powers, and he fails not to make the most of it.

Such are the very scanty materials which are made to fill one hundred and fifty octavo pages in the original language. They have been stretched to this extent by a most elaborate description of the veriest trifles, by heaping up simile upon simile, and by a liberal quotation of verses from the original poem. Both of our translators have rendered these verses in literal prose, and few of them deserve any better treatment. Here and there a poetical sentiment may be found, but in the main they consist of frivolous conceits and far-fetched allusions. One line tells us that "the graceful movements of the necks (of the dancing girls) were as the wrath of the day of judgment." Some lines, describing the power of music, state how

Embracing the trees the morning breezes
Began to say in their ecstasy, Bravo!
And such was the beauty of the music at that time,
That the moonbeams fell fainting in all directions.

Extravagant comparisons like these are accepted by the native mind without the smallest idea of burlesque, and when they are tricked out with the jingle of rhyme and alliteration they exercise a charm which to us is inconceivable. A considerable portion of the work is written in what is called Munja, or prose having a marked cadence and rhyme, which is considered very elegant. To describe the dresses and ornaments of the persons who figure in the work the dictionary has been ransacked for an endless variety of terms, and the most unusual and obscure words have been preferred by the author in order to achieve his object of "refined language."

This, then, is one of the works which a candidate for honours in Hindustani must study and pass in. The construction of the language of the book presents no unusual difficulties; but it requires much ingenuity to discover the point of many of its allusions, and a vast amount of labour to learn up its immense number of out-of-the-way words. An immediate pecuniary reward follows, a certificate of high proficiency, and a greater reward is in prospect in the shape of lucrative employment, so that a candidate may fairly be required to exhibit evidence of careful and varied reading. But it is a question whether study is not thrown away upon a work like this, abounding in words which a European will never hear, and certainly will never have occasion to employ; words, in fact, which are learnt with great trouble, and soon forgotten from want of use. How many Englishmen are there who know or care to know the names of the various articles and nick-nacks of female attire? A clever fashionable young lady might set a paper which would puzzle even a Clarendon scholar, and prove that there are depths of knowledge which are almost unobtainable and altogether unprofitable.

There is little to choose between the two translations. Either of them will greatly assist the student who has to go through the thankless task of "getting up" the book, but neither of them can be implicitly relied on. Both gentlemen speak very moderately of their performances, and of the difficulty of rendering the book into intelligible English. If they will carefully and candidly compare the two translations, their respective versions may be greatly improved. Mr. Bell may learn that Asi is no part of the author's name, but a deprecatory term expressive of his unworthiness. He will also see that, instead of speaking of "Khakán and China," he should have said "the Emperor of China"—Khakán being the title by which the supreme ruler is known among the Tartar races. It was borne by Timur and Beber, and it is the name by which the Emperor of China is now known among the Turks and Mongols. Mr. Court, too, will see that his author is not responsible for the statement that "the suffron-coloured faces became yellow." The phrase rang-ba-rang, which they both translate literally, as "of various colours," and "of every colour," means "of every sort." It is commonly used in this way without reference to colour. There are many other slips of this kind which a careful revision would bring to light, with the result of making the translations more serviceable to those who alone are likely to read them. A man of inquisitive mind and odd tastes, with an appetite for anything that is new and a relish for what is uncommon, may look into this book and may here and there find a passage to his liking; but not even he is likely to read it through, much less study it, without the strong incentive of a liberal remuneration.

The native title of the book, as transcribed in Roman letters by the gentlemen responsible for the three works before us, presents a very different appearance, and brings up again the never-ending quarrel as to the proper way of rendering Oriental names in European letters. We are no pedants or purists in this matter, and we are not sure that the reporters of Warren Hastings' days did not present a more definite entity to their readers when they boldly turned Siraj ud Daulah into Sir Roger Dowler; but in works intended for educational purposes we have a right to expect something like system and consistency. Colonel Lees and Mr. Bell differ in their respective methods, but each adheres to his system, and is consistent. Mr. Court, however, has no system, and transcribes his vowels haphazard, neither according to spelling nor sound. This is a grievance to a learner, and we recommend Mr. Court to adopt in future some regular and intelligible method.

TWO NOVELS WITH A PURPOSE.*

A NOVEL with a purpose, to be in any way interesting, ought to be subtle and suggestive rather than direct. It should convey its meaning by character and action rather than by avowed teaching; and because its aim is didactic, care should be taken to keep its method dramatic. When it begins to preach, it has lost the distinctive quality of a novel without acquiring that of a sermon; it merely becomes dull as a work of amusement, without gaining in power and dignity as a treatise on philosophy or morals. In fact, it has the faults of a hybrid; and, like the famous sinner between two stools, falls to the ground for want of unity of basis. We have classed together two novels of very different degrees of merit, but with the same kind of mistake in each; being novels with a purpose where the purpose is made too evident, to the infinite damage of the story as a drama, and of the work as art generally. One of them is designed to set forth the beauty, value, and satisfactoriness to be found in the life of a celibate "priest" (Anglican); the other the delights which a maiden lady of middle age and scanty means may still enjoy in her quiet sphere. Now both these doctrines are true in their degree. It is quite right that a clergyman who has conscientious objections against marriage should be able to live happily without a wife; and it is also true that a maiden lady of limited income would find life still full of pleasure and interest through her sympathies with others, and by her small economies would be able to create a margin available for charity and well-doing. But to make either motive the groundwork of a novel, and to give a dramatic interest to the tale, requires considerable skill in the manipulation. And this is just what we do not find in any high degree in the one, or in any degree at all in the other. Nothing could be better or purer than the intention of both these novels; and parts of Church and Wife are smart and effective; but both are disappointing, and, we are sorry to add, one is insupportably tedious.

The author of Church and Wife is evidently an ardent Ritualist; and while conceding on occasions certain small non-vital ceremonies—as that his favourite priest should wear the black gown when in a stranger's pulpit, and omit "the invocation" before the sermon when preaching to an Evangelical congregation, though he keeps terms with his conscience by whispering it to himself—he is staunch as to doctrine, and brings his principles triumphantly through every ordeal. Of course the most formidable ordeal through which his hero has to pass is love, and the crucial test of his absolute rightness is the question whether he should give way to his natural inclination and marry, or remain single and faithful to his creed and cause. For neither the author nor his hero, the * Church and Wife: a Question of Celibacy. By ROBT. ST. JOHN COLETT, author of "The Canon's Dilemma," 2 vols. London: Tinsley Brothers.

The Lady of Limited Income. By the Author of "Mary Powell," 2 vols. London: Richard Bentley & Son.

Reverend Henry Briancourt, believes that a "priest" has any business with a wife and family, both holding that a celibate clergy would display greater holiness and spirituality than is to be found in a married priesthood, and that the care of his parish claims a man's whole time. The character of Mr. Briancourt is well sketched. He is the type of a certain class of Ritualistic clergymen; a man whose ideas of religion contain nothing gloomy or distasteful, whose very fasting does not include "eating hardships," and whose exuberant spirits and almost boyish jollity repel the strict Evangelical nearly as much as his vestments in church and his dress out of it. Tall, thin, angular but handsome, with frank and unaffected manners, high spirits, and many accomplishments, a man of the world, a gentleman, and thoroughly believing both in Christianity and the Church, he is a portrait to the life, and we would say taken from the life. His mother is a good blue-eyed Evangelical, whose greatest hope has been to see her younger son a clergyman, nicely married and settled, and preaching good Low sermons in the parish church; his older brother is a noble, broad-shouldered sceptic; but he more than half brings the former over to his own views, while we feel that the latter is on the highway to become a devout Christian under the softer influence of Tillie Maurice, a young lady "as mild as moonbeams," whom his brother has first converted from Low Church to High, and made frantically in love with himself during the process. The broad-shouldered sceptic, however, changes all this, and puts a finishing touch to poor Tillie's spiritual and emotional manipulation by converting her to as ardent a love for himself the sinner, as she had formerly, and only so lately, felt for his brother the saint.

We do not pretend to understand much about young ladies' hearts, and that queer thing which goes by the name of love among them; but it strikes us as rather odd that both Bessie Horton and Tillie Maurice should have been able so quickly and so completely to pass through the fog of earthly passion, and rise into the purer atmosphere of spiritual affections. Both girls fall unreservedly in love with the priest; and he on his side falls in love with them, up to a certain point. But the whole thing hinges on this one phrase; and the point to which Henry Briancourt will not come is indulgence. He is fascinated by the beauty and intelligence, the grace and spirit and enthusiasm, of Miss Horton, who, while slightly "fast" in manner, and of the world in all personal and social characteristics, is also an ardent churchwoman and a good girl; and the domestic tenderness, the sweet simplicity, and the soft-heartedness of Tillie Maurice also touch him on another side. But he keeps himself well in hand; and gives out to both, on fitting occasion, that he holds to the doctrine of a celibate priesthood and intends to remain single. And as soon as they hear this both girls shake themselves free of their love fever; and, setting all their dreams and desires beneath their feet, mount up into that purer atmosphere of which we have spoken, and from love-sick maidens, dreaming of home and husband, become simply dutiful and affectionate daughters of the Church, spiritualized lambs, whereof Mr. Briancourt is the all-but adored shepherd. And both give the best possible evidence of their change of feeling; for Bessie marries the Duke of Alcester, a man whom she had refused once before when he was in the dark age dedicated to the turf and to youthful indiscretions of various kinds, but who has now come out into the light of grace and the nobler and more manly ambition of a senator; and Tillie dries her eyes and leans on the arm of her stalwart sceptic, whom she hopes to lead into the fold before long. Still we maintain that the change is sudden, that the power the girls have over their affections is remarkable, and that their conscientious scruples are more admirable than natural, if there is any truth in the instincts at all.

We have no doubt of the success of this book with the school to which it is addressed. The very things which we object to in it as a work of art, the sermons and disquisitions on Church principles, will please the readers for whom we may assume it to have been mainly written. No one, too, can fail to recognize the earnestness which pervades the whole story, the air of intense conviction which has put a soul into its dry bones, while there are clever and well-thought passages that would do honour to the most legitimate novel. The question is, however, how far a novel with a purpose is legitimate quod novel; and whether, the purpose being granted so far, for the sake of argument, it should not be suggested rather than treated broadly and directly. The meaning of Church and Wife is all compressed into the title-page; for, after the second title, A Question of Celibacy, comes an axiom which begs the whole question and decides it—Punch's famous advice a little travestied; "To parsons about to marry—Don't." We cannot part with this book without a word of commendation of the characters. There is a freshness and naturalness about them not often met with. The girls are especially charming, more like life on the outside than most authors' girls, and the men are also real and individual. If the story is wanting in plot while it is encumbered by purpose, what there is of drama in it is nicely put, and Mr. Corbet writes like a scholar and a gentleman. The opening of the book is especially bright; but these are coruscations only, and coruscations, however brilliant, do not make a successful novel, as a critic counts success.

The good we have had to say of Church and Wife we are sorry not to be able to repeat of A Lady of Limited Income; for, save in its purity of intention, this is a book which has really nothing to recommend it. It is feeble and flabby, irritatingly goody, and full of puerile bits of advice, like a lady's version of Poor Richard's Almanac. When Alured breaks a blood-vessel, Miss Beaumore, the lady of limited income, brings in a "sliced lemon slightly sweetened with sifted sugar." This, she says, is a styptic, the only one she has in the house; but Miss Partridge, her friend, improves the occasion, and when she comes, she gives "twenty drops of diluted sulphuric acid in a wineglassful of water." Elsewhere we are told that wet towels round the heads of reading men are apt to produce "palsy of the brain." We are treated to a description of Alured's chamber gymnastics, which the quiet little household of Miss Beaumore takes to be an earthquake; and we know that the author intentionally makes her younger readers a present of the formula for their benefit when Miss Beaumore reckons up the household expenses with a view to retrenchment where possible, and, setting "a little pudding at eightpence or ninepence," decides that it is hardly worth while to strike the small luxury out of the domestic bill of fare, "and then more meat would be eaten." We take this as a hint to young housekeepers, probably not without its value, but scarcely of sufficient importance to warrant the writing of a two-volume novel. Also we may perhaps, in the interests of art, demur to the prominence given to the subject of eatables, from tea-cakes to strawberries, and to the footnotes by which extracts or statements are referred to their sources. It is all too much like jalap smothered in jam for our taste. If we must have the jam, let us take it honestly, and solace ourselves with wry faces, if they will solace us; but, for heaven's sake, let us have our jam unmedicated and au naturel. Further, we would counsel the author of A Lady of Limited Income to put more life and "go" into her work than she has bestowed on the present story. Conversations are pleasant and profitable as a method of storytelling when well done; but they must be well done, else they are miserably tedious. In this book they are miserably tedious because they are pointless. The story is mainly made up of the most puerile incidents amplified by the weakest talk. There is no briskness, no life, no nature: we have a disquisition on loyalty and a panegyric on the Queen, a disquisition on ritualism, and the condemnation of a sister for her excesses, which seem to consist mainly in fasting, wearing a chaplet, and carrying an emblazoned Prayer-book. But we must confess ourselves incompetent to speak very distinctly of the second volume; for our patience gave way after the first, and we have only looked into it here and there. Life is very short, and its duties are many and heavy. We have failed to find the half-hour so worthless that it might be profitably employed in reading through to the end a book so weak and tiresome as this.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we decline to return rejected communications; and to this rule we can make no exception.

The SATURDAY REVIEW is duly registered for transmission abroad.

The publication of the SATURDAY REVIEW takes place on Saturday mornings, in time for the early trains, and copies may be obtained in the Country, through any Newsagent, on the day of publication.

Nearly all the back Numbers of the SATURDAY REVIEW may be obtained through any Bookseller, or of the Publisher, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C., to whom all Communications relating to Advertisements should likewise be addressed.

Now ready, VOLUME XXXII., bound in cloth, price 16s. Cloth Cases for Binding all the Volumes, price 2s. each. Also, Reading Cases, price 2s. 6d. each. May be had at the Office, or through any Bookseller.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 850, FEBRUARY 10, 1872:

- |                                       |   |
|---------------------------------------|---|
| The Meeting of Parliament.            | England and America.                        |
| The Proposed Votes of Censure.        | Prince Bismarck and the Ultramontane Party. |
| The Treaty with Holland.              | Paris and the Assembly.                     |
| Lord Russell on the Education Act.    | The West Riding and Galway Elections.       |
| State Ceremonials.                    | Religious.                                  |
| The Virtues of Red Tape.              | The Speeches.                               |
| The Old Catholic Movement in France.  | Holland and South.                          |
| Mr. Harcourt on our Insular Position. | Romanism Architecture in Lombardy.          |
| Localization of the Army.             | The Egyptian Slave Trade.                   |
| Helps's Thoughts upon Government.     | South Sea Bubble.                           |
| Freeman's Norman Conquest.            | James Vernon on the Royal Exchequer.        |
| Andrew Burns.                         | Henry's Vindictive.                         |
| Dispute of the Irish.                 | The French Revolution.                      |
| The Revue with a Paragon.             |   |

SATURDAY REVIEW

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 851, Vol. 33.

February 17, 1872.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

THE ASSASSINATION OF LORD MAYO.

Few events of our time have been so appalling or so lamentable as the assassination of Lord Mayo. In the discharge of his duty while visiting a penal settlement, in the midst of a career of eminent usefulness and signal success, just as increasing experience was adding daily to the value of his vigour, his generosity, and his rigid love of justice, he has been taken away, by the blow of an Afghan convict, from India, which mourns him as a friend, and from England, which honours him as one of the best of Indian Governors. It was on Thursday of last week, the 8th, that the Viceroy, after finishing his inspection of the convicts at Port Blair in the Andaman Islands, was returning from a climb up a neighbouring hill, where he had gone to enjoy the prospect. When he reached the pier from which he was to embark, it was quite dark, and he was being conducted by torchlight to the launch that was to take him to the Glasgow, in which he had arrived. With his usual intrepidity, he was going a little too far in advance of his guard, and it was then that the convict SHERE ALI rushed out of the darkness which had concealed him, and stabbed the Viceroy twice in the back. Lord Mayo survived the attack only a few minutes, and the assassin, who was immediately arrested, explained that he had acted under the inspiration of God. This is the whole story so far as it is at present known, and the only ray of comfort which it presents is that everything tends to show that the act proceeded from a sudden impulse of fury or fanaticism, and had nothing of a political character. The assassin belonged to one of the Mahomedan hill tribes of our North-Western frontier, and had served with a good character, and for some time as an orderly to the Commissioner of Peshawur. A blood feud had long raged between his family and another family of his tribe, and unfortunately he encountered one of his hereditary enemies in the suburbs of Peshawur, and murdered him. According to the ethics of a barbarian tribe he had taken a step which was part of a recognized system of warfare, but by English law he was a murderer. Capital punishment, however, was not inflicted on him, partly perhaps because of his previous good conduct, and partly because some allowance was made for the enormous standard of right and wrong to which he had been trained by native usages to conform. There is nothing in his antecedents to connect him in any way with the proceedings of Wahabees or any other fanatics. The condition of the Port Blair settlement must also be taken into consideration. The total absence of anything like discipline that had long prevailed there had caused the most serious apprehension to the higher authorities, and to Lord Mayo himself. This settlement is described by an Indian journal as "a paradise of rum-drinking and unlimited idleness." The convicts are said to have been in the habit of taking into their service the Sepoys who were supposed to guard them, and were free to draw for a gallon of rum at a time. Last year a Port Blair convict was convicted at Calcutta of having, after one of these drinking bouts, killed a fellow-prisoner, and he was recommended to hang on the ground that the crime would not in all probability have been committed but for the disgraceful laxity of discipline and want of proper control over the convicts at Port Blair. The assassin of Lord Mayo had therefore been living for a long period in a society without any thought and purpose of crime had been allowed to grow unchecked, and where deeds of violence had not met the sanction of the community or rejection of the authorities. A man who commits a murder under such circumstances is not to be judged by the standards of an ordinary and calm society. A man who borderer, nursed in legends of feuds and tribal murders, might easily have given way to the impulse of doing one more bloody deed, when the whole circumstances of his recent life had sapped any little reverence for good government that he might have had, and had made violence and revolt seem to him the natural course of daily existence. The instrument, too, with which Lord Mayo was killed, an ordinary table-knife, points strongly to the conclusion that the act was not, as has been suggested, the result of the promptings of any native agent belonging to a secret society of Mahomedan fanatics. A surer and more deadly weapon would have certainly been selected by a cool contriver of murder; nor does the statement of the murderer that he acted under the inspiration of God point to more than that he felt impelled to do something which he had not premeditated, and that assassination was an act capable of so many justifications that he easily reconciled an impulse to commit it with the theory, habitual to his barbarous mind, that everything done or happening suddenly is specially contrived by the Almighty.

Lord Mayo served three times under Lord DERBY as Chief Secretary for Ireland, being on the third occasion a member of the Cabinet. His repeated employment showed that he possessed the confidence of the chiefs of his party, and his pleasant cordial manners and transparent honesty of purpose gave him a certain position in the House of Commons. But few persons outside the House knew more than his name in political life, until he was employed to announce the famous scheme of levelling up, or, in other words, of concurrent endowment, as the programme of the Conservative party with regard to the Irish Church. To be entrusted with the enunciation of such a proposal was not to have the avenue to fame opened to him, and it was with a surprise amounting to incredulity that the public received the news in the autumn of 1866 that Mr. DISRAELI intended to make him the new Viceroy of India. No more remarkable instance of a Prime Minister acting deliberately on his own private estimate of the worth and capabilities of a subordinate can be adduced, and certainly none could have been more fully justified by the result. The appointment of Lord Mayo reflects the highest credit on Mr. DISRAELI, who, in answer to the adverse criticism expressed on his choice, boldly prophesied that Lord Mayo would leave behind him in India a reputation second to that of none of his predecessors. Mr. GLADSTONE came into power before Lord Mayo was actually installed in office, but he very wisely forbore to interfere with the choice made by his predecessor. From almost the first hour of his landing in India Lord Mayo was a success. It was soon obvious to Indian officials that they were going to have at the head of Indian society a man and a family in every way fitted to lead it. Winning, easy, good-natured, liberal in his expenditure, possessed of the air of good society, anxious to learn but able to learn without letting himself become the victim or the creator of bores, he soon inspired the conviction that Indian life under the new Viceroy would be unusually pleasant. It was soon discovered that Lord Mayo had still higher qualities. He knew how to entertain the princes and great men of the East with a courtesy and a splendour that charmed them. He delighted in every sport and was indifferent to every form of fatigue. He loved to see everything for himself, and to become personally acquainted with all men of eminence, and to inspire the feeling that they were working for a man who knew, appreciated, and admired what they were doing. He had the happy gift which his chief had displayed in choosing him, and listened with facility and accuracy on those who were likely to serve him well. Having once done so, or having seen them and recognized their fitness for the offices they were filling, he cheered them with a steady and discriminating support. They could act, for they knew they would be understood, and could venture, for they knew they would be defended.

Lord MAYO began by gaining the high esteem due to his social qualities, to his extraordinary activity, to his sense of what was becoming in the representative of the QUEEN, and to the loyalty and consideration he displayed towards his subordinates. But he soon placed his reputation on a higher footing. The Duke of ARGYLL, in bearing a warm testimony to his merits in the House of Lords, said on Monday that he had never had a serious difference of opinion with Lord MAYO since they had been engaged in the joint work of governing India; and the Duke of ARGYLL has not only been a very able Secretary for India, but is a man of a highly critical mind, and is surrounded by a staff of old Indian officials who would have afforded him ready help in the task of criticizing adversely the proceedings and views of the VICEROY if any opening for such criticism had been given. Lord MAYO showed the power of a real statesman in at least three conspicuous directions. In the first place, he knew how to establish relations at once becoming and cordial with native princes, and one of his earliest triumphs was the confidence he inspired in the honesty and kind intentions of the British Government when he met the ruler of Cabul at the Durbar of Umballa. In the next place, he was the ardent and indefatigable supporter of all schemes of material improvement. His Vice-Royalty fell at a time when the great system of public works initiated by Lord DALHOUSIE was beginning to fulfil the promises with which it was started. He thus entered, in some degree, into the harvest which other men had sown, and good fortune gave him a chance which it had denied to his predecessors. But he knew how to make the best of the opportunity given him; and he always showed himself alive to the necessity of constantly pushing forward, and of losing no means of securing to the millions whose fate was largely in his hands the enormous advantages which the wealth and science of England could assure them. Lastly, he strenuously maintained the great principles of justice and rigorous impartiality between classes and creeds, which must be the basis of our Indian Government if it is calculated, or deserves, to endure. One of the last acts of his life was to express his cordial concurrence in the principles of a Bill introduced into the Legislative Council by Mr. STEPHEN, for enabling persons who have abandoned a native religion without becoming Christians to marry as easily as if they had given up their ancestral creed to adopt that of their Western rulers. Such was the man whose life the random stroke of a barbarian assassin has cut short at a moment when he was visiting a distant, a repulsive, and an almost unknown spot in the English dominions, in order that he might be sure that he understood the wants and could measure the vice and misery of vile and abject men, left to prey on themselves by the disgraceful neglect of those to whose care they had been consigned. It is far easier to mourn than to replace a Viceroy who in three years has gained a name which Englishmen will long mention with mournful pride, and who has shown himself, as was prophesied of him, the equal of the best of those who held his high office before him.

THE AMERICAN CLAIM.

ALL the telegraphic rumours and extracts from American papers confirm the belief that the people and the press of the United States, if not the Government, have been taken by surprise, both at the extent of their own claims and at the feeling which is unanimously entertained in England. In the first instance, the English version of the submission to arbitration was described as a repudiation of the Treaty; and it was even imagined or asserted that the excitement which has prevailed in England was, by some unknown means and for some unintelligible party purpose, deliberately promoted by the Government. It was unfortunately but too easy to foresee that, having advanced inadmissible pretensions, the United States would refuse to own that they had been in error; yet it is evident, in spite of confident assertions to the contrary, that the exaction of indirect damages was never seriously contemplated. The agents who compiled the American Case from beginning to end of the document adopt an angry tone which sometimes assumes the form of trivial and irrelevant rudeness. Thus, in quoting the Foreign Enlistment Act, they remark that it is "written in the verbiage which the customs of England make necessary in the laws providing for the punishment of crimes"; and they proceed to "translate" this statutory language into the expressions commonly employed by politicians and writers on international "Law." It might have been thought that the style of an English Act of Parliament concerned the English nation alone. It would not be worth while to refer to so trifling a discourtesy except as an illustration of the temper in which the English apology has, notwithstanding the assurances of the American Commissioners at Washington, been received by the authorised spokesmen of the United States. Nevertheless the claim which seems likely to render the Treaty abortive is propounded at the end of the Case in the most summary terms, and with scarcely a pretence of argument to support it. Out of 479 pages, only two pages and a-half are devoted to the establishment of a claim which would probably amount to four or five hundred millions sterling. The cases of all the cruisers in respect of which it is alleged that the English Government is responsible are severally discussed in minute detail with remarkable vigour and astuteness. In the Alabama case the United States formally ask the Tribunal of Arbitration to consider in their award "the losses of the United States or of individuals in the destruction of their vessels or their cargoes by the Alabama or by its tender," and also the expense to which the United States were put in the pursuit of either of these vessels, or in the capture and destruction of the Alabama. The corresponding claims for damages supposed to be due in consequence of the acts of other cruisers are preferred in the same or similar terms; and, although the expenses of the United States' navy could not on general principles have been included among direct damages, it cannot be disputed that these claims were explicitly submitted to arbitration. A reader who had stopped short at the 472nd page of the Case would never suspect that the United States claimed damages for the increase in the rate of insurance or for the transfer of vessels to a neutral flag. In the 476th page he would learn for the first time that some hundreds of millions were demanded on account of the alleged prolongation of the war. The summary mention of a claim which it is obviously absurd to admit, and impossible to satisfy, would in itself furnish a sufficient proof that the American agents desired, not to obtain the money, but to gratify the assumed feelings of their own countrymen or to affront the nation which they regard with unconcealed animosity. The frivolous argument which they adduce to prove the liability of England will appear to those who are familiar with American modes of thought an intentional and unseasonable joke. The framers of the Case, as acute reasoners and able lawyers, could not fail to see that the cruises of the Alabama and of the other vessels, as they brought no profit to the Confederate Treasury, could in no degree facilitate resistance to the superior Northern force. It was therefore necessary to find an indirect pretext for the claim of indirect damages; and the process of causation is, with a kind of cynical humour, traced through the supposed intentions of Mr. JEFFERSON DAVIS and the Government of Richmond. According to the facetious suggestion of the American agents, the Confederate authorities were induced to prolong the war solely in the hope, afterwards falsified by the act of England, if it was ever entertained by the Confederate Government, that the proceedings of their cruisers might produce a rupture between England and the United States; and, for motives which it is impossible to prove, operating on the minds of persons over whom the English Government had no control, it is, not seriously but formally, insisted that England shall be responsible; and, in preference to abandoning a colossal demand which occupies the two-hundredth part of the elaborate American claim, the United States are apparently willing to retire from the Treaty which recorded the almost unbounded concessions of England. It would be unjust to Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS and his colleagues to attribute to them a grave belief that, but for the presence of the cruisers on the sea, the Confederates would have surrendered the day after the battle of Gettysburg. The Southern army of Virginia then suffered its first reverse in an offensive campaign on the enemy's soil. The result indeed proved that Gettysburg was the turning point of the war; but nearly two years of desperate fighting intervened before Lee surrendered at the Appomattox. The American agents had previously assumed, without a pretence of discussion or proof, that the amicable settlement mentioned in the Protocol of the 8th of March was not the amicable settlement provided by the Treaty. If Mr. GLADSTONE went too far in assuming that the meaning of the phrase on two occasions was identical, the framers of the Case are at least equally hasty in adopting the opposite and paradoxical construction.

It is possible that the American Government may have overlooked the mischief which was capable to result from the culpable levity of the agents who drew the Case; and although it is useless to renege, it may be permitted to repeat the allegation of two great communities, and all the possible slanders which may follow from the weakness of producing a conspicuously stated demand. If the United States had wished or expected to extort a tribute from England, no pains would have been spared in laying a solid or plausible foundation for an unprecedented demand. The less violent American journals confess that the only tenable claim is that which the English Government and people are fully willing to submit to arbitration; but hitherto they have refused to understand that a liability to a penalty of five hundred millions is not a fit subject of reference. It is indeed incredible that any arbitrator should sanction such a claim; but two months ago it would have been equally difficult to believe that it could be advanced by one of the litigants. If any dispassionate American can persuade himself that the English Government or its Commissioners intended to refer the demand to arbitration, he must suppose that the minds of English statesmen are strangely constituted. As an authoritative exponent of the Treaty and the preparatory negotiations has remarked, the Alabama claims, which are in the first article of the Treaty exclusively referred, had been fully defined by the official correspondence before the time at which Mr. SUMNER first invented the demand of damages for the prolongation of the war. The framers of the American claim virtually adopt the English interpretation, until they arrive at the unfortunate peroration which has rendered the rest of their labours useless. The language and the significant silence of American writers and speakers from the date of the Treaty down to the beginning of the present month supplies still more conclusive evidence of the understanding which was common to both nations. If it had been thought in the United States that the arbitration could by any possibility result in an award of hundreds of millions, it was impossible that the approaching discussion should have been regarded with tranquillity, and almost with indifference. It is not pretended that the House of Commons could be expected to vote the payment of the damages which are claimed; yet a refusal to pay would have been a more plausible pretext for hostility than a refusal to proceed to arbitration.

Mr. SMALLEY, who has for some years been London Correspondent of the New York Tribune, has stated in a letter to the Times that Mr. SUMNER, General BUTLER, and other American politicians of position and influence expressed, shortly after the conclusion of the Treaty, their opinion that the claim for four or five hundred millions was included in the reference. Mr. SMALLEY, indeed, remarks with a sneer that the calculation is of English origin; but he can scarcely deny that the costs of the war from the battle of Gettysburg to the surrender of LEE would amount to at least as large a sum. For his own part, Mr. SMALLEY professes to have been totally unaware that his own interpretation of the Treaty was not universally accepted in England. The Tribune, as the advocate of Fenianism, and the consistent enemy of England from the days of SMITH O'BRIEN'S rebellion, has a fit representative in Mr. SMALLEY; who has uniformly written of all English matters in a tone of contemptuous acrimony which is remarkable even as proceeding from an American Correspondent. It is probably no part of his duty to ascertain, or to understand, or to communicate to the readers of the Tribune, the real state of English opinion; but when he proceeds to impute to the English Commissioners a fraudulent complicity with the understanding which they have publicly repudiated, he forgets the statements of Lord GRANVILLE and Lord RUSSEL in the House of Lords. By a curious oversight the framers of the American Case have for other purposes quoted two passages from the debate, so that their Government must have been fully aware that the claim for indirect damages had, in the belief of the English Commissioners, been abandoned. Mr. SUMNER'S expectation that his hostile version of the Treaty would be adopted by the American Government has been justified by the result; but it is nevertheless certain that the people of the United States believed that the controversy was virtually settled, at the moment when their agents were conducting an inflammatory invective against England with a demand which, if it were allowed, could only be enforced by war. It is also more than probable that the American Government intended to indicate to the tribunal by the manner of their claim that it was merely nominal as it was utterly unfounded. Mr. SMALLEY, who seemed to enjoy the confidence of the American Government, continues in his second letter to the Times the conjecture that the demand for indirect damages would not have been seriously pressed. An American who was capable of understanding the English Government had any feelings of honour or self-respect, would entirely ask that it should submit to arbitration a statement and losses incurred, in the hope of enabling some payment through the final moderation of the extraordinary demand. According to one of the latest rumours, the American Government offers to abandon the indirect claims if the Geneva Tribunal awards the calculation of damages to the Board of Amateurs. If the report is well founded, it would seem that the withdrawal of the claims from the cognizance of the Arbitration would be equally just and reasonable. The Geneva Tribunal can award a gross sum only "for all the claims referred to it," which, according to the English construction, are the same private claims which, as a second alternative, are to be referred to the Board of Amateurs. The Government of the United States, if it draws a distinction between the two tribunals, must be understood to contend that the "claims" mentioned in the Seventh Article of the Treaty are more "extensive than the claims" in the Tenth Article. The real dispute between the two Governments is narrowed into the issue, whether a demand which would in any case not be pressed shall be ostensibly submitted to the tribunal of Arbitration.

THE DEBATE ON SIR R. COLLIER'S APPOINTMENT.

THE vote of the House of Lords on the appointment of Sir ROBERT COLLIER will have created more surprise than dissatisfaction. It was well known that the PRIME MINISTER and LORD CHANCELLOR would be whitewashed, but it had been thought that the operation would be performed for the first time in another place. The House of Lords may fairly take to itself the credit of having, in the face of much provocation, declined to give a party vote, or rather of having given a political vote in opposition to its own party feeling. The Duke of ARBUTHNOT, anticipating an opposite result, did his utmost to prevent calm consideration either of the merits of the question or of the public interest. His furious and unreasonable invective against the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE might have been described, in his own misapplied words, as a railing or ribald accusation. The Duke of ARBUTHNOT might have known that the journals which are most devoted to the support of the present Government have from the first almost unanimously censured the evasion of law which has now been formally condoned; yet he repeatedly declared that Lord STANHOPE'S motion was only founded on party grounds, and in the intemperance of his zeal he even challenged the opposition of his "pretended friends," the Liberal peers, who may be suspected of not reposing unqualified confidence in Mr. GLADSTONE. The real feeling of the majority of the House of Lords was much better expressed by Lord PORTMAN, who repeatedly admitted that the law had been strained, and that the conduct of the Government had been blamable, although he contended that there was not a case for Parliamentary censure. Lord PORTMAN also asked the material question whether Lord STANHOPE and his supporters were prepared to undertake the government of the country if they succeeded in driving the present Ministers from office. It was by considerations of this kind, and not by the wild declamation of the Duke of ARBUTHNOT, that the unexpected vote of the majority was determined. There was also a well-founded disinclination to inflict a censure on a Lord Chancellor who is both personally and professionally respected. It is not probable that any peer was convinced by the arguments of Lord ROMILLY, who holds the very doctrine which was used by the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE as an extreme illustration of the impropriety of the late appointment. According to Lord ROMILLY, it would not be an objectionable proceeding to make a barrister Chief Justice of the High Court of Bengal for the purpose, not of providing for the administration of justice in India, but of giving a qualification for the Judicial Committee of Privy Council. It may be hoped that the technical objections which Lord ROMILLY has, as he says, spent his judicial life in discouraging, are less serious than the plain meaning and intent of a recent Act of Parliament; but there is fortunately no doubt that, as an upright Judge, he would condemn, and, if possible, annul, any private transaction which even remotely approached the character of Mr. GLADSTONE'S interpretation of the recent statute. The opinion which Lord ROMILLY had formed on the issue before the House may perhaps be explained by his astonishing statement that among the persons with whom he had conversed the preponderance of opinion was in favour of the Government. There is probably no other member of either House of Parliament, or of the profession of the law, who has met with so eccentric a portion of society.

The complaints of the LORD CHANCELLOR that he had been condemned unheard are answered by his own speech, which contained facts which were not already perfectly well known. The tone and temper of his explanation contrasted favourably with the Duke of ARGYLL's injudicious burst of violence. If the House of Lords had before entertained any doubt of the LORD CHANCELLOR's upright character and intentions, it would have been dispelled by his simple and earnest apology. Unfortunately his judgment is not infallible; and there is just cause for regret at his defence of the appointment of Mr. BEALES to the bench of a County Court. It was undesirable to revive the memory of the discreditable negotiation between a Minister of the Crown and an agitator who, fresh from a triumph of mob violence, afterwards boasted that the streets would have run with blood if the Government had not been intimidated into compliance with his demands. Lord HATHERLEY declares that he had from his first entrance into office determined to provide for a man who had been reduced to ruin for an expression of political opinion. A Lord Chancellor ought not to encourage the belief that political opinion may be legitimately expressed by pulling down railings. Lord STANHOPE weakened his own case by raising an ill-founded objection to the appointment of an Attorney-General to a seat at the Privy Council. The apologists of the Government made the obvious answer, that an Attorney-General is always supposed to be eligible for the highest judicial offices; and both the objection and the reply were utterly irrelevant to the question which was to be determined. On the main charge no defence was offered, or could be offered, which deserves a moment's attention. The LORD CHANCELLOR was ill-advised in relying on the double-edged argument with which he had been furnished by Mr. Justice WILLES. It may indeed be regarded as a proof of openness and candour that the document was voluntarily submitted to the House. It is not a little strange that a Judge who combines profound legal learning with great ability and general cultivation should have composed a singular testimonial which partakes of the nature of a squib. Of Justice WILLES's two propositions, that the appointment was legal, and that the legal appointment of a fit man cannot be an evasion of the law, the first is a truism, and the second is a blunder. If the law had been violated, the Act could not have been evaded. An appointment which "may have surprised those who had not considered the terms of the Act" was extremely likely, as in the present instance, to be an evasion of the Act. In the case of Sir R. COLLIER, as in the Ewelme case, Mr. GLADSTONE carefully considered the terms of the Act, for the purpose, and with the result, of finding a loophole of evasion. To simpler minds the direct and obvious purpose of a law would seem better worthy of study. It was unnecessary for Mr. Justice WILLES to disclaim any participation in "the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE's letter to the newspapers." If he had not been temporarily blinded by some unexplained feeling, he would have known that the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE's letter was addressed, not to the newspapers, but to Mr. GLADSTONE, who was then about to complete the objectionable appointment. The grave and temperate remonstrance of the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE is not more damaging than Mr. Justice WILLES's suggestion that the Ministers whom he undertakes to defend had surprised Parliament into passing the Act by a suppression for which they are answerable. The interpretation of the sneer is that the salary provided in the Act was not sufficient to induce the Judges to vacate their present posts. On this ground Mr. Justice WILLES seems to have anticipated the very evasion of the Act which was afterwards perpetrated. If he had been interested in the Ewelme Act, he would have, with similar astuteness, discovered that it was open to a non-natural interpretation; but in the Judicial Committee Act the Ministers themselves provided the loophole through which they subsequently evaded the law. Lord SALISBURY was justified in referring to the disposal of the benefice of Ewelme in illustration of Mr. GLADSTONE's mode of dealing with Acts of Parliament. The LORD CHANCELLOR had in that case, on behalf of the Government, consented to introduce a clause by which members of Convocation of Oxford were exclusively qualified to hold the preferment. Mr. GLADSTONE, according to his own account, objected to an interference with the prerogative of the Crown; or, in other words, to a restriction imposed by Parliament on the Prime Minister's disposal of patronage. In former times it was understood that Parliament was supreme; but the author of the Royal Warrant for purchase and of the COLLIER appointment is not to be controlled by obsolete traditions. On a close and pettifoggish examination of the words inserted by his colleague, Mr. GLADSTONE discovered that a clause provided for the exclusive benefit of Oxford might be perverted into a mode of providing for a member of the University of Cambridge. Accordingly the Prime Minister of England condescended to advise a clergyman to acquire a fictitious qualification for a benefice to which he then proceeded to present him. If a blunder has occurred in the completion of an awkward juggle, Mr. GLADSTONE coolly informs the House of Commons that the loss will fall, not on himself, but on his comparatively innocent nominee. There is reason to fear that the vote of the House of Lords, though it may have been in the circumstances expedient, will encourage the Minister in his avowed indifference to legal and constitutional scruples.

The debate and division in the House of Commons will now excite comparatively little interest. Sir ROUNDELL PALMER has been induced once more to appear in his favourite character of a solvent and responsible surety for a suspicious firm. In August last Parliament was kept waiting for prorogation till a certificate had been produced from Sir R. PALMER that the revival of an obsolete prerogative was wholly unobjectionable. His high character is again to be thrown into the scale against the universal and well-founded conviction that the PRIME MINISTER and the CHANCELLOR have been guilty of gross perversion of a statute. His evidence will in no degree bear on the merits of the question; but it will remove any scruple which might have interfered with a strict party vote. Any ordinary Liberal member may plausibly argue that he is neither as learned nor as conscientious as the mover of an amendment with which he might otherwise in his simplicity have been excusably shocked. There will be a clear majority for the Government, at the cost of lowering in a perceptible degree the standard of political morality. It is a cause for regret that the future Chancellor should be the person who undertakes to prove that the present CHANCELLOR is not deserving of censure because he had enabled the PRIME MINISTER to evade the plain meaning of the law; nor is an evil example rendered less pernicious by the fact that all the three personages who combine to set it justly enjoy the highest character for religion and morality.

THE BALLOT.

THE Ballot, if it is one of the most important, is certainly one of the most uninteresting of public questions. Mr. DISRAELI at the commencement of the Session announced that he would offer the Government Bill his most unflinching opposition, but he entirely failed on Thursday to keep his word; neither he nor any of the leaders of his party made any sign of antagonism to the Bill. The Government did not care to defend what was not seriously attacked, and the debate fell almost wholly into the hands of the non-official members of both parties. So very slight was the interest which the debate awakened, that it is stated one speaker found himself speaking to an audience of two members, and an attempt was actually made to count out the House while it was engaged in giving a second reading to a Bill which, if it passes into law, must seriously affect the whole Constitution and history of the country. All this only shows that the Ballot is not really a matter of practical discussion. For good or for evil, it is an experiment which is going to be tried. Those who object to it feel that they are in the position of persons objecting to racing who should be asked to discuss whether the Derby shall be run this year, or of persons liking Ministerial firmness who should be asked to discuss whether Mr. BRUCE will give way the next time pressure is brought to bear on him. What is the use of speculating on, or contending against, certainties? The Ballot will soon be the law of the land, and all that wise men can do is to make the measure passed as perfect, as effectual, and as little objectionable as possible. Any real life, again, that there might have otherwise been in the opposition of the Conservative party to the Bill is killed by the conviction which many Conservatives entertain that the measure will in many constituencies work to their advantage. Mr. POWELL, the most newly elected of Conservatives, has come up to Parliament pledged to vote in favour of the Ballot. The local managers of his party think that, if the Ballot prevails at the next election, their prospects will be even better than they would otherwise be; and it is notorious that many Liberals who approve of the Ballot and vote for it avow that they are making involuntary martyrs of themselves, and that secret voting means for them a speedy retirement into private life. There are, of course, many Conservatives who honestly and on public grounds oppose the Ballot, and who are ready to utter what seems to them to be true about it in spite of the practical indifference which their leaders show to the question. But they can make no head against the apathy which meets them on every side. There is, indeed, no enthusiasm for the Bill; but then this is, in a great success, due to the universal conviction that the Bill will be passed. The Conservatives won several seats from the Government during the recess, but in no single instance did their successful candidate invite the electors to support him in opposing the Ballot. The constituencies do not appear to care much for the Ballot, but they have got it into their heads that the Ballot is a small, if unintelligible, tribute that ought to be paid to their merits. They echo the formula that the Ballot is the necessary supplement to the last Reform Bill, and although Conservatives with very safe seats say of course anything they please, and denounce the Ballot to their hearts' content, yet if a Conservative wishes to gain a seat, or to hold one keenly contested, he does not like to seem afraid of trusting the electors, or to stand in the way of a change which they consider complimentary to them, more especially as his agents will very probably whisper in his ear that the Ballot will be the very best thing for him and his local partisans that could be desired.

The result of all discussions on the Ballot is that it is in itself a bad thing, and that as a corrective of bribery it will be either ineffectual, or possibly an aggravation of the mischief, but that it may act beneficially as a deterrent from intimidation. It is a bad thing in itself, because it will lead to much disgusting trickery and manœuvring, because it will largely increase the power of wire-pulling, and because it will, we fear, very much decrease the amount of personal interest felt in political questions. When great masses go to the poll, no one knows how or why, the tendency to abstention which so fatally prevails in France is very likely to take strong hold of those who care to judge and read for themselves. Bribery will prevail after the Ballot as much as it does now. The disposition to incur the reputation of having actually bought votes is perhaps a little diminishing before the growth of a wholesome public opinion, although this may very easily be disputed; and the electors of Wick certainly do not seem inclined to exact from their candidate that standard of sensitive purity or passionate remorse which made a Scotch Judge kill himself because he felt life to be unendurable for one who had been suspected as guilty of corrupting a constituency. But the Ballot will rather tend to make bribery seem less than more odious to those whose longings to enter the House of Commons tempt them to try to get there by a lavish expenditure. It will be far more difficult to prove bribery on an election petition than it is under the present law, for no one's vote will be known. At present, if a humble partisan suddenly goes over, or if the wavering of a notorious money-seeker is suddenly terminated, there is some clue given by which practised agents may guess when bribery began, and how the bribe was administered. It is true that those who give bribes will not be so sure that they will get value for their money; but they can pay for results, and although the elector will not have so strong a temptation to vote if the payment is contingent as if the money were in his pocket, yet it must be remembered that a contingent payment will be all he can get, and may easily seem better than nothing. If both sides bribed, the elector would be in a delightful position, for he must win whatever was the result, and whichever way he voted; and candidates who are deterred from bribing from regard, not for principle, but their pockets, will be much more tempted to bribe than they are now. They can only have to pay if they are successful, and this will be most seductive to them. At present a candidate may spend four or five thousand pounds on an election, get no return whatever for it, or else win his seat, and, after holding it for a few months, be exposed to much public ridicule and some public odium when the details disclosed in an inquiry on petition are published day by day in the papers. But after the Ballot is established, a clever serpent of a local attorney will have very sweet things to whisper into the ears of a rich man who is doubting whether he will go through all he must go through in order to get into Parliament. The tempter will be able to say that all he asks is a cheque for so many thousand pounds the day after his listener becomes an M.P., while there is no chance of discovery, as it will be impossible to find out how those who will be adequately influenced have voted. If the proposal to make the constituencies pay the legal expenses is carried, the attorney will be able to occupy still stronger ground, and will show his rich acquaintance that he is not called to spend one single shilling, unless he chooses to gratify his vanity and fill up his time by going down and speaking to, or by addressing through placards and advertisements, the electors whose support is really to be gained in another way.

Intimidation is a very different thing. A man who wishes to be elected if he is capable of taking money, and the Ballot will only slightly, if at all, stand in the way of his getting what he wishes. But a man wishes not to be intimidated, and the Ballot may help him to carry out his wishes. In this case the voter is on the side of the Ballot, uses or profits by it, and this is very different from the case where the voter wishes to nullify the Ballot and prevent it from standing in his way. There can be little doubt that the Ballot will—at least at first—diminish intimidation. The fertile brains of professional local politicians may hereafter devise means of intimidating in spite of the Ballot, but we never yet heard of any constituency as to which those who knew it best were not of opinion that, if there were the Ballot, there would unquestionably be many voters more free than they are now to support their honest opinions, gratify their prejudices, and humour their own personal feelings, good or bad. Is there, however, enough intimidation to make the Ballot worth having? This is a question to which very different answers are given. Intimidation means, in fact, very different things. The ATTORNEY-GENERAL for Ireland, on Thursday, while ridiculing the idea that electors are trustees for non-electors, said that he remembered once seeing a trustee escorted by eight soldiers to the poll, to protect him from his castus que trusts. This is one form of intimidation. Another form of intimidation is when a tenant is asked to vote for a landlord whom he has known from childhood, whose family he considers a part of his own social life, whose meat and ale he has often tasted, and who has never done him a bad turn. He may easily fancy, and fancy very rightly, that if he refused to vote for his landlord he would suffer for it, not by having his farm taken from him, but by cold looks, a painful sense of distance and reserve, and a cessation of hospitalities. The pressure thus put on him to vote against his wishes, assuming that he has wishes prompting him to vote the other way, is a species of intimidation. The Ballot would, to a certain unascertainable extent, diminish the force of these forms of intimidation, and of all the various forms that lie between the extremes. If under intimidation we are to include all the means by which men are led away by a reasonable fear of disagreeable consequences from voting as they would like, the probability is that there is a large amount of intimidation in England, although not nearly so much as is to be found in other countries; and although there are many causes tending to lessen the amount in England, there are two indications that there is a great deal of intimidation in England, which deserve to be noticed. In the first place, most of those who have lived among the artisans of large towns, and know something about them, agree that those men are subject to much pressure with regard to elections from their masters, and still more from the foremen and overlookers, and still more, again, from each other. In the next place, when we find so many constituencies, and especially constituencies that have returned Conservatives whose general principles might naturally make them lean against the Ballot, declaring that they want the Ballot, and think it the only way of giving important sections of the electoral body a fair chance of returning a member to their taste, they cannot be supposed to be talking nonsense. They must be prompted by the knowledge they have obtained of real facts. It is inconceivable that the Conservatives of the North-West Riding would send a new member to vote for the Ballot unless the intimidation exercised by their opponents was something that hurt and annoyed and alarmed them. The good of the Ballot is that it will, at least at first, and at least partially, stop intimidation, which is a mischief widely spread and occasionally keenly felt. The evil of the Ballot is that it will lower the tone of political life, and augment rather than diminish bribery. Whether the good or the evil is likely to be the greater might be a matter for interminable argument, were it not that the question has, as was shown on Thursday night, passed practically out of the region of argument altogether.

THE FRENCH ASSEMBLY AND THE RECENT ELECTIONS.

THAT France is a Republic without Republicans has become a commonplace, but it is a little difficult to reconcile this epigrammatic statement with the results exhibited by so many successive elections. Two more Departments have just returned Republican candidates by considerable majorities, the defeated candidates being in one instance a Legitimist, and in the other an Imperialist, and a Conservative unpledged to any particular form of government. In Brittany the return of a Legitimist would have been natural enough, and there is certainly nothing to wonder at in 35,600 votes being given in his favour. The point that really calls for notice is that, in spite of all the exertions of a party which could send so many voters to the poll, the Republican carried the day. Normandy, at least rural Normandy, is said to be Imperialist in its sympathies, having a grateful recollection of the Treaty which opened the English markets to its cheese and butter. Consequently we are not surprised to find that in the Eure the Imperialist candidate had 21,000 supporters. Here again the point that calls for notice is that, in spite of all the Bonapartists could do, the Republican was elected by a majority of more than 10,000 votes. If France is a Republic without Republicans, how are these returns to be accounted for? Six months ago they might have been explained by saying that the Republic—that is, the THIERS Government—was the sole embodiment of order and authority in France, and that it was in this capacity alone that so many Frenchmen were anxious to see it maintained. This can hardly be said with accuracy now. The union which formerly existed between M. THIERS and the Assembly has sustained too many shocks for any Frenchman who cares about politics to believe that in voting for a Republic he is simply supporting the party of order. It has been clear for some time that the ideas of the majority in the Assembly are monarchical, however they may differ as to the family in which they would like to see their ideas embodied. It has been equally clear that M. THIERS is bent upon keeping the Republic in being, at all events until the indemnity is paid and French soil set free from German soldiers. The desire to preserve order is not therefore an adequate motive for the electoral support which has been accorded to the Republic. Politicians who can see below the surface may feel sure that the setting up of a Monarchy, whether Legitimist or constitutional, would be a signal for civil war, and may for that reason be ready to sink their personal preferences rather than gratify them at so terrible a cost. But the rank and file of a party are not restrained by such a consideration as this, especially when they have to decide, not whether a Monarchy shall be proclaimed, but simply whether the deputy to be sent to Versailles shall be one who would support it if it were proclaimed. Consequently, now that party divisions are more sharply marked in the Assembly, we should expect to see them more sharply marked in the country. So far the expectation has not been disappointed. The resolution into component elements which the Conservative party in the Assembly has undergone has had its counterpart in the constituencies. What was not expected was that the proportions between the elements in the two cases would be entirely different. Both in the Assembly and among the electors the party of order commands a large majority; but in the Assembly order and Monarchy are regarded as synonymous, while in the country the disposition rather is to identify order with the Republic.

At the time when the existing Government first took shape this difference would have seemed unimportant. The necessarily provisional character of any constitutional arrangement made with an enormous ransom still due, and a portion of French territory held in pledge for its punctual payment, was strong in men's minds. There was a general disposition, except on the part of the extreme Left, to postpone the consideration of questions which tended to divide Frenchmen from one another. If it had been possible for M. THIERS to retain his original position in the Government, this happy state of affairs might have lasted for some time longer. So long as France was ruled by a simple President of the Council of Ministers, the fact that the supreme authority was in abeyance was obvious to every one. Under every form of Government, from pure despotism to pure Republicanism, there is always an officer holding a place similar to that then held by M. THIERS. No section of opinion could regard itself as pledged by submission to him, or be irritated by a feeling that such submission involved a compromise of principle. No amount of difference between the opinions of the majority in the Assembly and the majority in the country as to the distant future need have prevented their agreement upon what was to be done in the actual present, and by the time that this distant future arrived the Assembly and the country would have been brought into harmony by the process of a general election. But when M. THIERS became President of the French Republic the circumstances of the case were greatly changed. The monarchical party were at once irritated by the recognition accorded to a form of government they disliked, and absolved from the understanding they had given to respect the provisional character of the Government by its suddenly diverting itself of the especial note of that character, the absence of any acknowledged head. In some respects this premature recognition was a disadvantage to the Republic. A Government in which the Chief of the Executive is his own Prime Minister in so abundant that it can hardly help giving birth to all sorts of speculation, and for every one of these the Republic is held responsible. The effect of this state of things is, that the majority in the Assembly is annoyed to find itself under a Republic, while it is continually supplied with excuses for declaring that Republic intolerable. If the monarchical sentiment were gaining ground in the country, this annoyance might easily be endured in the conviction that the longer it was put up with the more complete would be the triumph which was being secretly prepared throughout the country. But when a monarchical majority in a Legislature which has been wont to see victories won by a coup d'état sees its power in the country declining before it has struck one blow for the interests it wishes to see uppermost, there is no slight danger that it may choose to make an effort at once, while it has at least an advantage of position, rather than wait until the hopelessness of its cause is revealed to all men by its becoming a minority in the Chamber as well as in the constituencies. Every fresh addition to the Republican party in the Assembly thus becomes a reminder to the majority that the time is short, and that a year hence its ability to set up a monarchy may be as much less than it is now as its ability to do so now is less than it was a year ago.

Some such feeling as this is probably at the bottom of the various manifestoes of which rumours are current from time to time. If the majority in the Assembly were homogeneous, something of the kind would doubtless have been put out before now. But so soon as the deputies got to work at drawing up a statement of principles, the old division between Legitimist and Orleanist comes to the surface, and the phalanx which is so united against the Republican becomes divided once more when the question is no longer shall there be a Monarchy? but whom will you have for monarch? It is on the discord thus aroused that the Bonapartists found their chief hopes of an Imperialist restoration. The history of every electoral college goes to show that the object of a common hatred has sometimes a better chance of success than either of the factions by which he is hated, and there is at least a possibility that this law may be again exemplified in the constitutional deliberations of the French Assembly. The return of M. ROCHER will give the Bonapartists a Parliamentary leader endowed with considerable tact and eloquence. Hitherto there has been no one in the Chamber to turn its errors to account, or to demonstrate, for the benefit alike of deputies and electors, the position of NAPOLEON III. as the sovereign to whom a majority of French parties would give their second vote. Beyond the opportunity thus afforded, M. ROCHER's election is not specially significant. The Corsicans have nothing in common with Continental France, and they have a kind of family tie to the Empire which deprives their support of any tendency to reproduce itself elsewhere. But the presence of an able politician in a divided and distracted Chamber will sometimes have consequences out of all proportion to the strength of the party which has sent him there. A general election is not usually prescribed for a country for which peace is the first necessity; but it is quite possible that a dissolution may soon become the only way of delivering France from the rule of a majority driven to intrigues by the consciousness of representing but a fraction of the French nation. How a dissolution is to be obtained in the constitutional entanglement in which France now finds herself, is a practical consideration of equal moment and difficulty.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS.

THE Contagious Diseases Acts are not a pleasant subject of discussion; and the conduct of the Government has probably rendered the vindication of sound principles for the present practically useless. Another step has been taken in the course of subordinating the public welfare to the demands of noisy sects and factions; and, if it is desirable that the progress of political degeneracy should be obvious and inevitable, it is perhaps well that the Government should in this matter have been represented by a candid and simple-minded Minister. Few legislators would openly confess that they disapproved of their own proposals, and that their political arguments which they believed to be either dishonest or erroneous. In their long series of administrative blunders, of the Ministers boasted that any responsibility which they might have incurred was that the Government had not their persistent and abiding anxiety for the benefit of the community. It was because they were not content to wait for a future opportunity that they had provoked the hostility of those supposed to be interested in the maintenance of status. Mr. Bruce's colleagues are necessary co-participants in the enthusiasm of philanthropy which in their judgment atones for his administrative mismanagements, and for his acknowledged want of skill in the management of parties. On Tuesday last Mr. Bruce adopted the trampler theory that it is useless to legislate in advance of public opinion, or, as he might have said in still plainer language, that it is inexpedient to alienate any section of Liberal electors. It was exclusively on the assumption of the unpopularity of the Contagious Diseases Acts that he proposed in his new Bill to omit the provision on which their efficiency principally depends. For the sacrifice of his own convictions, and of the interests of those concerned in the matter, Mr. Bruce consoled himself by a vigorous exposure of the mendacious hollowiness of the clamour to which the Government has yielded. No supporter of the Acts which are to be superseded could have denounced with stronger indignation the false statements, the calumnies, and the perverse reasoning of the male and female agitators who will now celebrate their triumph. The Acts had succeeded beyond the hopes of their promoters in checking vice, in diminishing suffering, and, above all, in reducing the risk of future evil to innocent victims. On all these results Mr. Bruce dwelt with emphasis and complacency, for the apparent purpose of proving that in reversing the course of beneficent legislation he had deferred exclusively to ignorance and passion. Public opinion is but a vague term, though it has sometimes been paradoxically defined as the opposite of the aggregate of private opinions. In the present instance those who are best able to form a judgment almost unanimously support the measures which are not to be renewed. An overwhelming majority in the medical profession approves the maintenance or extension of the practice of compulsory examination; nor is there any reason to believe that the system is regarded with repugnance even by the unfortunate persons whom it directly affects. In the estimation of many politicians, and, as it appears, of the present Ministers, public opinion is the utterance of any considerable body of voters in a doubtful borough. One of the members of the Government was, a year or two ago, defeated in a contest because he declined to pledge himself to the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts, and his colleagues and superiors are not inclined to repeat a dangerous experiment.

Mr. Jacob Bright, as a principal advocate of the admission of women into the political amphitheatre, naturally supports the demands which some of them have proffered with characteristic indifference to expediency and to principle. It was by an inexcusable misapprehension of his meaning that he was supposed to agree with his feminine allies in holding that it is wrong to interfere with disease because it is the appointed penalty of vice. If female agitators were bound to be consistent, they would, if they had absolute control over the health and life of the community, deliberately retain or introduce one of the deadliest of diseases, because they fancy that it may indirectly discourage immorality. Even the Jews who believed that those on whom the Tower of Babel fell were exceptionally wicked would have hesitated to undermine its foundations in aid of divine justice; but in those days women took no active part in public affairs. That the entire issue should be misapprehended by excited ladies was perfectly excusable; but their successful efforts to enforce their mistaken views afford the fullest illustration of the wisdom of established institutions and traditions. If the question had been, as in former times, discussed exclusively by the colder and more accurate sex, the sophisms and the falsehoods which failed to satisfy Mr. Bruce's understanding would perhaps not have been allowed to determine his action. It is not yet known whether the other members of the Cabinet approve, with Mr. Bruce, of the legislation which at his instance they propose to abolish. Mr. Asquith some time since told a deputation that the Government appreciated the moral objections to the existing Acts, and that he hoped that the measure which was to be introduced would satisfy all parties. Having already forewarned his opponents to the cause of the rights of women, Mr. Gladstone may perhaps, without departing from his own character, be inclined to adopt the principles of women. If he has become a proselyte, he has not succeeded in convincing his colleagues of the House of Commons; but Mr. Bruce might be more easily assured for giving way to the Prime Minister than for maintaining a traditional position. If, on the other hand, the Government in general agree in opinion with Mr. Bruce, it ought to have shown in the House of Commons the responsibility of repealing measures which most valuable among recent enactments. Mr. John Lubbock observed, if the House could vote against the Acts would be supported by a large majority; and, in spite of discontented constituents, a resolute Ministry would, even under the present system, probably have been supported in a conscientious policy. The shrill arguments of the pro-contagious platform, and the unnecessary details of the pamphlets published by the Association, are not calculated to be effective in the House of Commons. Whether the prospects of a future election would have induced members to compromise their principles, it is now impossible to ascertain. As Mr. Bruce has by choice or compulsion declined to legislate in accordance with his own judgment, no private member could with any hope of success attempt to introduce into the present Bill the more stringent provisions of the former Acts. The measure itself will probably be considered unobjectionable, and it may perhaps do some good, though its omissions will be the cause of much vice and misery. It is not likely that the severer punishments which are to be attached to certain offences will meet with opposition, and perhaps even the opponents of the former Acts will consent to a moderate extension of the powers of the police. Some of the more zealous female orators indeed have complained of the impediments which were placed by the former Acts in the way of occasional or intermittent irregularity on the part of women; but it may be hoped that provisions against the molestation of passengers in the streets will be tolerated as a reasonable compromise. The grievance of separate legislation for one sex will unfortunately remain, but, as one of the speakers on Mr. Bruce's motion remarked, it is difficult to avoid an invidious distinction in dealing with a class to which there is nothing analogous among men.

The legislative failure which Mr. Bruce is not solicitous to conceal indicates a weakness in modern Parliamentary government far graver than the impediments to business which occupy the attention of Committees. The Ministers almost openly acknowledge that they are dependent, not only on the support of a popular majority, but on the favour of the several petty sections into which it is divided. If there are any plausible reasons for repealing the Contagious Diseases Acts, Mr. Bruce neither stated their substance nor acknowledged their value. It is true that it is impossible to legislate in defiance of general opinion, but in this case the agitators and their dupes form a comparatively inconsiderable part of the population. If the opponents of measures against contagion are really strong enough to control the House of Commons and the Government, several other minor factions must have equal power to thwart legislation which they may regard as unpalatable. The present Government in the present Parliament would scarcely succeed in effecting an organic reform such as that which was accomplished in the Poor Law Act of 1834. It is not difficult to assail inherently feeble institutions like the Irish Church, or even to wield against a comparatively small class of landowners the powers which are derived from the support of a united majority. Neither the Irish Protestants nor the Irish landlords belonged to the Liberal party which it is the business of the Government to satisfy; and consequently both of Mr. Gladstone's great measures increased and consolidated the majority by which they were carried. The Association which has procured the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts exercised a certain influence over elections; and consequently it has received more than due consideration. The decision of the Government may perhaps be excusable, but it reveals a serious defect in existing political institutions.

CATHEDRAL REFORM.

CATHEDRALS and Chapters are becoming again a subject of discussion, and in some quarters of anxiety, though the public interest in their prosperity can hardly yet be said to be very keen. But it is taken for granted by many, perhaps with scarcely sufficient ground, that they are the specially weak point of the English Church system. There are obvious and plausible reasons for this opinion, though the real value of these reasons is quite another question; and the opinion is one which recommends itself to every-going thinkers who appreciate a case which can be shortly handled, as it is also a conventional one when a subject is wanted on which to earn, at no very great expense, a reputation for reforming zeal, and to direct criticism from one's self to one's neighbours. The Cathedral system has undoubtedly its weak points, as most institutions have; but institutions which have lasted a long time have usually some strong points too; and Cathedrals can certainly show them.

The Cathedral system has two weaknesses which strike everybody; one of them inevitable, as things are now, though it belongs to the condition of man rather than properly to the system itself; the other open to change and remedy, though it has become fast fixed in the traditions, the current ideas, and the actual working of our own Cathedral institutions. It is inevitable that Deans and Canons, who hold their offices for life, should fall sick, should grow old, should become unfit for work; it is inevitable, as the working Chapters now consist only of five members, mostly appointed after the prime of life, that occasionally a whole Chapter should be in a disabled condition. There is no curing this element of weakness, unless the difficult question of retirement—difficult in all services, eminently difficult in this—can be arranged. The other weakness is an accident of the Cathedral system as such, though it is inherent in the mode of working it which has long prevailed, and which is still not out of date. It arises from looking on Cathedral offices as something secondary and subordinate to a man's other objects and business in life; as sinecures, or as prizes, or as posts of dignified retirement, or as additions to income, or as periodical variations of work, breaking at intervals, and those not very long ones, the ordinary employment of an active clergyman. It is the weakness which comes from assigning the highest pay, the highest dignity, the highest position, to what is in reality only the accessory and occasional portion of a man's occupation; to that which interests him and others least, which makes the least call on his energy and ability, and the least demand for his self-devotion and sacrifices. But this weakness, natural as it is, is not a necessary one, and may be got rid of, if there is only the will.

The truth is, that the only tenable reason to be assigned why Cathedral Chapters should exist is that they do furnish a clergyman with an object and work which it is worth living for. Not a subsidiary or complementary sphere of labour, to which he can turn for relief when tired, or in which he can expend his superfluous force; but one to which he may devote himself, and is bound to do so, as much as a parson is supposed to be taken up with his parish, or a bishop with his diocese. In this spirit Cathedral institutions began; with this view of Cathedral ends and obligations Chapters were founded. A number of clergy were associated, in order, at a point of vantage like that afforded by an important locality, and with the strength derived from numbers and mutual help, to carry on a serious and systematic work, and to make a corresponding impression on society in favour of religion. The business of the Chapter, however it might be interpreted, furnished the direct and sufficient end for which each member professed to live; and we cannot but think that unless Chapters can make it clear to the public mind, not only that Deans and Canons are sufficient for their places, but that their places are sufficient for them—sufficient to give worthy scope to high purposes and adequate occupation to high abilities—the indirect advantages of Cathedral institutions, which are not inconsiderable, will hardly meet with due justice.

But, in reality, if the Cathedral and its life were to become the main and governing object to members of Chapters, instead of being in the second line and only thought of from time to time as a kind of ornament or variation to a man's ordinary life, they would furnish quite enough to fill up a clergyman's thoughts and time, and to task his powers to the utmost. It is much less important for what particular object these posts are used than that they should be used—used to furnish the main and direct business of a man who is in earnest about what he does. There are at the first glance three great employments for which it would be difficult to find a fitter place than in our Cathedrals. One is the primary and original function of those bodies which were collected in the first instance to serve in them; it is the business of Cathedrals to furnish and keep up the purest and highest model attainable of public service and worship. It is unfortunately too notorious how many fall short of what might be expected of them in this matter. It is also clear that nowhere is care taken to make the service what it ought to be, without a warm and ready response from the crowds who are soothed, comforted, encouraged, attracted by it. If this one point were reached in all or most of our Cathedrals, if their great capacities and resources were worked to the full, not in over-ornate and over-refined services adapted to the fastidious tastes of professional musicians and nice critics of ritual, but in forms of worship which by their grandeur, simplicity, and, above all, their serious and unaffected devotional earnestness, should be adapted to impress and subdue the hearts of worshippers, there would not be many people to cry out against Cathedrals. But they have other uses equally fit to be a man's main object in life. Cathedrals have opened to our generation new ideas about the limits and the aims of preaching. Good sermons there have long been both in the Church and out of it; and plenty besides of loud, vulgar, noisy ones, for those who found good sermons tame. But even the partial use which has been made of the large spaces of Cathedrals for preaching has developed a type of sermon which thirty years back would have been thought beyond our reach. It is a kind of sermon which has in it the argumentative power, the theological knowledge, the cultivation, the good taste, the deep thought, the pure English of our older preaching, with the fire, the boldness, the popular sympathies, the oratorical breadth and impetuosity, by which a great speaker is distinguished from one who is great with his pen. We have hitherto had no sermons to match as examples of popular eloquence the masterpieces of the great French schools; we may now expect to have them in time, if we have not attained to them yet. And since people have discovered that Cathedral naves were not built merely to be promenades for sightseers, it has gradually dawned upon us that the Church is still, even at home, a missionary institution; and that there is no place where crowds ever assemble so readily to hear what their teachers have to tell them—no place where they come with less sense of restraint, and with that openness of mind which goes with the feeling of perfect freedom to hear and to judge for themselves, to stay or depart as they will—no place where they can be so completely at home with their own thoughts and longings—as in those glorious halls which open their gates wide to every comer, and have room, no questions asked, for throngs of the most varied composition.

If there are objects which a clergyman may make the governing and adequate purposes of his life, they are certainly the care of the public worship of the Church, and the work of preaching. Here are two objects quite sufficient to fill the life and task the ability and power of any man; and when to this is added a third occupation, the life and business of the scholar, the student, and the teacher, it cannot be said that fit and absorbing work cannot be found for members of Cathedral bodies. These are their special and characteristic business, not necessarily all, but one or other of them; and it certainly is not the fault of the business if it is not enough to form the definite and sufficient employment of Deans and Canons. It is in this direction that Cathedral reform ought to be pushed. An idea finds favour in many quarters that their resources may be better turned to account by making them great diocesan organizing bureaux in which the educational or the ecclesiastical business of the diocese should be concentrated and transacted under heads of departments, in close connexion with the Bishop; and it is further suggested that definite offices connected with this business might be by law attached to each canonry. To this the answer is, that diocesan business cannot need such expensive and magnificent machinery. It can be done much cheaper; and Cathedral institutions were meant and adapted for other purposes, and not for this. It would simply be a waste and misapplication to use them in this way. Doubtless they owe service to the diocese; but if they are good for anything, they owe service also, more important service, to the Church at large. Their fate is sealed if they cannot show that they are able to render it. Let these diocesan offices, if occasion offers, be attached to the Cathedral as supplementary elements. We have nothing to say adverse to this; what we protest against is their being treated as the primary object of the Cathedral system.

Let Cathedral life once come to be thought a primary and sufficient occupation for a hard-working man, and improvement amply justifying their undisturbed continuance will follow. If any changes are to be made by law, they ought to be of two kinds. Deans and Canons should be as strictly bound as other people to residence in the place where their proper work lies. Except on the notion of a canonry being a sort of decoration and not a real work, what reason can possibly be given for the system which prevails so widely, of the one Canon, turn and turn about, in residence? And next, power, and with it responsibility, should be concentrated in their hands. The various anomalous and independent bodies which are found in many Cathedrals, able and sometimes willing to thwart improvement, must in time disappear, if the Cathedral system is ever to be worked with vigour. But, after all, even under the inherited disadvantages from which it still suffers, a great deal may be done, much more than is often supposed either by critics or apologists, with the system as it stands. What is at the root of the whole matter is that men should be selected for these places who are qualified for them. Let them be appointed as men are appointed to high and important posts in the public service; not merely deserving men, or men who have in their day worked hard, but men who have proved what they are worth, and are still able to do serious, and it may be difficult, work. Make Cathedral work real work, as varied as is compatible with the idea of the institution itself, and choose good men to do it; and there is no portion of our English Church system which may be more important or more useful.

THE SCOTCH EDUCATION BILL.

THE preparation of a Scotch Education Bill is in many respects an easier matter than the preparation of a similar measure for England. Scotland has had for centuries what England has had for a year and a-half—a system of public elementary schools. In every borough there has been a borough school, in every parish there has been a parish school, maintained out of public rates. Down to 1861 these schools belonged to the Established Church—not in the sense in which Denominational schools in England belong to the denomination which originates and in part supports them, but in the sense in which grammar schools belonged to the Church of England, before the passing of the Endowed Schools Act. They have come down from a time when Scotland recognized no religion save the Presbyterian, and barely tolerated any other. So far, therefore, the framers of a Scotch Education Bill have had a clear course before them. They have not had to consider whether School Boards shall be universally appointed, for the existence in every borough and parish of public elementary schools maintained by the community settles this point for them. In England the ground has hitherto been occupied solely by voluntary schools, and the question Mr. FORSTER had to consider was whether to reoccupy it in every case with School Board schools, or to content himself with appropriating positions which had been left unoccupied altogether. The LORD ADVOCATE found schools answering to the School Board schools created under the English Act existing everywhere, and all he had to do was to make additional provisions for their management. The chief of these provisions are the election of a School Board in every parish and borough by the owners and occupiers of real property, the vesting in their hands of all the existing parish or borough schools, and the supply of sufficient school accommodation in a manner substantially identical with the corresponding provisions of the English Act.

Seven clauses appear in the Scotch Bill which have no counterpart in the Act of 1870. Last year the power given by the latter measure to School Boards to make by-laws for enforcing the attendance of children at school was transferred to the Scotch Bill. But during the interval public opinion has made a great advance on the subject of compulsion, and the LORD ADVOCATE now feels himself strong enough to impose the duty of ensuring school attendance upon School Boards, instead of giving them the option of imposing it upon themselves. The 67th Clause of the Bill makes it the duty of every parent to provide elementary education for his children, and, if unable from poverty to pay the school fee, to apply to the School Board to provide it. The 68th Clause makes it the duty of every School Board to appoint an officer to ascertain what parents resident within their jurisdiction have failed to provide elementary education for their children, and to keep the Board constantly informed of their names. Defaulting parents are to be summoned before the Board, and in the event of their being unable to produce any reasonable excuse for their neglect, a certificate that they have grossly failed in their duty towards their children will be sent to the Procurator Fiscal, who is thereupon to prosecute them before the Sheriff. By the 70th Clause employers of children under thirteen, on receiving notice from the School Board that a child has not received elementary education, will be held to undertake the duty of a parent and will be liable to the same penalties. Mr. FORSTER stated on Thursday that in England by-laws for compulsory attendance have already been passed by 118 School Boards, having within their districts a population of about 8,000,000, or more than one-third of the whole population of the kingdom. So satisfactory a result of this goes far to prove that an extension of the compulsory principle would meet with much less local opposition than has been feared; and another year's experience, fortified by the example of Scotland, ought to make it possible to supply this obvious, though at the time unavoidable, deficiency in the legislation of 1870.

What may be called the political interest of the Scotch Education Bill centres round its dealing with the religious difficulty. The Government had to make their choice as regards the parish and borough schools, between enjoining the teaching of religion, prohibiting the teaching of religion, and leaving the local authorities to exercise their own discretion in the matter, either with or without limitation. Of these four alternatives, the first was excluded beforehand. No Government could now propose to make the teaching of religion obligatory in schools maintained by the community. The second, the prohibition of the teaching of religion except by voluntary agency and after school hours, is virtually the Irish system. The third is the system established in School Board schools in England, where any religion that the Board pleases may be taught, but not through the natural and convenient medium of accepted formularies. The fourth is the system proposed to be introduced in England by the first draft of the Act of 1870. Whatever may be the abstract arguments in favour of the secular system as it exists in Ireland, its application in any particular case can only be defended on the ground that it is desired by the majority of the population, or that, being already in existence, it is working too well to make a change expedient, or that no other system is possible under the special circumstances of the country. It cannot be said that any one of these conditions is fulfilled in Scotland. The system already in being is a system in which the teaching of religion is practically enjoined in the parish and borough schools, and though the continuance of this system is impossible, it has apparently become so by the general diffusion of the doctrine of religious equality rather than by any active distaste for it on the part of the Scotch themselves. "At present," says the LORD ADVOCATE, "a system which prohibits the teaching of religion in schools would be so distasteful to the people of Scotland that it would be very partially received or acted upon." The LORD ADVOCATE may of course be mistaken in this estimate of Scotch feeling, but the "solidarity" that exists between the Scotch members upon all purely national questions renders this highly improbable. Mr. McLAREN would like to see the provision of the English Act adopted, and the teaching of Denominational formularies forbidden in parish and borough schools. But the failure of this compromise in England has been too complete and conspicuous to make it possible for the Government to propose its reproduction in Scotland. The Dissenters, to please whom it was resorted to, have declined to see any attractions in it. There may have been some among them who thought when the proposal was made in the House of Commons that, in excluding the Church Catechism, they had virtually excluded Church teaching. If so, they have grown wiser since, for the liberty accorded by the Education Act to teach Denominational religion in School Board schools now always makes one of the charges brought against Mr. FORSTER. How such a provision could ever have met with even a partial acceptance is extraordinary, considering that the teaching given in most pulpits is strictly Denominational, while at the same time it scarcely ever makes use of a Denominational formulary. It would be in all respects as rational to prohibit the use of EUCLID'S Elements in schools as a concession to a class of persons who objected to the teaching of geometry. Some inconvenience might be caused to the master by being deprived of a text-book he was accustomed to, but if he were competent to teach geometry at all, he would be equally able to teach it with or without such assistance.

The Government considered themselves brought, therefore, by an exhaustive process to the fourth alternative, the leaving the local authorities free to use their own discretion in the matter of teaching religion, unfettered by any restriction beyond that contained in a time-table conscience clause. This permission does not go far enough for some of the more enthusiastic Scotch members. Mr. GORDON called upon Parliament to "manfully" declare what it thought necessary for the religious instruction "of the children," and thus relieve the local Boards from "distressing conflicts." It is not easy to understand what it is that Mr. GORDON wants Parliament to do. Is it to say what particular form of religion it thinks true? In that case Presbyterianism would probably be excluded from many town schools by a majority made up of English Churchmen and Irish Roman Catholics. Is it to say that the established religion of Scotland shall be taught at the public expense in every Scotch school? This would be reasonable enough if the established religion of Scotland were also the religion of the whole Scotch people. So far as it is so, it will be the religion taught under this Bill; but there can be no reason why a Legislature, consisting mainly of members of other religions, should insist upon the established religion being taught in a school the majority of the ratepayers who support it, and of the parents who send their children to it, belong to a different creed, and perhaps wish a different creed to be taught in the school. As the Lord Advocate said, it is strange to be accused of violating the religious feelings of the people in the matter of religious instruction by proposing to leave that matter to be settled by the people themselves. Such an accusation can only come from persons who are afraid that, if the question is thus turned over to the people, it will in some cases be settled in a way they will not like.

Mr. Dixon's objection is more specious. Education, he says, is an Imperial, not a local, question—by which he must be understood to mean that the teaching of religion out of funds contributed in ever so small a proportion by persons not of the same religion is a violation of principle, and, as such, not permissible in one part of the Empire more than another. Mr. Dixon's conclusion is perfectly valid if you do but admit his premises. But those who have no conscientious objection to the religion of the local majority being taught in the local school will not consent to regard the question as one of principle. And if it is once admitted to be a question of detail, there is none which is more fittingly left to the decision of great aggregates of people, such as the inhabitants of England or Scotland or Ireland, with the single condition that it shall be so guarded as not to be used by way of oppression against the private efforts of special communities. Mr. Dixon holds up the Irish difficulty as a reason for not establishing the precedent of allowing each country to have its own system of education. The answer to this is that, if any limitation is set to this liberty as regards Ireland, it will be set, not out of deference to an imaginary general principle, but from regard to the interests of the Irish people themselves.

PARKS AND CHURCHYARDS.

WE are indebted to Mr. HARCOURT for the discovery of a serious conspiracy against the liberties of Englishmen. Having exhausted one panic of invasion, he has been good enough to start another. The dangers which menace the country must, we are assured, be sought within, and not without; the blow is struck, not from across the Channel, but by a traitor in our midst. Magna Charta is in peril, Lord Russell has been telegraphed for, and Mr. AYRTON has been, or ought to be, immured in the deepest dungeons of the Tower. Lord SUMMERTON'S Six Acts and the General Warrants of another period of our history will compare favourably, in Mr. HARCOURT'S opinion, with the Bill for keeping order in the Parks which has just been introduced by the Chief Commissioner. The birthright of the roughs is threatened. It is bad enough that the minions of the law should parade the public streets, insulting the independence of the people by their conspicuous uniforms and invidious authority. But at least it has hitherto been possible for citizens whose high spirit and sensitive honour were outraged by this offensive exhibition to withdraw into the Parks, and, with the playful freemasonry of their order, take a sight at the policemen through the railings. It is true that even these sanctuaries are infested with park-keepers, but, though usually stalwart and formidable in appearance, they are mild in manner, indolent in movement, and destitute of legal authority to check disorder. Mr. HARCOURT'S friends are quite aware that the by-laws posted up at the gates by the Ranger are little better than a brutum fulmen, and that his bark is worse than his bite. It is also true, however, that Hyde Park has for several years been placed under the charge of the police, but this will probably be regarded as an additional reason why a stubborn resistance should be offered to any further invasion of the rights of obscene and riotous blackguards. If Mr. AYRTON'S Bill becomes law, nobody will in future be allowed to trample down flower-beds or shrubberies, pull the flowers, tear off branches, or injure any building, structure, seat, railing, or other property in a Park. It will be an offence to commit any act in violation of public decency, or to use profane, indecent, or obscene language; and, as if this were not enough, the roughs are to be debarred from their favourite amusement of interfering with or annoying other people. This is an indication of the spirit of "Algerine despotism" in which this measure has been framed that even the small indulgence of carrying or ill-treating animals in the Park is peremptorily forbidden. And this is our boasted English freedom! Mr. HARCOURT, who is a distinguished lawyer, asserts that such a measure as this has never before been laid on the table of an English Parliament, and that it is an attack without precedent on the liberties of the subject. Most people will be disposed to think that, if it is a measure without precedent, it is high time the precedent should be established. Mr. HARCOURT was defeated on a division, but he has given notice of a resolution for the next stage of the Bill, the gist of which may be expressed in a familiar formula—that the power of the police has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished.

It is scarcely necessary to offer any serious criticism of Mr. HARCOURT'S rapid and mischievous sleight-of-hand. Some of the phrases which he used show that he has been reading up O'CONNELL, and that he is not above borrowing the epithet of an agitator who was at least original in his squint. The object of the measure which he denounced in such an extravagant and melodramatic manner is simply to adapt the law to altered circumstances, and to place public recreation-grounds, which happen to be nominally in possession of the Crown, on the same footing as other Parks and gardens belonging to municipal bodies throughout the country. The Royal Parks are in law the private property of the Crown, and those who are placed in charge of them have no power to deal with people who misconduct themselves, except that of a private owner. The consequence is, as Mr. AYRTON has explained, that there are practically no means of enforcing order and decency in these enclosures. The park-keepers are not constables, and their authority is of a very limited character. Mr. HARCOURT did not attempt to suggest any reasons why greater license should be allowed to disorder and ruffianism in the Royal Parks than elsewhere. If the Parks were municipal, instead of Crown, property, there would be no difficulty in placing them under proper regulations. It is as absurd to talk of the freedom of anarchy as of the order of chaos. The liberties of the subject necessarily imply the protection of the subject in the reasonable enjoyment of them. The object of the Bill is, in the words of the preamble, to protect public property, and to secure the public from molestation and annoyance while using the Parks and gardens provided for their benefit. It is in fact simply an endeavour to carry out the essentially democratic principle of the greatest happiness of the greatest number. Mr. HARCOURT professes to be an admirer of French equality, but it is certain that he never saw in any public garden in France the loathsome and disorderly crew who may any afternoon be seen disporting themselves like Yahoos in St. James's Park. We agree with Mr. HARCOURT that it will not do to legislate in such a way as to make the Parks an exclusive preserve for one class of society. They are intended for the enjoyment of the whole community on equal terms; and it is in order to remove any doubt on this point that legislation is necessary. The gambols of the roughs, and the Sunday meetings of the demagogues, are an infringement on the rights of quiet, respectable people who desire to enjoy the Parks in their own way. It is unfortunate that successive Governments, by their imbecility and vacillation, should have allowed the question of meetings in the Parks to remain in so unsatisfactory a position. Hitherto these gatherings have been held only by one political party, or section of a party, and Mr. AYRTON candidly acknowledges that he has no desire personally to prevent meetings being called to denounce his political opponents; but if there were any desire to retaliate, rioting would probably be the consequence. The objection to Clause 2, by which it is proposed to enact that "no person shall deliver, or invite any person to deliver, any public address in a Park, except in accordance with the rules of the Park," is that it tacitly admits a right which has never yet been recognised. By the rules of the various municipal and people's Parks at Finsbury, Southwark, Birmingham, Barnsley, Halifax, and elsewhere, all political meetings are forbidden.

The Burials Bill, which has been again brought forward by Mr. O. MORRIS, opens up a kindred question as to the propriety of throwing open the burial-grounds of the Church of England for any kind of service or performance which may be technically described as religious. Mr. MORRIS asserts that it is an "utterly untenable assumption" that Dissenters could take advantage of a funeral service to deliver political addresses. After the recent exhibition of political bitterness and animosity at the Nonconformist Conference, the assumption is not perhaps quite so untenable as we are asked to believe. Besides, it must be remembered that Dissenters are not only entitled, but that it includes the Free-thought Republicans who blaspheme and sedition against the Church of England, and who are advertised at Greenwich. Reading these newspapers like other people, and when they are asked to know what kind of service is wanted for their graves, the Churchmen, who have a solemn charge in a solemn way at Walworth, and who dance and jump in the reading of the Bible, would also, under this Bill, be entitled to go through their revolting antics among the tombstones of the churchyard.

Mr. Moser suggested that if society were given that there should be nothing objectionable or calculated to outrage the convictions of religious sects generally in the service at the grave, a compromise might be arrived at; but it is obvious that, as the Bill stands, Jaspers, Howlers, Positivists, Free-thought Republicans, Free-love Hitters, Shakers, and Socialists would have full liberty to celebrate their peculiar rites, and to indulge in any extravagances which might be suggested by fanaticism or malice. The Burial Service of the Church of England would appear to answer Mr. Moser's description, and if it were allowed either to be read or to be dispensed with at the choice of those in charge of the funeral, any other service being performed elsewhere, no practical grievance would arise. It is impossible not to suspect that the proposal embodied in Mr. Moser's Bill is only the thin end of a dangerous wedge. The delivery of sermons and political addresses in the churchyard would be followed by a demand for the freedom of the stump in the Church itself. The "rainy day" argument would be insidiously pressed, and there would be loud complaints of the inhumanity of any clergyman who refused the use of his church to a party of drenched and dripping mourners. It is significant that the Nonconformists at Manchester claimed to be placed on the same footing as Churchmen with regard both to marriages and burials; apparently implying that the churches of the Establishment must be thrown open as well as the churchyards. It is of course impossible that the Church of England should consent to occupy the humiliating and intolerable position of being the only denomination which had no churches or churchyards of its own.

THE COMING COMET.

NERVOUS people, as it is credibly stated, have been put to great anxiety by the announcement which recently appeared in the papers, that a distinguished astronomer had discovered a monstrous comet rushing straight towards us with amazing rapidity from the remote abysses of space, and yet pursuing its course with as little tendency to deviation as though it were running upon rails. Some friendly planet might by possibility put forth a helping hand, and twist the approaching monster from its course, as the hero of a novel diverts the runaway steed just as it is about to crush the heroine. Good-natured astronomers have taken pains to explain that there is no such comet coming, that, if it were coming, it would be a very welcome visitor; and that we have already passed through a comet and found it less obnoxious than a London fog. The astronomers mean well, but they are terribly prosaic people. They ought surely to understand that they are robbing us of a lively pleasure. Have they not in their boyhood, for even astronomers have been boys, snatched a fearful joy from the ghosts and other supernatural dangers with which a childish imagination loves to people the dim borders of its little world? Would anybody willingly give up that delicious feeling of superstitious awe which was at once the charm and terror of his early years, and have all phantoms suppressed till the world should be no more haunted than a railroad station? Astronomers have already taken terrible liberties with the comet of our childhood. The huge fiery monster plunging through the sky with a death-dealing tail has been weighed and measured, and had, as it were, a mathematical hook put in his jaws, till his impressiveness has departed from him. We know the legend of Cuvier's descent into the infernal regions, and of his declaration that the horns and hoofs which terrified our infancy were unmistakable proofs of a gaminivorous nature. Even so the comet has been lowered in popular estimation till our skies have become as empty of horrors as Hyde Park of tigers. Sir W. Thomson indeed was kind enough last autumn to revive some of our ancient alarms, and to assure us that some time or other the world would be smashed to atoms like a bursting shell, by a fate as inexorable as that which will bring about a collision at a metropolitan junction. Of course his fellow-philosophers found fault with some of his details, for science is a remorseless enemy to poetry.

Let us, however, for a brief period "dally with false alarms," and endeavour to return to the simple faith of a child. Let us imagine that the astronomer has really prophesied our approaching fate, and that the prophecy is correct. Within a few weeks we shall be able without the help of telescopes to see the little cloud, no bigger than a man's hand, and streaked with comets more dazzling than have ever before dazzled the human race. It will grow slowly at first, but afterwards with a rate of increase almost painful to our naked vision, till at last the whole sky will be lit up with the fiery orb. Night by night we shall watch its terrible growth, and before long it will be brilliant enough to outshine the sun itself. Then the darkness will rise to be first troubled, and then heated, then scorched, as it is entered in the hottest heat of a Turkish bath. But the time is short which we shall be conscious of as we are scorched and heated. The two large bodies, plunging towards each other, will be compared with which the speed of a comet is almost nothing. It will crash into each other with a violence which will be placed between two such antagonists, we shall not have time even for an exclamation. The petty annoyances of life, the little vexatiousness of the world, the little annoyances of the world, the little annoyances of the world, will be instantaneously dismissed from existence. On the other side of the world we shall perhaps have just one flash of sensation. We shall see the mountains, without any metaphors, slipping like snow, and be ourselves sent spinning into space just as the dust—to indulge in a humble simile—is knocked off the under side of a carpet by the blows upon its upper surface. For an instant we shall have a glimpse of the broken fragments of the earth starting off, each on its new career, to whirl through the universe, each bearing with it—so we shall remember on the faith of a President of the British Association—some minute germs to be planted, if they have good luck, on some distant planet, and there to begin over again that endless process of evolution which will have come to so summary a conclusion here. Or, if we please, we may contemplate another alternative, and suppose that we just miss the nucleus of the comet, but are wrapped in his fiery tail, which will turn oceans into steam, dissipate the eternal ice of the poles, and singe the world into the likeness of an American prairie after a fire. Nothing will be left but a vast surface of gray ashes, gradually to be converted into mud as the waters again condense and descend upon the depopulated planet. Alas! we cannot claim the eloquence which would be necessary to do justice to such tremendous catastrophes. Milton writing under the superintendence of Dr. Cumming might possibly be equal to the task of describing the complete and instantaneous ruin of a world; but nature is not prodigal; she only gives one such mind at a time.

We have ventured to suggest the bare outlines of a purely imaginary picture which our readers must fill up for themselves. It is rather curious to inquire what would be the state of our minds if such a catastrophe could really be predicted on scientific grounds, and we were really to believe the man of science. It is necessary to notice this last condition, for it is highly probable that we should resolutely decline to believe anything so unpleasant. There are limits to one's faith even in mathematics, and we should insist upon our prophets prophesying smooth things, even if they had to twist a few laws of nature for the purpose. But let us imagine that this difficulty is surmounted. If we were all really convinced that at 4 o'clock P.M., Greenwich time, on the next 12th of August, the whole human race and its dwelling-place would be summarily knocked to atoms, what would be the effect on our minds? The most natural supposition is perhaps that the whole course of affairs would be thrown out of gear, and that we should be reduced to the state of a city demoralized by a plague. Persons of strong religious feeling would either go into retirement, or would endeavour to awaken the consciences of the sinners around them; whilst the sinners would become utterly reckless, and would remember that there was no use in keeping a cellar of wine to be consumed by a comet. Some such tendency would, of course, be manifest; but the question remains, how far it would be overpowered by the opposite tendency to be carried on by simple inertia in our old grooves. After a little time one would become more or less accustomed to the prospect. One would feel that, if it was not worth while to undertake anything new, neither was it worth while to give up the old employments which have become necessary parts of our existence. There are innumerable stories such as that of the man who insisted on taking his accustomed pill an hour before he was hanged; and if we were all under sentence of execution—as, indeed, sermons are apt to remind us that we are, even without the intervention of a comet—it is perhaps reasonable to suppose that we should act in the same spirit. The great bulk of mankind would say, It's all very well; we shall not want anything more after the 12th of August; but that is no reason why we should not have our regular meals and enjoy our newspapers at breakfast. It does not appear inconceivable that the Tichborne case would drag its slow length along though it were perfectly clear that in a few months the estates would be flying in fragments, some towards Sirius and others to the Pole Star; that nobody's title, however perfect, would be of much value when the lands in question were situated in different comets as well as counties; and that a writ of ejectment had been served upon all parties with an emphasis which there was no resisting. We suspect that cargoes of preserved meat would be exported from Australia, though it was certain that the sea would be dried up long before they could make even the most rapid passage. The daily papers would continue to appear, and indeed would be driving a roaring trade; everybody would be anxious to have the latest intelligence as to the comet, the details as to its structure revealed by the spectroscopes, and the result of the last calculations as to the exact moment of collision. Editors would be provided with that invaluable boon—a topic, the interest of which would be steadily increasing to the end of the world; and, though they would doubtless receive letters up to the last from correspondents anxious to explain the causes of the dulness of sermons, the decline in the trustworthiness of servants, and the unkindness with which excursion trains were managed, they would be more independent of those interminable, though now fortunately to be terminated, controversies. And when we reflect on the immovable eloquence and the strong sense of duty of the British journalist, there is nothing of which we feel more confident than that the morning of the 12th of August would be signalled by the appearance of an article in the highest style of the London Telegraph, summing up the history of the world in a few glowing paragraphs, and congratulating mankind on the fact that the catastrophe would at any rate be contemporaneous with that of themselves and of William Ewart Gladstone. Fresh editions would be published up to the latest possible moment, and we should be encouraged to hope that the germs flying off to other worlds on the fragments of our own carried with them a potential Telegraph. The persons for whom we should feel the deepest sympathy would be the prophets, as it would be so very annoying a reflection to Dr. Cumming that, if it had not been for this ill-regulated comet, the Battle of Armageddon would have taken place next year, and the accuracy of his prognostications have been signally verified.

We are, it may be, assuming a little too much. There are certainly some things in which a change would be perceptible. There would be no betting, for example, on next year's Derby, and the funds could not be influenced by rumours of approaching wars. The spirit of gambling would have to take a different shape, and roulette or rouge et noir would gain a sudden popularity in place of speculation on more distant events. But in one form or other, in spite of the emotions of the more excitable sort of people, we fancy that the machinery of life, from its greatest down to its pettiest operations, would have to go on working up to the very eve of the catastrophe, from the sheer incapacity of most persons to break off their accustomed habits. We have not considered the case of a partial crash; nor do we much care to ask what our feelings would be if America or Ireland or China were suddenly swept out of existence, or still less what we should feel if we knew that it was an even chance whether the ball would fall upon them or upon us. That reflection opens a boundless field of speculation; and we will only express our conviction that a good many people would still enjoy their dinners, and even feel it as a not unpleasant excitement, if a whole hemisphere were crushed to-morrow, so long as it was not their hemisphere. But whether we are to consider this as a melancholy proof of our deficient sympathies, or as a merciful arrangement to save us from unnecessary pain, is a problem which we cannot discuss.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF LORD MAYO.

WHEN Lord Mayo, at a crisis in the fortunes of the Conservative Ministry, was selected for the Viceroyalty of India, the announcement was received by the public with surprise, if not with absolute incredulity. It is natural that at this moment the public estimate of his administration should be coloured by the painful feelings excited by the news of his assassination. But we do not fear to incur the charge of exaggeration when we say that, by the death of the Viceroy, the Ministry, the public services, and the native community have lost a statesman who had shown himself singularly fitted for his post; who had evinced great skill and tact in the art of governing aliens; who had by his own personal example maintained and increased the discipline, honour, and integrity prevalent amongst the civil and military servants of the Crown; who in the space of three years had inspected the most celebrated marts, the most important frontier posts, and the most civilized and the wildest districts of our great dependency; and who, having done much to further and consolidate the many practical schemes left unfinished by his predecessor, had given fair promise of leaving his own mark on the country in the two years which yet remained to him of office, and of bequeathing to it some legacies peculiarly his own. We have elsewhere discussed the recent terrible event in its political aspect. We shall here consider the principal measures of the administration which has been so prematurely cut short.

When Lord Mayo, after visiting the minor Presidencies, assumed charge of the Supreme Government, on the 12th of January, 1869, he found that three great controversies analogous to those which arose out of the land tenure in Ireland had been happily terminated. He at once saw that the settlement of these vexed and perplexing questions ought not to be disturbed, and that he would have time for those branches of administration to which he could contribute something of enlarged statesmanship, or even of practical knowledge. And, from the very first, he announced his intention of undertaking the department of Public Works, and of controlling and guiding financial experiments, whether of expenditure or taxation, in addition to the work of the Foreign Office, which has always been the peculiar province of the Viceroy. In the latter department Lord Mayo found matters ripe for an interview with Shere Ali, the ruler of Cabul, who, after a series of romantic adventures, had regained possession of the throne of his father. Thoroughly imbued with Lord Lawrence's sound doctrines with regard to Afghan politics, Lord Mayo arranged the first of his grand ceremonial displays, for the benefit of the Amir, at the large military station of Umballa. Nothing was wanting that could impress the foreigner with a sense of the vast resources of the British Power, or with a feeling of reliance on the sincerity and good faith of its representative. A man of war from his youth, the Amir witnessed with delight the evolutions of disciplined troops, and the scientific practice of artillery directed by the best officers of the Indian army; needy and impoverished, he received splendid gifts, ample munitions of war, and large sums of ready money; lately a fugitive and a pretender, his title was publicly proclaimed; the brother of one who had slain our envoy and annihilated our forces, he saw himself placed far above the native chiefs and princes of India, and treated on a footing of equality by the delegate of the British Queen. The precise forms and the results of the negotiation with the Amir, which was carried out in the intervals of Durbars, reviews, and fêtes, have never been made public. But we have warrant for asserting that the effects of the Umballa meeting have been to secure the Amir against vague fears of aggressive and ulterior objects on the part of the Government of India; to give us, on our frontier, one well disposed and friendly Power; to moderate the alarms felt in consequence of the undeniable advances of Russia in Central Asia; almost to prohibit, by moral example, sanguinary and cruel retributions in Cabul itself, and even to give promise of financial and social improvements amongst a high-spirited but fanatical and conservative nation. As a proximate consequence of the Umballa Durbar, the Viceroy turned his attention to the long-standing dispute between the Amir and the Shah of Persia relative to the boundaries of Seistan. Viewed by itself the controversy was not pressing. But as every quarrel between the Court of Teheran and a neighbouring Khah or Amir may afford a pretext to some European Power to interfere with advice and assistance, even the limit of a howling desert or a useless lake may assume an importance far beyond its intrinsic merits. To Lord Mayo's tact, sound judgment, conciliatory spirit in dealing with the Amir, and to his perseverance with the Home authorities, it is owing, not only that we have a friendly ruler at Cabul, but that we may hope, quietly but firmly, to put some stop to Persian encroachment and aggression. No one who has not studied a map of the dominions claimed and occupied by Persia within the last twenty-five years can form a correct idea of the art and astuteness with which pretensions have been put forth, one after another, to slices of territory belonging to Beloochee chieftains, or to convenient ports in the Indian Ocean. Lord Mayo also at a very early period became aware of the importance of maintaining our prestige in the Persian and Arabian waters. Since the abolition of the Indian navy in 1861-2, it had been found impossible to keep Her Majesty's vessels in the Persian Gulf for a large portion of the year. At length, after a great deal of argument and persuasion, the Admiralty was induced to sanction a plan by which a compact naval force, better suited to the climate and the locality, should be placed under the orders of the Viceroy for continuous service, and the Government of India agreed on its part to make a yearly contribution of some 70,000*l.* to the expenses of the fleet on the Chinese station.

Of the contest for the sovereignty of Muscat Lord Mayo was a vigilant observer. He continued to direct all the influence of the Government towards the suppression of the slave trade of Zanzibar; and taking advantage of an avowed relinquishment of the claims of the Dutch Government, he unostentatiously, but formally, took possession of the Nicobar Islands in the name of the Queen. The propriety of this proceeding will be appreciated by all those who admit that, whether we interfere in Continental matters or not, we must maintain our supremacy in the East, and that we cannot in common prudence allow even a friendly Power to occupy a vantage ground within three or four days' sail of the mouth of the Hooghly. Then, continuing to carry out his fixed plan of establishing what has been termed a fringe of independent, but well disposed, native Powers to the north of the Indian Peninsula, Lord Mayo lost no opportunity of strengthening the relations existing with the able and vigorous ruler of Nepal. The brother of Maharaja Jung Bahadur had been already received in Calcutta with some of the honours and exemptions only accorded to independent rulers. The Maharaja of Cashmere has been re-assured, as far as possible, against the apprehensions not unnaturally created by the loose and unguarded talk of subalterns and sportsmen, who openly discuss the propriety of annexing a tributary State with such delicious fruits, so fine a climate, and such lovely scenery; and it is fresh in all our recollections how Mr. Forsyth was directed to cross plains of blinding salt and passes some 17,000 feet high, in order to encourage trade with the energetic ruler of Yarkand. Of the internal policy of Lord Mayo in dealing with the princes and aristocracy of India Proper, we shall speak presently.

Next in importance to a clear and well-defined foreign policy, laid down and controlled by the Viceroy himself, is the conduct and regulation of the finances. Early in the year 1869 the Financial member of the Viceregal Council was compelled to absent himself from his duties in order to recruit his health in England. In his absence it was discovered that some of the calculations on which the year's Budget had been based were erroneous, and that, instead of a small surplus, there would be a startling deficit of one million and three-quarters. Lord Mayo spared no pains, and even sacrificed for a time all his popularity, to restore the balance and to make two ends meet. All the luxuries, as well as some of the necessities, of a beneficent Government were retrenched; the Income-tax was increased in the middle of the year; and the increase was only submitted to by the European native community in dependence on the exertions and personal character of the Governor-General. After a great deal of acrimonious discussion, charges, and counter-charges, after allegations of bad faith, of unnecessary economy on the one hand, and then of needless impositions on the other, an equilibrium was reached at the date of the Budget of 1871-2. It seems to us unquestionable that Lord Mayo's rigid inquiries, severe retrenchments, and additional taxation were amply justified by the results of a twelvemonth ago. But we fear that this commendation cannot be extended to the continuance of the Income-tax, at its present high rate, throughout the whole of the present financial year. However impressive it may be to command a surplus, to build roomy barracks, to plan State railroads, and to irrigate provinces in order to save them from famine and desolation, it is of the last importance not to annoy and excite the native population by fruitless endeavours to get at even an approximate average of their gains. We have little doubt that, had Lord Mayo lived, he would this year have devised some other and more politic mode of replenishing his Exchequer, and we gladly turn from what is perhaps the only vulnerable point in his rule to the consideration of other measures of decided originality and breadth.

One reform was what is termed the decentralization of finance. That the power of the purse, as well as of war, should reside with the Viceroy and his Council, seems to us as fundamental an axiom as ever. In Lord Mayo's own words, the Supreme Council must be able to provide for the defence of the country, for the efficiency of the services, and for the public credit. And it would be a grievous mistake to permit local Governments to raise loans on the security, express or implied, of the general revenues, to create new offices, or to increase the stipends allotted to old ones. At the time of this change we pointed out some of the dangers which might result from the ambition or the improvidence of a Governor who had committed his portion of the Empire to enterprises to complete which funds were not forthcoming, and which were useless or unproductive as long as they were incomplete. On the other hand, it is quite certain that forms of Indian taxation must be suited to castes and creeds varying in associations and manners. A capitation or house tax, perfectly well understood in British Burmah, would raise, and even has raised, a riot in Bareilly or Benares. An octroi in Umritsar, submitted to cheerfully by the shopkeepers and shawl-merchants, would, if attempted in Lower Bengal, result in a series of legal actions in the High Court. In the end, however, the partial decentralization of the finances was carried out on a principle which, as carefully fenced and limited, seems politic and sound. Public credit and general efficiency will be maintained by the Supreme Council. Local wants will be met, and local peculiarities will be treated with consideration, by the administrator who knows the province, and is responsible for his management of a half-educated or suspicious community.

Equally just and sound were the principles contended for by Lord Mayo, following closely in the steps of Lord Lawrence, regarding the imposition of an education cess in Bengal. All who have heard of Lord Cornwallis and his Permanent Settlement of the Land Revenue of Bengal are also probably aware that this excellent measure has been invariably used by the Bengalees and their advocates as a bar to any additional increase, burden, or imposition whatever. This contention, if admitted, would simply relieve one of the richest parts of India from all liability to contribute to the growing wants of the Empire, and would throw the burden on districts and races much less able to support it. In other words, the landholders of Lower Bengal, whose rents have increased enormously since their liabilities to the State were fixed for ever, would have exemptions in almost everything, because they had been specially favoured in one thing. The Secretary of State fortunately saw the drift of this argument in a clearer light than several members of his Council, endorsed the view taken by the Government of India, and authoritatively ruled that the landholders of the Gangetic Delta must bear their fair share of general and increased taxation, just as much as if they possessed nothing but fleets of rich merchandize, stately mansions in Calcutta, or rolls of five per cent. paper. The support given by the Duke of Argyll to the late Viceroy in this and other matters deserves recognition.

Not very remote from this subject was the creation of a special department of State for the interests of agriculture and commerce. In a country where mineral resources are yet undiscovered or undeveloped, agriculture is the main pursuit of the rural population. It was obvious that, although the Indian Ryot with a light plough, a pair of bullocks, and primitive means of irrigation, could produce much, the application of science and a successful example might enable him to produce more. And the Government, which in India is expected to take the lead in all improvements, will now have it in its power to establish model farms, to encourage the scientific rotation of crops, and to vary the valuable products of rich and fertile plains on some more enduring and continuous system than that of distributing prizes for fat beasts and huge sugar-canes at agricultural shows. So a sixth department was added to the Viceregal Secretariat, and was entrusted by Lord Mayo to Mr. A. O. Hume, who is a son of the veteran reformer so long member for Montrose, and who, not inferior to any of his contemporaries in vigour and independence, had somehow been left out in the cold shade, in spite of the distinction which he gained in the mutiny.

Great activity was displayed in the extension of railways. In the commencement of 1870 the whole line was opened from Bombay to Calcutta, and this was followed by the completion of a small unfinished section between Delhi and Lahore. The lines from Bombay and from Madras next met at a given point, and as the system of trunk lines, originally laid down by Lord Dalhousie, was then finished, Lord Mayo settled an important question regarding the breadth of the gauges, on account of which many projects had been held in abeyance. A line, small in extent, but commercially important, has been opened in the cotton districts; and more or less of progress has been made in the survey or the actual construction of railways for Rajpootana, for the Indus Valley, in Hyderabad, and on the line from Lahore to Peshawur. The decision in favour of the narrow gauge will effect a very considerable saving in the construction of lines the political, commercial, and social effects of which we can at present only dimly conceive. The Public Works were next overhauled. The higher posts in that department are always entrusted to engineers of the Indian services, who form a corps inferior to none in India for talent and acquirements in their particular lines. Nor were the civil engineers employed by the Government untrustworthy. But a great deal of the actual work of building and repairing must be entrusted to natives, or to subordinate Englishmen, bound by no feelings of professional honour. The distances were great. The control was imperfect; and the consequence was that malpractices in the subordinate grades were alternately the jest or the scorn of Indian journalists, and that buildings erected at a disproportionate cost by skilful designers, were less able to resist the inroads of the climate than the works of untrained amateurs. Lord Mayo took advantage of a grievous failure in the case of the barracks at Allahabad to apportion responsibility and to mete out punishment with decisive clearness and vigour.

The occasions on which Lord Mayo appeared to most advantage in the eyes of the native community were, we have been reminded, the levee, the reception-room, and the Darbar. It is said that the days of the paternal or patriarchal government of India are well nigh past. No doubt, in all the older and more settled provinces the Hindoos and Mohammedans are becoming aware of the degrees and distinctions of authority. They can distinguish between the will of a Commissioner and the decree of a Judge. A large number of them know that it is useless to ask a Viceroy or a Governor to interfere with a legal process, to compel the execution of a decree, or to settle a disputed boundary. But, though a perception of the difference between the power of judicial and executive agencies is gradually gaining ground in the Oriental mind, there is still ample scope for the influence of high position and the exercise of social qualities by a Viceroy. The native chiefs or princes are really settling down into their true position as loyal feudatories or tributaries of the Crown; and the visit of the Duke of Edinburgh two years ago, as well as the ceremonial displays of the Viceroy before and subsequent to the Duke's visit, have materially contributed to widen and deepen this feeling. Nothing could have been managed with more tact and delicacy than the presentation of the native aristocracy to the Duke. He was accompanied everywhere by well selected officials. His time was passed in visiting objects and institutions of interest, historical cities, picturesque camps. Every one was invited to look on the illustrious visitor, and yet no native was deluded into the belief that the Duke came to India to redress grievances or to supersede the Viceroy. It is no easy matter to conceive and to carry out such a programme without failure or contretemps, and to convert splendid, but ephemeral, pageants into sources of permanent loyalty and goodwill to the Throne. Oudh Talookdars, Sikh princes, even Maratta sovereigns, were all more or less charmed, dazzled, and fascinated by the dignity and condescension of the Viceroy. But the most timely and effective of his addresses was perhaps that delivered at Ajmere to the blue blood of Rajpootana. No Governor-General since the days of Lord William Bentinck had addressed the oldest Hindu chieftains on their own soil. And to go from legislative assemblies in which natives deliver speeches in English, from the commercial activity of Calcutta or Bombay, from the agricultural development of the Doab, to the sands and lakes of Rajpootana, is like going back at one step from the Georgian era to the Middle Ages. Princes fighting with unruly nobles regarding privileges of investiture and feudal homage; stalwart and handsome Rajas, with pedigrees of two thousand years old, expert riders, crack shots, and yet often wilfully ignorant of the commonest rudiments of administration; caves and fastnesses occupied by wild Bheels and hereditary cattle-lifters; torturing of witches and burying alive of lepers—these are some of the characteristics which make a Report on Rajpootana read like a chapter of Walter Scott. Nothing could be more judicious or forcible than the Viceroy's address to these haughty and sensitive chieftains, assuring them, as he did, of the full enjoyment of their lawful rights, but intimating that the Government expected in return something to indicate that sovereigns exist for the welfare of their people. It is remarkable that only two noted instances occurred in which the late Viceroy was compelled to exchange the language of courtesy or of encouragement for severity and censure. The Maharaja of Jodhpore, who was ill-advised enough to insult the Viceroy by refusing to appear at a Darbar on a paltry pretence of etiquette, was sharply reprimanded; and the Nawab of Jinjheera, a Mussulman who owns a principality lying south of Bombay, was deprived of the power of mismanaging his territories, after repeated but ineffectual warnings.

In the dispensation of patronage Lord Mayo evinced much penetration and discernment in selecting the best instruments. Sir Henry Durand, in spite of his many valuable qualities and attainments, was not always easy to manage. Lord Mayo acknowledged his merits as a councillor, and then sent him to govern the Punjab. When the State was deprived of his services by a fatal accident, Lord Mayo supplied the vacancy by Mr. R. H. Davies, from Oudh, who was bred in the school of Lord Lawrence, and who is thoroughly acquainted with a difficult and extensive frontier. To fill the Chief Commissionership of Oudh thus vacated, he selected General Barrow, a Madras officer of great knowledge of the province and high character; and when he was disqualified by temporary illness, the Viceroy confided Oudh to Sir G. Couper, who had served with distinction under Lord Dalhousie and Sir George Edmondstone, and who had been one of the illustrious garrison of Lucknow. To Colonel Malleson, a gentleman of marked culture and attainments and an accomplished writer, was assigned the difficult task of preparing the young Maharaja of Mysore for the duties of sovereignty, while the whole administration of that kingdom was confided to the experienced Colonel Mendo on the departure of Mr. Bowring. Two able civilians have been sent to Burmah, one as Judicial and the other as Chief Commissioner; Colonel Daly, once known as the chief of the Sikh Guide Corps, was nominated to the important agency for Central India; Mr. George Campbell, whose name is more familiar to Englishmen than that of many other Indian notables, was made Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal; and when the Secretaryship of the Foreign Department became vacant, Lord Mayo offered it to a young civilian of only fourteen years' standing, whom he had never seen in his life, and whom he knew only by reputation. In not one of these appointments could there be traced the slightest political bias, and all, we believe, were dictated by an exclusive regard for the best interests of the State, justified by the event in every single instance.

We cannot now write of the many kindly and generous traits of Lord Mayo's private character. It is sufficient to say that they were in keeping with his public merits. In the prompt despatch of current business, in careful consideration of weighty and intricate matters, in the exercise of vigour and firmness when demanded, in unselfish devotion to the welfare of India, he was all that a Viceroy should be. We can only hope that the statesman who may be selected to succeed him will, while displaying a similar capacity for rising at once to the level of his exalted position, meet his supporters and subordinates as anxious and able to serve him, the regard and even the affection of the community not purchased by any unworthy concessions, and a less tragic end.

THE THANKSGIVING CEREMONY.

IT is evident that a great deal of interest is taken in the approaching Thanksgiving for the recovery of the Prince of Wales; and everybody is naturally anxious that it should be a great success, that it should go off not only smoothly, but grandly, and leave behind it some recollections worthy of the occasion. As a popular demonstration, there can be no doubt that it will be everything that could be desired. There is always something highly impressive in the sight of a great multitude under the influence of a common sentiment or emotion, and the crowds which on Tuesday week will line the way to St. Paul's will, in any case, be the best part of the show. There will probably not be the same tumultuous excitement as when Garibaldi appeared at Nine Elms eight years ago, or when the Princess Alexandra passed through the City on her first arrival in this country. The circumstances of the day are of a different character. A Thanksgiving suggests solemn thoughts which will no doubt have their effect on the demeanour of the people; but the enthusiasm will not be less genuine or intense for being expressed in a comparatively quiet and subdued manner. The meeting between the Queen and the people will of course be the principal feature of the occasion; and if she were merely to drive in the simplest possible way through the long lane of loyal and sympathetic subjects massed on each side, that in itself would be a great sight. It does not follow, however, that all accessories should be neglected. There is no reason why an attempt should not be made to render the spectacle as brilliant and picturesque as possible. If there is any good in such things, it must be in the way of producing a vivid impression on the public mind; and it is desirable that everything should be done to stimulate the imagination, and to make the scene striking and suggestive. Perhaps the first thought that will occur to many persons is, how much better an affair of this kind would be managed in France, or even in Germany. Of course it would there become a great military spectacle. There would be an immense parade of troops, but the ecclesiastical part of the display would also be very effective, the people who had to wear robes or other dresses would look as if they rather liked it, and the decoration of the streets would be carried out in a uniform and systematic manner. Voluntary effort is no doubt a fine thing in its way, but it is apt to produce awkwardly discordant results when applied to the composite execution of a work of art. The enterprising shopkeepers who are now getting ready their bunting and paper flowers and heraldic emblems are quite capable of comprehending the absurdity of a number of people sitting down to play an overture, every man choosing his own instrument and tune. But they are themselves doing something which is quite as absurd and outrageous, in attempting to decorate Fleet Street and the Strand each in his own way and after his own peculiar taste. It would be much better if they would put their subscriptions or contributions in kind into a common stock, and submit to carry out the directions of a competent authority. They would find that unity of design, especially on such a large scale, would produce magnificent results at a comparatively small cost. The City Architect appears to have obtained some kind of control over the arrangements in Fleet Street and Ludgate Hill, but the disorder of unconditional freedom appears to reign to the west of Temple Bar.

It has been suggested as a joke that the decorations of the route along which the Queen is to pass should be entrusted to Mr. Beverly, the scene-painter, who would have no difficulty in transforming the dingiest streets, or even the muddy desert of the Thames Embankment, into Bowers of Bliss and Palaces of the Sun. But, in earnest, the idea is not a bad one. Of course we do not want our familiar thoroughfare converted into fairyland, but the eye of a practised artist like Mr. Beverly would discover at a glance great opportunities for simple and appropriate decoration. During an Imperial progress in France the authorities used to think nothing of running up a few impromptu streets and noble edifices of lath and canvas. If the Metropolitan Board would take the matter in hand, they might give us some idea of the architecture of the future along the Thames Embankment. It may be presumed that the ugly boarding which now encloses the excavations of the Law Courts will be pleasantly disguised; but perhaps it has not yet occurred to Mr. Ayrton that this would be a favourable opportunity for taking the verdict of the public on a scenic reproduction of Mr. Street's designs. We are quite sure that Mr. Beverly would avoid the mistake into which the City Architect seems to have fallen with regard to Temple Bar. This venerable structure is, in the first place, to be scrubbed clean, which no one who has observed the thickly encrusted mud and filth which now disgraces it will object to, although it is natural to inquire why it should not be kept decently clean at all times. But when this has been done, the Bar is to be daubed over with gold and colours, and draped in curtains, which will be apt to give it the appearance of a glorified four-post bedstead in which the Corporation is in the habit of taking a nap on State occasions. It would surely be in better taste to preserve the original character of the monument instead of travestying it in this fashion. The triumphal arch at the bottom of Ludgate Hill will at least help to hide the hideous bridge of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway, and we are glad to see that the Directors of that Company, entering into the spirit of the day, have promised to take down their impudent advertisements for this occasion only. When they get leave to construct this bridge, it was on the understanding that it should be of an ornamental character, and as the City keeps an architect, it is a pity he is not set to look after the Railway Company, and compel it to fulfil its promises. It may be assumed that the Dean and Chapter will take care that St. Paul's is not disfigured by temporary decorations. The main object to be kept in view should be to provide accommodation for the audience, with the least possible interference with the design of the edifice. The Lord Chamberlain is said to be overwhelmed with applications for admission; but perhaps a highly suggestive letter in the Times has afforded him some relief. The writer has pointed out that when the many tiers of woodwork are in their places, the interior of the building may be likened to a vast furnace ready to be lit. It would only require an accidental spark and a few lighted shavings, favoured by the strong currents of air always present in the building, to produce a tremendous conflagration. It is impossible to suspect Lord Sidney of composing this letter; but he should be very much obliged to the writer. The warning, however, is one which ought not to be overlooked.

The ceremony on Thanksgiving Day will consist of two parts—the procession to, and the service in, St. Paul's. The latter is in good hands, and will no doubt be satisfactorily arranged. As the Queen is to go in semi-state, the ladies will be able to appear in morning dress; while the men will wear such robes, uniforms, or Court suits as they may be entitled to assume. There will thus be sufficient diversity and richness of colour in the area of the building to light up the whole without the addition of any other decorations. It must be a relief to the company to know that no opera-glasses are to be allowed in the upper galleries, but it will be difficult to enforce the order, and perhaps the most prudent course would be to close the galleries altogether. A view from such a height, especially without a glass, would be painfully tantalizing to the unfortunate people who had been tempted to climb so high to see so little, and if anything fell over it would be very dangerous for those below. The procession through the streets is naturally the chief object of interest to the general public, who will have no chance of seeing anything else. It would be repugnant to English sentiment to make it a military display. The route will be kept by soldiers, and the Royal carriages will have an escort of cavalry. When George III. and Queen Charlotte went to St. Paul's in 1789, they were attended by "the gentlemen of the London Association, the Artillery Company, and a party of Toxophilites, or Society of Ancient Archers, dressed in green, with bows and quivers of arrows." We are afraid the Toxophilites have vanished, and that the Foresters of our own day could hardly be invited to join the procession. But there is no reason why the Artillery Company and the Volunteers should not turn out. The Lords and Commons are to be present in St. Paul's, but they are not to go there in a body, according to ancient precedent. The Lord Mayor is more faithful in his adherence to old customs. It has been determined that his Lordship, with the Sheriff, four Aldermen, and eight Common Councilmen, all mounted on horseback, shall receive the Queen at Temple Bar, presenting her with the golden keys and the City sword, and escorting her to the Cathedral. Nothing could be more heroic and self-sacrificing than this resolution of the Fathers of the City to witch the world with noble horsemanship, but we hope that they will take care to accustom their steeds to the flatter of their robes by frequent rehearsals. A stampede of aldermen on horseback would be appalling. In 1780 the Lord Mayor wore "a large cloak of purple velvet that covered both his lordship and his steed, which he managed with great skill and dexterity." It comes out, however, in another paragraph, that it was a led horse, on which he rode bareheaded, with the sword in his hand. Fifteen gentlemen in gowns, with their horses in the custody of policemen would, we fear, not contribute to the dignity of the occasion. It has been arranged that the Queen shall go by Trafalgar Square and the Strand to the City and return by the Thames Embankment, but the latter part of the programme has excited strong and almost universal dissatisfaction. The Thanksgiving Day is intended to be a day of general rejoicing, and the larger the number of shopkeepers who are enabled to pay their rent for the year by letting out their windows for an hour or two, the more complete will be the rejoicing. From this point of view Oxford Street is clearly the preferable route, and it would also be more agreeable in many ways for the general public. The proximity of the Embankment to the river renders it dangerous for a swaying crowd, and it will also be difficult to protect it sufficiently from the roughs. If the decision to use the Embankment is persisted in, the authorities must be prepared for disastrous accidents. The experience of the Princess Alexandra's procession will, we trust, not be forgotten in making the police arrangements for the day. The two things to be chiefly guarded against are the pressure of separate masses of people down different streets converging on one central point, and the rush of the mob along with the procession. It is to be hoped also that the precautions taken in 1789 to test the strength of the scaffolding and other erections will be now repeated.

MINISTERS AND TAXPAYERS.

IT is a blessed tendency of the human mind instinctively to condone the irretrievable, and to decline altogether to take into consideration the remoter causes of its woes. The tax-gatherer presents the ominous notice. The head of the struggling household reads the announcement that he is cast for five shillings or five pounds, as the case may be. Naturally he writhes under an imposition which seems to bring him no tangible compensatory advantage. He lives or starves from hand to mouth, and is little in the way of soaring above his petty cares to generously comprehensive ideas. For the moment he sets small store by the share in our administrative blessings which his payment secures him. He forgets that it guarantees him against invasion panics, their causes and their consequences; that it symbolizes his joint proprietorship in the Horse Guards, the Admiralty Board, and the admirably organized forces which these twin departments dispose of; that it is his contribution towards the wages of his dignified representatives in our diplomatic, consular, and police services. Yet some comfort may come with subsequent reflection. He has a dim recognition of these manifold benefits, and candour whispers that he has no more claim to enjoy them for nothing than to demand a gratuitous supply of gas and London water. The State does give him some sort of value for his money; the amount at which he may be rated for administrative waste is inevitable and relatively unimportant. Fortunately for his peace of mind, he rarely recollects that fourpence in each of his shillings goes to defray an interminable annuity due upon barren encumbrances, and it is probable that he never speculates on the way in which these embarrassments grew. This is most fortunate, we say, for his peace of mind, and fortunate too for the tranquillity of the State; for a retrospect of Ministerial faults or blunders, of the contradictory policies that have run up our national liabilities, might either plunge him in profound gloom, or urge him to vent his bitterness in sedition.

It is superfluous to go into an unprofitable review of all the separate items that have swelled our debt. Taking our point as proved beforehand by the vaguest recollections of the most cursory student of school histories, we may merely indicate some patent instances from a harmonious sequence of similar events. For example, there was the pigheaded policy that embroiled us with the colonies which have since developed into the unfriendly America of the Alabama claims. There was the costly reaction when Pitt, after undue delay, exchanged absolute non-intervention for universal war and indiscriminate subsidies. There was the timid hesitation of the statesmen who drifted into that Crimean campaign whose fruits we offered up last year as a sacrifice to legitimate Russian susceptibilities. There was the uncourtous negligence of customary forms that provoked King Theodore, and saddled us with the estimates for the Abyssinian military promenade. We say nothing now of culpable negligence when the historical Alabama case was yet in embryo in Messrs. Laird's dockyard; for the Alabama case still stands for trial before an international tribunal, and consequently, in its earlier stages, it may perhaps be regarded as privileged. But, take it all in all, if we audit our national balance-sheet by the light of contemporary history and subsequent reflection, its prominent items resolve themselves into so many illustrations of the fallibility of "eminent" statesmen. Not that our statesmen's shortcomings have gone unobserved or without comment. We may admit that John Bull has never suffered his inalienable privilege of grumbling to lapse by disuse. English journalists have never from fear or favour flinched from exercising their prerogative of smothering criticism. There has always been an organized Opposition in Parliament, which has been neither blind nor blind to the mistakes of Ministers. And yet with all this, and though it is the fashion to abuse them, there is a general and exaggerated opinion that Ministers, in virtue of their possition, are as infallible as men well can be, and the superstition is always striking deeper root in spite of Ministerial errors and their exposure. We abuse the governing powers as a matter of course; and yet all the time, in the depths of our consciousness, we believe that no other men could do much better. We argue that in the free fight of public life the best men must necessarily force their way to the front. We confirm ourselves in what may be an illusion, when we see that the old landmarks set up by aristocratic traditions have been levelled with the ground; that it is essentially a Minister of the people who has exercised a power almost autocratic, who has broken with formidable castes, and defiantly disregarded immemorial interests; who has even dared to override his own legislative measures, and managed in spite of it all to retain a majority in our representative Assembly. Intense vitality of political existence must needs argue transcendent abilities, and accordingly our inherent faith in our Ministry survives experience and disastrous precedents. Suddenly some ugly diplomatic embarrassment crops up to induce us to reconsider that idea. We are brought face to face with awkward contingencies which we possibly exaggerate. The excitement is general and hysterical. The political enemies of the Government denounce its action with the dispassionate animosity of faction, and under the joint influences of a menace to their pockets and an insult to the national pride, the whole nation, except placemen and red-hot partisans, emulously sides with the hostile critics. The more violent the excitement the more short-lived it is likely to be. The graver the difficulty the more practically ineffective are the attacks on its responsible authors, because it is obviously unpatriotic to embarrass the action of the Government. The animus of the critics is suspected, and their energy of assavation defeats its own object. So, contenting itself with the boisterous expression of an opinion in which it has little faith, the general public turns quietly back to its own affairs. It leaves those of the country to be dealt with by the men whose business it is to manage them, and the Ministers practically go their own way. After all, statecraft is statecraft—a trade like another, and one to which a man should be regularly apprenticed. The governed may grumble, but, knowing in their hearts their own incompetency, they are shy of condemning their professional governors. So the diplomatic difficulty drags its slow length along. Perhaps diplomacy gets a triumph, and the matter is peacefully shelved to breed international animosities at leisure. Perhaps the sword is called in to cut the knot, and appeal is made to a costly war. There may be a party attack in the House. There may be a motion for papers, and some inquisitive or indefatigable member may procure them. But in any case short of a humiliating catastrophe, the national verdict on Ministers is pretty sure to be one of acquittal, or rather judgment is indefinitely deferred. Ministers have been the victims of circumstances beyond mortal control, and have done as well as mortals could reasonably be expected to do. To use a vulgar proverb much in vogue in City circles, "It is no use crying over spilt milk." The expenditure in which we have been involved is written off by busy men, who have to bestir themselves to retrieve their losses and meet the increased taxation. The memory of political blunders is buried for the time, to be dug up and theorized upon by the bookworms of some future generation.

Our remarks are intended generally, and yet we suspect that they may be always susceptible of application. As matter of history, we may observe that the presumptions on which these national verdicts are based are too frequently falsified by facts. The Minister has been wanting in sense, tact, or temper; has been tricked or talked over; has committed himself by carelessness or on impulse. He may have been scarcely all that we had a right to suppose him to be. We may have been too ready to accept him at his own valuation. He may have been raised to power by accident, and his reputation may have been born of a combination of circumstances and coincidences. A Minister may be an impostor like other men, and may impose dangerously on other people because he has succeeded so thoroughly in deluding himself. He may have been more than all that we conceived him to be, and may be only the more mischievous on that account. He may have been raised to power in consideration of certain qualities which, serviceable as they may be in domestic reform, become positively mischievous in case of foreign complications. He may be in the habit of thinking foreign affairs as far removed from his special province as they are from his individual tastes, and he may be roused some morning to decide upon a matter of which he is profoundly ignorant. He may believe in the genius that inspires him with sudden convictions, and be gifted with an eloquence and force of character that convert his colleagues against their better judgment. Or he may have been selected for office as emphatically a safe man, and "safe" may prove a synonym for sluggish and stupid. His limp hand, working with judicial deliberation, may turn itself slowly round to seize some pregnant opportunity, and find the opportunity fled far beyond its reach. Nor is it only mismanagement arising from infirmities of the Ministerial mind that we may have to pay heavily for. The maladies of the Ministerial body may have far more to do with it than we fancy. A statesman comes up from the country in the autumn recess to slave over irritating work, to be pained in a foul atmosphere, to be fretted with weaning anxiety. Perhaps he recruits his forces pretty freely at table, forgetting that his exercise is purely mental. He becomes dyspeptic, and his liver gets out of order. He takes a jaundiced view of circumstances, and his feelings reflect themselves in his despatches and instructions.

Explanations are refused, or are given in curt brusque language, and differences once susceptible of arrangement become irreconcilable. or a flying fit of the gout seizes him at some most inopportune moment. In an evil hour it occurs to a man whose notoriously pacific disposition has invited liberties to vindicate the insulted honour of his country and his own at the cost of a bloody war. He furnishes an instance the more of the trifling accidents on which great results depend. A guinea paid to a physician at the right time, a few pence expended on colicium or mercury, might have saved the British taxpayer a hundred millions.

So, remembering that Ministers are men, we cannot help feeling some natural anxiety at a moment like the present. We doubt not that they will do their best, and perhaps we ought to confide in them implicitly. But yet, according to America, this is a question of hundreds of millions. The possible expenditure of hundreds of millions in one shape or other figures among the various contingencies which our nervous apprehensions suggest. Our better judgment may tell us there is no adequate reason for these apprehensions, but the very mention of such stupendous sums may well make the taxpayer uneasy. If we tide over the difficulty peacefully, if we pay nothing in hard cash, still some little shortcoming in tact or adroitness may be productive of those needless animosities which bear a very appreciable market value. Already vague anxiety has been followed by a heavy drop in securities of all sorts, which must mulct so many taxpayers in their means of meeting the claims of the Exchequer. And the instances in which it is admitted that the Ministers have already laid themselves open to criticism are not altogether encouraging as to the future. They shipped a delegation of dignitaries and doctrinaires to cope with the shrewdest practitioners bred in the sharp schools of American law. They were entirely deceived as to the spirit in which the American Government was prepared to meet us. They neglected all those ordinary precautions which prudence suggests even to the closest friends when they propose subscribing a formal contract. All this may be characterized as "growing out" of the single negative fault of carelessness, if we may borrow a phrase likely enough to become historical. Finally, even when their eyes were opened, they delayed for a whole month to communicate officially to America the intense surprise with which we learned the extraordinary character of the American demands. Possibly the greatness of the shock stunned them, and, now that they have regained their senses, we may count on their exhibiting all the qualities that have hitherto been conspicuous by their absence. But they can hardly wonder if the taxpayer's fevered imagination follows with intense interest the deliberations of the frequent Cabinet Councils. We do not know how deeply our pockets may be concerned. The Ministers are mortals; predecessors of theirs have erred in far less delicate circumstances, and there is always the possibility that these Alabama claims may be so mismanaged as to furnish material for a hideous page in the national ledger.

THE GOVERNMENT WHIP.

THE Government Whip is a necessary complement to the statesmanship of the Cabinet. If all the world were wise, patriotic, and disinterested, if political questions were invariably examined by the pure white light of reason, and determined on their merits, it might be enough for a council of sages to expound their measures and then leave them to the dispassionate consideration of a just and severely logical assembly. It happens, however, that even the representatives of the Collective Wisdom are not exempt from passion, prejudice, the bias of personal interest, and other frailties of humanity; they have to be coaxed and conciliated as a step towards being convinced, and the process of persuasion is not altogether a course of philosophical dialectics. The strongest and most conclusive arguments are not always delivered within hearing of the Straugers' Gallery; and the thundered eloquence of the Minister has at times proved less effective than a little whisper from his subordinate, the Whip. Those who know nothing of Parliament except what they gather from the reports in the Times or Hansard are apt to wonder how it happens that an apparently weak and inconclusive line of reasoning leads up to a triumphant division, while on another occasion a really strong argument is perhaps ineffectual. The truth is, that the public debates present only one side of Parliamentary history. The great statesman at a green table rapping on a red box and pouring forth a flood of solemn oratory is supplemented by a busy and less dignified confederate, flitting between the bar and the lobby, translating the arguments of his leader into a concise and familiar tongue, and adding a few expressive touches of his own. We must wait for another Walpole or Wrexall to give us the "asides" of the lobbies and the smoking-room. If the Whip's speeches were reported, they would perhaps help to clear up many mysteries. It does not follow, because the kind of pleading which he is in the habit of using is of a somewhat different cast from that of public controversy, that it is necessarily disingenuous, or corrupt, or otherwise discreditable. Party government, as we know it in this country, implies co-operation for the sake of general results; and it is an important part of the Whip's business to see that this is kept in view, and that the broad course of policy is not endangered by narrow votes on isolated issues. He has to remind his flock that the question is not merely whether in the abstract this or that line of policy is sound, but whether, under the circumstances of the moment and in view of immediate practical results, it is desirable that the policy should be carried out in the way and to the extent proposed. The thing may be right in itself, but a defeat of the Government or an embarrassment of other questions may be too high a price to pay for it; or, on the other hand, it may not be absolutely the best thing that could be done, and yet, for the sake of graver questions and more important results which are mixed up with it, it may be expedient that it should be carried out. The Whip may be said to be an incarnation of the argumentum ad hominem. Let me show you, he in effect says to each member, how this vote will affect you, as to your personal interests, your sentiments, your favourite principles and measures, your crotchets, your social position, your relations with your constituents, and so forth. If the formation of opinion could be scientifically analysed, it would be found to be composed of a curious amalgam of different motives and desires. It is the business of the Government to set its sails so as to get the benefit of all the little breezes that may be blowing.

The origin of the office was unquestionably evil. In the interval between the acquisition of supreme power by the House of Commons and the complete identification of the House with the nation the Sovereign found it convenient to strengthen his authority by bribing the Legislature to do what he desired. The Tudors relied rather on coercion than corruption; but Charles II. found that it was easier and less dangerous to take a sufficient number of members into his pay, and thus secure a majority on important divisions, than to beard the Assembly which had beheaded his father. Clifford and Danby organized the vile system, which was not discontinued until at least the beginning of the present century. William III. professed to have struggled against it, but in vain. "I have to do," he pleaded, "with a set of men who must be managed in this way, or not at all"; and the plea survived as long as the evil flourished. The "King's Man" for the purchase of votes had become a regular institution in the reigns of the first two Georges. It was an old joke by that time, although still fresh in its application, that the House of Commons was like a pump which, when it showed signs of becoming dry, could always be made to yield an abundant supply of water by pouring a jugful down it; in other words, that a few thousands spent in bribery yielded a large return in votes of public money. Members flocked round Walpole, as in the worst days of the Restoration they had done round Danby, "like jackdaws after cheese." Newcastle, Bute, North, and even Grenville, followed in Walpole's steps. Walpole and Newcastle were their own paymasters; and when the distribution of places and pay was first entrusted by the Premier to a subordinate, it was rather with a view to having the work better done than from any shame that the head of the Government should be concerned in such a dirty business. It was in 1714 that a Patronage Secretary was first appointed to assist the Financial Secretary of the Treasury in some of his more confidential and dubious duties; but the Paymaster of the Forces appears also to have occasionally taken charge of this department. Henry Fox is said to have kept open shop at the Treasury for the purchase of votes, the lowest price being from 200*l.* to 300*l.*, and as much as 500*l.* being given on critical occasions. The Secret Service money for 1764 amounted to 41,000*l.*, the greater part of which is supposed to have gone in procuring majorities in the House of Commons. It was then usual for the Sovereign to maintain a contingent in that assembly, which he employed as he thought fit, sometimes placing it at the service of the Ministry, sometimes using it against his own Government, as he happened to be pleased or displeased with its policy. It appears from Bubb Dodginton's Diary, that it was an understood rule that "the King's Admiralty boroughs" and other constituencies over which he exercised a personal control should be kept in his own hands, while the Ministry had a right to make the best of its authority, "as by the customs, excise, &c.," in other directions. In George III.'s time bribes to members of the House of Commons and election expenses constituted a heavy charge on the Civil List Fund. The elder Pitt held aloof personally from all such trafficking, but during his alliance with Newcastle the Duke was only too ready to take charge of this department. The younger Pitt appears to have been equally circumspect. When he was forming his Ministry, Wilberforce, going down to the House with Steele and some others, happened to remark that "Pitt must be careful whom he makes Secretary of the Treasury, for it is rather a roguish office." "Mind what you say," exclaimed Steele, "for I am Secretary." Pitt's Government was too strong to stand in much need of corrupt support, and it is probable that Steele's duties were chiefly confined to the management of elections and the distribution of patronage.

The purchase of constituencies survived the purchase of members, and the Secretary to the Treasury had to provide the Government with a majority on the most economical terms. In 1806 Lord Granville was able to boast that not a guinea of the public money had been spent for elections. The fact was, that the Government had hit upon the plan of buying seats from their friends at a low price, making up the deficiency by appointments and promotions; these seats were then sold at the average market price to men who promised support, and the proceeds formed a fund for use at contested elections. In those days there appears to have been no alternative except to take a seat from the Government or a patron with the obligation to vote as directed, or to buy a seat to which no conditions were attached. Sir Samuel Romilly paid 2,000*l.* for a seat rather than accept one from the Prince of Wales. Lord Palmerston's first seat was held on condition that he should never go near his constituents, and it is said that on one occasion a member who had bound himself to a patron paid a fine in order to obtain freedom to indulge his own opinions. It will be seen that the Government Whip had thus a great many curious and delicate transactions to manage. The patronage from which his office derived his title was also extensive and troublesome. There was an insatiable demand for small places as a sort of small change to scatter among the electors. In a debate Lord Rockingham once stated that there were no less than seventy elections which turned on the votes of revenue officers. Members had to be conciliated on the one hand, and their constituents on the other, and the more that was given the more was demanded. Each party made the most of its opportunities when in office, and it cannot be denied that public interests suffered woefully. The competitive system, while it has greatly abridged the power, has also lightened the labours of the Patronage Secretary. At first the right of nomination was reserved for the Ministers, although the actual appointment depended on the subsequent examination; but since the greater part of the Civil Service has been thrown open to unrestricted competition, even this fringe of patronage has been torn away. When Mr. Lowe came into office he found that he had a single office in his gift, and he at once introduced a Bill to abolish it. His colleagues have more at their disposal, but the resources of the Patronage Secretary are rapidly drying up. Except an occasional County Court Judgeship, there is scarcely anything left to job with. The cheap and handy coin of tide-waiterships and clerkships has disappeared. The Secret Service money is still voted, and it is of course impossible to say what is done with it; but it is understood that the greater part of it is allotted to the Foreign Office, and it may at least be safely asserted that it has ceased to influence our domestic politics. A Patronage Secretary without patronage, who has little to offer but cold political breakfasts to those who aspire to sip in gilded saloons, is certainly somewhat at a disadvantage compared with his predecessors.

The duties of the Whip may be generally described as the management of the House of Commons. He is the medium of communication between the members and the Government; he prepares the course and settles the order of business; he feels the way of the Government on delicate points, ascertains how far a majority can be reckoned upon, and does his best to secure one by such means of persuasion or coercion as are in his power; he endeavours to stave off awkward questions, to smooth ruffled feelings, to arrange compromises. It has been said to be the business of the junior members of the Government to make a House, keep a House, and cheer the Minister, but for the making and keeping of a House the Whip is primarily responsible. On dull nights, when the House is deserted, he has to provide a subterranean contingent in case the bell rings suddenly for a division or "count." One of his most delicate and troublesome duties is the arrangement of the order of speakers in a great debate. This is no longer left to chance, or at least only partially so; a regular programme or time-table is now prepared for each night of the discussion, with perhaps a few blanks in the middle which are left to be filled up by the process of natural selection, or competitive adroitness in catching the Speaker's eye. The position of the Whip between eight and eleven on the night of the division is peculiarly painful. Whenever one member sits down a score or two of desperate men immediately start up, each with a speech by heart or in his pocket, a copy of which is perhaps already in type in the office of his local paper. The Whip tries to keep out of the way; if he appears for a moment, he is beset by entreaties to allow another night's debate. One member has an important view to communicate, another feels that he can never face his constituents again unless he lays his mind bare on the question before the House. All that the Whip can do is to advise them to try to accommodate each other by shortening their speeches and so making the most of the time. But even as he is suggesting this futile consolation, there is a cheer and a rush of members from the lobbies, for the leader of the Opposition is up and the Premier will follow, and there will be a division at two o'clock. The gathering of members from far and near for a critical vote, the summoning of truants from odd corners of the New World and the Old, from invalid retreats, and even perhaps from the sick-bed itself, is also an anxious task, especially as the days rush past and some of the deserters are as yet making no sign. But the Whip has his reward when he goes up on the right of the tellers to proclaim his triumph. It is a happy symptom of our political condition that for a long time there has been no suspicion of foul play or corrupt practices on the part of the gentlemen who "manage" the House of Commons. There is a seamy side to politics as to everything else, and it is easy to laugh at the expedients to which a Whip has sometimes to resort in order to secure votes. But it must be remembered that the Government must take men as it finds them, and it is clearly entitled to use any kind of influence which is not dishonest or oppressive. The Whip fills a useful and laborious office with much responsibility and not much honour. He has no opportunity of distinguishing himself in debate or identifying himself with important measures. Beyond the walls of Parliament his name is little known, and he has usually no hope of obtaining higher official rank. He is not a member of the Cabinet; and, though he may privately and indirectly influence its deliberations, he is ostensibly only its servant, bound to accept its conclusions and to go about declaring that they are the perfection of human wisdom and justice. Yet if he can be satisfied with a sense of secret power, he has probably no reason to complain.

EPISCOPAL JUSTICE.

ARCHDEACON DENISON has published a four-months' correspondence between himself and the Bishop of Bath and Wells. When we say that it relates to the ordering of the services in the parish church of East Brent, every one will know beforehand that it virtually closes with an intimation from the Archdeacon that, rather than conform to the Bishop's conditions, he will submit to be deprived of his benefice. It is not, however, with the Archdeacon's part in the correspondence that we propose to deal. That is characterized by all the qualities which Archdeacon Denison's letters invariably display—great clearness of statement, great firmness of purpose, and an entire inability to look at the questions in dispute from any point of view except his own. He maintains that certain practices in use in his church are ordered or permitted by the law of "this Church and Realm," and treats any decision to the contrary given by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as a "modern interpretation" so "conspicuously absurd" as hardly to deserve a passing notice. If the Bishop of Bath and Wells had taken or sanctioned proceedings against the Archdeacon for an offence against ecclesiastical law, no fault could have been found with him. We might have regretted another attempt to enforce an impossible and one-sided uniformity, but we should have been obliged to admit that the Bishop was acting within his right. The course he has chosen to take in preference is one of which it might have been hoped the Church of England had seen the last. There was a time not very long since when such measures were common enough, but their revival after they have fallen into disuse ought not to be passed over without comment.

Certain parishioners of East Brent became dissatisfied in the course of last autumn with the ordering—the changed ordering, as they allege—of the services in the parish church, and, by the advice of a neighbouring clergyman, they wrote to the Bishop, asking him to give them an interview. The course which the Bishop should have taken in this matter is sufficiently obvious. He was bound to hear the complainants; he was also bound to give the Archdeacon an opportunity of answering the charges brought against him. If the answer appeared insufficient, it would then have been his duty to ascertain the facts for himself, and to deal with the case accordingly. This is what the Bishop ought to have done. What he did was this. He wrote to the complainants suggesting that, before appealing to him, they should send a memorial to the Archdeacon, asking him "to restore the services to their former state." This was in effect to pre-judge the question, by assuming that the services had been altered, which it was at least possible the Archdeacon might deny. But the Bishop did more than this. He went on in the following remarkable words:—"Possibly many of the parishioners who might be unwilling to take the step of appealing to me against their vicar would join in such a request to the vicar himself; and if he found a considerable portion of the parish were aggrieved, his own kind feelings would probably dispose him to comply with their wish. If, however, the step I suggest fail to induce him to make the alteration requested, you could then appeal to me." Here we have a judge in effect suggesting to the plaintiff how he may strengthen his case against the defendant before the trial comes on. Probably this view of his conduct did not occur to the Bishop, but he could hardly have been blind to the handle he was giving the complainants in himself suggesting that many parishioners who had not hitherto acted with them would be willing to do so if the episcopal hint was followed up. As it was, no such memorial was set on foot; but, supposing there had been one, the authors of it would have been fully justified in representing it as really the production of the Bishop. It seems to have been the Bishop's wish that his interference at this stage of the proceedings should remain unknown to Archdeacon Denison. It is needless, however, to say that the answer to the complainants was not kept secret, and that a copy soon found its way through a third person to the Archdeacon. He felt naturally and justly aggrieved at the Bishop's line, and still more perhaps at the fact that the Bishop had not given him any notice, either of the complaint or of the answer to it. The Bishop defends himself by denying his judicial position. "The 'hearing,'" he writes to the Archdeacon, "and 'judging,' and 'communicating my judgment' on an ex parte statement, had no existence but in your own imagination." No doubt if "hearing" means hearing both sides, and "judging" means comparing the accusation with the defence, the Bishop was quite guiltless of any such procedure. But that he assumed, both in the letter we have quoted and in a subsequent interview, that the aggrieved parishioners had good grounds of complaint against their vicar, seems quite clear; and such an assumption on the part of an official who might subsequently have to decide between them was a real injustice to the side against which it operated. A similar observation is suggested by the Bishop's first letter on the subject to the Archdeacon. This letter was written immediately after the interview with the complainants. What he had said to them is not stated, but that he had adopted their view of the matter in hand is evident from what he says to the Archdeacon. "I have no hesitation in saying," he writes—and writes, it must be borne in mind, before hearing any account of the alleged changes at East Brent, except that of the complainants themselves or those who sympathized with them—"that I think you have done them a great wrong in suffering their religious sensibilities to be wounded as they have been by unauthorized services . . . and I must add that, filling as you do one of the highest offices in the diocese next to the Bishop, you do owe it me even more than any ordinary incumbent does, to keep strictly within the Church's discipline, and not allow doctrines to be taught from your pulpit which the Church has not sanctioned." If this is not "judging," and judging "on an ex parte statement," we confess ourselves unable to frame a definition of those acts. Immediately after the sentences quoted comes a piece of advice which, however sound it might be in itself, the Bishop had already put it out of the Archdeacon's power to follow with any good effect. "What I think you ought to do is to ask your parishioners to state to you what are the things which most grieve and estrange them, and to do all in your power to meet their wishes." Supposing that the Archdeacon had done so at this late stage of the dispute, what would have been the inference drawn by the complainants? Clearly, that he had heard of the Bishop's advice to them to get up a memorial, and that he wished to take the bull by the horns. Instead of looking like a desire to meet his parishioners half way, it would have looked like a desire to steal a march on them, and this result would have been entirely due to the Bishop's misplaced determination not to regard himself as a judge.

Upon a great part of the letters that follow there is no need to touch. On the 3rd of January the Bishop forwarded to Archdeacon Denison a memorial, signed by six householders of East Brent, setting forth certain "innovations" in the "ritual and service" of the parish church, and claiming protection against "the continuance and spread of a system of teaching . . . directly contrary to the law of the land, and to the teaching of the Reformed Church of England." In this it will be seen that the Bishop did what he ought to have done more than two months before. To those charges the Archdeacon sent a formal answer, denying some of the acts attributed to him, and justifying others. The Bishop thereupon issued certain "formal and peremptory directions" amounting to a prohibition of all but two of the practices complained of, and the Archdeacon closes the correspondence, so far as it concerns himself alone, by refusing to render "un-canonical" obedience to a "modern and self-stultifying interpretation" of the law of the Church of England. It would have been well for the Bishop of Bath and Wells if the correspondence had ended here. He had reduced the controversy between himself and the Archdeacon to a fair legal issue, and the only question that remained for him to consider was whether his duty to the complainants required him to institute proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Courts. Unfortunately it seems to have occurred to him that, though he could not touch the Archdeacon except at some expense to himself, there were others whom he could touch without incurring any cost or trouble whatever. The vicar of East Brent is a beneficed clergyman, and as such he is irremovable except by process of law. The curates of East Brent are not beneficed clergymen, and consequently they may be ejected without any regard for law. The day before issuing his monition to the Archdeacon, the Bishop wrote to each of the curates, giving them notice that unless within a fortnight they could show reason to the contrary he should summarily revoke their licenses. The curates, with an irony perhaps not quite unintentional, "respectfully submit" that in order to their being in a position to show cause to the contrary, it is necessary to know the precise ground upon which the Bishop proposes to subject them to this heavy penalty. To one of them the Bishop answers with pious unrestraint that he does not think himself bound, either by law or by that fairness which he hopes no provocation will ever induce him to lose sight of, to furnish him with any specific and precise charges as the ground of his proposed action. But in a letter to the other curate, Mr. Henry Denison, he gives as his reason the unlawful practices in East Brent Church, "most of which, if not all, were introduced by yourself." Now two months before this letter was sent, Archdeacon Denison had written to the Bishop—"My two curates act for me, with me, and with my express sanction in all particulars"; and a few days before it was sent he had further written, "The whole responsibility is mine and not theirs in any particular." The Archdeacon naturally infers that the Bishop does not believe him. We have no doubt that the Bishop believes him, indeed, the notion that Archdeacon Denison would allow the services in his own church to be ordered by any one except himself is too absurd to be entertained for an instant—least of all by his own Diocesan. The simple truth of the matter is that the Bishop wanted to do something to mark his disapprobation of the Archdeacon's proceedings, and preferred to punish the curates, who could only submit, rather than the vicar, who might and would resist. That he could only do this by committing an act of patent injustice was nothing to the purpose. Fair dealing towards a couple of enthusiastic young men is not to be put in comparison with episcopal authority. By the side of the Bishop of Bath and Wells the Church Association itself shows to advantage. It does fly at incumbents. We had hoped that by procuring unmistakable legal decisions on every disputed point of ritual it had made even Bishops ashamed of flying at anything less. Yet the Bishop of Bath and Wells is well known to be in private life both a generous and a kind-hearted man. But having at the outset committed himself to a false estimate of his position he has at last had to choose between personal inconsistency and official autonomy; and when such a temptation befalls a man it is rare that he makes the truly courageous choice.

THE SWISS CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION.

THE Swiss Nationalrath was employed during the latter part of January in discussing questions of the class which are in the strictest sense of the word, constitutional. We mean questions directly touching the various powers of government, their disposal among the executive and legislative bodies, and the mode of appointment of those who have to discharge them. Many of the questions which have been discussed during the present revision of the Federal Constitution are not constitutional questions in this sense. Some of them could hardly have become constitutional questions at all under any but a Federal system. Take, for instance, the question of education, which has filled so prominent a part in the discussions of the Federal Assembly. It is manifest that questions whether education shall or shall not be compulsory or gratuitous, whether clergymen and members of religious orders shall be allowed to act as teachers, are not in any strictness constitutional questions. They are questions which have nothing to do with the form of government or the manner of its administration. They are questions which might arise equally in a pure democracy and in an absolute monarchy. And in any State not being Federal, whatever might be its form of government, they could be dealt with by an ordinary act of the legislative body. If any such State chose to make them articles of its Constitution, it would simply be in order to make its decision on those points more solemn and less easily changed. There is no necessity in any non-Federal State for making constitutional questions of them. But in a Federal State, if it is wished to have any common legislation on such points over the whole country, it can be had only by making a provision in the Federal Constitution on the subject. The ordinary Federal legislation cannot touch any matter which is not expressly committed to it by the Federal Pact; all matters not so expressly committed come within the sphere of the sovereign rights of the Cantons. If therefore the point is to be dealt with by Federal authority, a commission to deal with it must be entrusted to the Federal power by the Federal Constitution. In this way almost any point may, in a Federal State, become a constitutional point, because it may be needed to determine how far it is to be brought within the range of the Federal power, and how far to be left within the competence of the Cantons. But the present session of the Nationalrath has been mainly occupied with questions which are constitutional in the strictest sense, and which would be looked on as constitutional questions anywhere. Such is the proposal that the executive power, the Bundesrath, should be chosen directly by the people, and not, as at present, by the Federal Assembly. Such is the still more startling proposal to abolish one branch of the Federal Legislature, the Ständerath or Senate, the representative of Cantonal sovereignty. Such again is the smaller change by which it is proposed to take away the restriction which forbids clergymen of either Church from sitting in the Nationalrath, and thereby in the Bundesrath. Of these three proposals the first two have been thrown out, while the third has been carried; that is to say, it has passed through one of the four ordeals through which every amendment of the Federal Constitution has to pass. But the main interest of the debates—and we may add that we have read them throughout with the highest interest—gathers round the proposals to bring in a direct popular control in some shape or another over the resolutions of the two Houses of the Federal Assembly.

These different proposals take the form of Volksinitiative, Veto, Volksreferendum, and the Volksreferendum may be either fakultativ or obligatorisch. We confess to a certain malicious pleasure that neither the English nor the German tongue—though the latter can certainly find names for most things—seems able to find names for these strange devices. The object of the Veto or Referendum in its different forms is to provide a means of appealing from the resolutions of the two Houses to a popular vote, a system which has been introduced in several of the Cantonal governments. Either as a matter of course, or when a certain number of Swiss citizens or Cantonal governments demand it, the acts, or some classes of the acts, of the Federal Assembly are to be submitted to a vote of Yea or Nay at the hands of the whole Swiss people, accompanied or not accompanied by a like Yea or Nay vote of the Cantons voting as Cantons. The Volksinitiative would oblige the Legislature to legislate on a given question on the demand of a certain number of Cantons or of Swiss citizens. This right at present exists only in the case of an amendment of the Federal Constitution. The two Houses can at any moment undertake the revision of the Constitution of their own free will. In case fifty thousand Swiss citizens demand a revision, a Yea or Nay vote of the people is taken whether there shall be a revision or not. If the popular vote is Yea, the Houses are bound to proceed to the revision, and the same popular vote of revision or no revision is taken when one House votes in favour of a revision and the other against it. When both Houses have agreed on the amendments to be proposed, their resolutions are submitted to the Yea or Nay vote both of the Cantons and of the people. This system, or something like it, the supporters of the Initiative, Veto, or Referendum, wish to apply to other acts of the Federal Assembly besides constitutional amendments. But of course endless changes may be rung on the different details of these proposals. Shall there be only an Initiative, or only a Referendum, or both at once? How many citizens must join in the demand for the Initiative to take effect? Shall the Referendum take place in all cases, or only in certain specified cases, when the Houses themselves vote for it, or when a fixed number of citizens or of Cantons demands it? Shall all acts of the Assembly be liable to the Referendum, or only some particular class of acts? Especially, shall treaties with foreign States, declarations of war, and such-like international matters, be subject to the Referendum as well as the internal legislation of the Confederation? And again a question—the most interesting of all to students of Federal politics—is the Referendum to consist only of a general vote of the Swiss people, or shall it also take in, as is now the case with regard to a constitutional amendment, a vote of the Cantons as Cantons? On these points the proposals of the Committees of the two Houses are different, and a crowd of amendments have been made by individual members. The Bundsrath has no proposal at all. The Committee of the Ständerath proposes that Federal laws and votes of money amounting to more than a million of francs shall be submitted to a vote both of the people and of the Cantons, either when the two Houses themselves vote for such an appeal, or when the appeal is demanded either by five Cantons or by 50,000 Swiss citizens. The Committee of the Nationalrath proposes that a certain class of Federal laws—namely, those passed under the powers which it is now proposed to transfer from the Cantons to the Confederation—shall be submitted to the vote of the people and of the Cantons as a matter of course, and that the same may be done with laws of any other kind whenever the two Houses themselves may think fit. The same Committee also proposes the introduction of the Volkinitiative in this form, that, whenever fifty thousand citizens demand a change in the law, the two Houses may at once draw up a proposal to be submitted to the vote of the people and of the Cantons; and if they do not approve of the suggestion, a vote of the people and of the Cantons shall be taken on the question whether the Assembly shall legislate on the subject or not. It follows that, by the proposal of the Committee of the Nationalrath, though not by that of the Ständerath, the Assembly may be obliged to legislate on a matter against its will. But it will also be observed that neither Committee proposes to submit anything bearing on foreign affairs to the popular vote. These are the proposals of the two Committees; the amendments of individual members were far too many for us to give them in detail. And besides the various forms of Initiative and Referendum there was a proposal of M. Carteret of Geneva, according to which there would be no popular voice on any legislative matter, but, on the demand of a fixed number of citizens, a new election of the Assembly should take place. That is to say, the people as sovereign would be invested with the power of dissolving Parliament, whereas now the Assembly, once elected, comes to an end at the close of its three years' term, but cannot be dissolved sooner.

In the debates on these questions, which were marked by many speeches of great ability on both sides, the main question was chiefly dealt with as one of centralization. The extreme proposal to abolish the Ständerath met with few supporters, but it shows the direction in which things are tending among a powerful party. The abolition of the Ständerath would be equivalent to a surrender of the Federal system. All Federal legislation would then depend on a numerical majority, by which the smaller Cantons might easily be swamped. And without going this length, the more zealous supporters of the Referendum urged that the confirmation of the acts of the Assembly should be by the vote of the people alone, without any distinct vote of the Cantons. Here again we have the appeal to the mere numerical majority, without any regard to the existence of the Cantons as sovereign States. Proposals of this sort of course united several classes of enemies against them. They would naturally be opposed by all who object to any sort of change, and by all who object to further changes of a democratic kind. But they would further be opposed by all those, whatever may be their politics on other matters, who cleave to the sovereign rights of the Cantons, as at once the historic Constitution of the country, as the Constitution best adapted to its actual condition, and as the only means of preserving the rights of large classes of the Swiss nation. Here then, as at other stages of the debates, we find men pulling together whose notions on other points are widely different; we find the oldest and the newest Cantons working in a common cause; for anything that infringes on cantonal rights is equally threatening to Uri and to Geneva. The Initiative and Referendum are thus opposed on two grounds, either of which alone certainly seems to us to be quite conclusive. If Switzerland is to remain what she has hitherto been, she must cleave to the Federal principle, which alone can secure really equal freedom and prosperity to the various elements which have been brought together within her bounds. And, as we have before said, the appeal from Parliament to the people at large, from the better informed to the worse informed, surely overthrows every principle of representative government. It is no answer to say that, because several Cantons have adopted the system, the Confederation must adopt it also. Opinions differ widely as to the working of the Referendum in those Cantons which have adopted it. But, be it ever so good in the Cantons, it does not follow that it is suited for the Confederation. We may reasonably expect that the average of intellect and experience will stand higher among the members of the Federal Assembly than among the members of a merely Cantonal body. It is certain that they will often have to deal with affairs of a higher and more difficult nature than those which can come before a Cantonal body. It is therefore perfectly conceivable that the Referendum may work well in certain Cantons, and yet not be at all suited for the higher range of the Confederation. In a country which has full freedom of the press and full right of meeting and petition, and which further chooses its representatives for three years only by universal suffrage, it is hard to see what more is wanted in the way of popular rights. The example of the Landsgemeinden proves nothing. They are Assemblies; but an Assembly of the whole Swiss people is as impossible as an Assembly of the whole English people. Every one knows the difference between a vote given in a deliberative body and the mere signature of a paper. And a vote given after the fashion of the Referendum has much more in common with the latter process than with the former. On the other hand, some references to the Bonapartist plebisuite, as a warning against the Referendum, prove nothing the other way. In a Bonapartist plebisuite the whole thing is a sham; there is no real choice; the alternatives are Bonaparte or chaos. But in the Referendum there is a real choice between the existing state of things and the proposed change in the law. A negative vote is conservative; it leaves things as they are. And many members seem to fear that the main effect of the Referendum would be to hinder progress by the throwing out of good measures. It is spoken of by the emphatic name of a Hemmschuh, a drag.

Some of the speeches during this long debate deserve special mention. It was opened by a vigorous speech of Herr Scherer of Zurich on behalf of the proposed changes, which was presently followed by one from Herr Anderwert of Thurgau against the distinct vote of the Cantons. The historian Segesser of Luzern clearly set forth the opposition between the Federal and the purely democratic principles; he defended the vote of the Cantons, without which the Federal principle would be upset, but at the same time he somewhat startlingly argued for placing treaties with foreign States on a level with Federal laws and decrees, making them subject to any form of Referendum which might be introduced. Herr Segesser voted against both the Initiative and the Referendum. The President of the Nationalrath, Herr Brunner, and Herr Welti, the newly chosen President of the Confederation, both descended into the arena. Herr Brunner spoke in favour of the changes, while the Bundespräsident, in a speech of high eloquence, defended the system under which the Confederation was honoured and flourishing, showed how utterly inapplicable the Referendum was to Federal affairs, exposed the fallacy of the argument drawn from its use in Cantonal affairs and still more from the analogy of the Landsgemeinden—

Die Landsgemeindeordnung hat mit dem Referendum nichts zu thun, weil die Form, in welcher der Wille des Volkes sich ausspricht, bei jener eine lebendige, bei dem Referendum eine tote, papierene Form ist.

The President ended by an appeal for the preservation of Communal rights and the extension of education, as better means to raise the character of the people at large than any extension of its political powers. Herr Bider of Baselland gave an amusing description of the working, or rather non-working, of the Referendum in the odd little commonwealth to which he belongs, in which it seems the great difficulty is to get people to vote at all about anything. Soon after this voice from the youngest of democracies came one from wall-nigh the oldest, and we can understand the feelings with which a representative of Schwyz, Herr Eberle, spoke of the theories of "die neuen Demokraten," and called on his countrymen to stand fast by the ancient principles of their Federal system. A powerful argumentative speech from Dr. Recher of Zurich followed on the same side, while Herr Cäsliach of Graubünden pleaded for the Referendum as not being a centralizing institution, and appealed to the experience of his own Canton, where the Referendum was of immemorial antiquity. We doubt, however, the analogy between the exercise of communal sovereignty in the old Confederation of the three Leagues, and the Referendum as now proposed. Other remarkable speeches were those of M. Carteret of Geneva and Herr Conzenbach of Bern, on what we suppose we must call the Conservative side, though the name sounds odd when applied to so strongly democratic a politician as M. Carteret. One sentence of his is well worth preserving, pointing out the impossibility of really carrying out the proposed changes on account of the endless demands which they would make on the time and attention of the people. He says—

Wir sind keine Athener, wir besitzen keine Sklaven, die unsere Arbeit verrichten während wir uns zum Forum begeben.

The vigorous assertions of Cantonal rights which were made in the course of this debate were certainly not needless, when one speaker could so far forget the whole history of his country as to say, "Die Kantone sind nichts anderes als Fragmente des Schweizervolkes." Yet we can thank the same speaker, Herr Foer-Herzog, for so clear and sound a distinction as the following:—

Er will die Wahrheit der Demokratie, und diese kommt nur in den kleinen demokratischen Kantonen vor, in den übrigen Kantonen ist das Repräsentativsystem die wahre Demokratie.

When the House divided, the peculiar mode of voting by successive and conditional divisions gives each member the opportunity of voting conditionally for what he considers second best, as well as positively for what he thinks best of all. Thus the "fakultative Referendum" was carried conditionally against the "obligatorische Referendum" by 79 votes against 26. But when the final vote came whether there should be any Referendum at all, the House divided equally, and it was decided in favour of the Referendum only by the casting-vote of President Brunner. The vote of the Can-tons was rejected by 59 votes against 50, and the Initiative was carried by 60 votes against 47. The result is a vote on the part of the Nationalrath, that Federal laws and decrees, but not treaties with foreign Powers, shall be submitted to a vote of the people whenever the Assembly itself thinks good, and whenever five Cantons or 50,000 citizens demand it. Again, when 50,000 citizens demand legislation on any subject, if the Assembly approves the demand, they will at once proceed to legislation. If they disapprove it, a vote of the people is to decide whether there shall be any legislation or not, and another vote of the people will finally decide on proposals of the Assembly. It remains to be seen whether this resolution of the Nationalrath will be accepted by the Ständerath, by the Cantons, and by the people at large.

A STRANGE STORY.

THE "very extraordinary story" which has lately appeared in the Times might, if there had not been the Tichborne case and the Alabama claims to take priority, have occupied the attention of society as strongly as did the disappearance a few years ago of Mr. Speke. It may be useful perhaps to remark that the small number of unimaginative persons who declined to believe that Mr. Speke had been murdered turned out to be right. That gentleman, to the great loss of sensational novelists and dramatists, appeared after a few weeks to be living in the country, and thus dissipated the growing belief that there existed certain mysteries of London which had never been penetrated by the police. In opposition to the opinion which prevailed during the interval of suspense, it was urged that there are plenty of places in London where you may lose your money or your character, but it would be inconvenient to deprive you of life. The rule of law which requires proof of the corpus delicti before trying a man for murder is founded in common sense. If there were not such a rule, many persons would have been hanged for supposed murders which had never been committed. It is of course possible that a body may be so completely destroyed as to leave no trace behind. In the drama of the Bells, which Mr. Irving's acting makes so painfully impressive, the body of the Polish Jew is supposed to have been thrown into a lime-kiln and entirely consumed. But as the murder was committed for the sake of the Jew's money, which the murderer keeps or employs in trade, it is obvious that if eminent respectability had not disarmed suspicion, an intelligent policeman would, "in consequence of information received," have waited upon Matthias and put to him some troublesome inquiries. We are not objecting to a play because it involves an improbability; for if Le Juif polonais had not been written, Mr. Irving could not have acted in the Bells. We remember what has been said as to animals conversing:—

"Tis plain that they were always able To hold discourse, at least in fable.

It happens, however, that lime-kilns are not common in a great city, and if we suggested sausage-mills as a substitute, it might be answered that there would be a practical difficulty about buttons. We avail ourselves of our recollection of Mr. Speke's case for the purpose of suggesting that here is an opportunity for the Spiritualists to convince unbelievers of the truth of their pretensions to hold converse with the unseen world. The attempts to obtain information from spirits as to Mr. Speke's condition were unsuccessful, but as a Society has been lately formed for the more systematic investigation of spiritual performances upon articles of furniture, it is possible that the disappearance of Mr. Bauer may by its help be correctly explained. For our own part we disbelieve in the potency in London alike of secret societies and of spirit-rapping, but in both respects we are open to conviction, and if the spirits would conduct us to the place where Mr. Bauer was imprisoned and murdered, we would confess two mistakes at the same time. But in the absence of further evidence we shall continue to disbelieve in the perpetration, within the Metropolitan Police District, of more than very few murders of which some trace does not remain. A few spots of blood, or any remains which might be supposed by possibility to be human, would suffice to set the police upon inquiry, and the newspapers upon the manufacture of sensational leading articles. A secret society which murders men as a punishment for thinking of marrying would be doubly abhorrent to the feelings of Englishmen, and its members, if they became suspected, would find London an exceedingly warm place. Many of us remember the excitement which was created some years ago by what was called the Waterloo Bridge mystery, and the alarmists are entitled to the admission that the murderer—if it was a murder—was not discovered. Supposing that the fate of Mr. Bauer should remain unknown, the material will be supplied for a play or novel, or both, of the most exciting kind. So far as we remember, the Euston Railway Station has not yet been brought upon the stage, and we should expect that an accurate representation of it, with some real cabs and horses, would suffice to ensure a six months' run even for a piece which in other respects might be poorly qualified for public favour. But in moderately skilful hands a drama upon this subject could not fail to be enormously successful. It is true that when we are sitting coolly in our rooms reading the newspapers, the suggestion that a man was kidnapped in daytime—we will not say daylight, for there may have been none—at Euston Square and carried away is absurd. A cry for help would have brought to his assistance porters, policemen, and the general public, among whom it may be conjectured that at least one specimen of the genus penny-a-liner would have been included. But although this is obvious in the morning, we are not quite sure that the absurdity of the incident might not by skilful management be momentarily obscured from the excited audience of a theatre in the evening. We remember, however, that lately at the Surrey Theatre a girl was brought upon the stage to be murdered, and the audience were desired to understand that she had been abducted for the purpose from an hotel in Furnival's Inn; but the manager did not venture to represent the actual abduction. He must have thought that that would be piling it up rather too high. Nevertheless the story, as it has been told, dates the kidnapping of Mr. Bauer within three hours after noon, and that feature, if unchanged, would, we think, offer difficulty in treatment. But there are other features upon which a dramatist would fasten with delight. There would of course be a first act, or perhaps, as more fashionable, a prologue, in which Mr. Bauer as a youth would be admitted with any quantity of mysterious and horrific rites to the Society whose rules he afterwards infringed. As none of us, critics or others, know anything about this Society except its object, the author, manager, and scene-painter might indulge in the raw-head-and-bloody-bones style of business to an unlimited extent. The quaffing of a bowl of human gore would be a necessary incident of such a ceremony. There would next be a love-making scene, ending in an engagement, which would most properly transact itself in a garden at Moscow by moonlight, with an emissary of the Society watching and listening behind a tree. There might then, if the Society had not been already made the most of, be a scene in which Mr. Bauer would be informed against, and tried in his absence, and sentenced to death by the hands of certain appointed executioners of the Society's decree. We should next have the parting of Mr. Bauer from his family and his betrothed, and perhaps one or two incidents of his journey and voyage to London, which might be of a comic character, to relieve the solemnity of other scenes. The kidnapping at Euston Square, performed to an accompaniment of rapid music, would have a tremendous and overpowering effect, and it would be followed by a view of the interior of the headquarters of the "Sufficient Number," in which we should contemplate Mr. Bauer undergoing an imprisonment which must briefly end in death. We need not say that the theatrical artists employed upon this scene might exercise their imagination to an unlimited extent, being, at least in our judgment, entirely unfettered by any possible reality to which they need have regard. They would not be called upon to place the dread abode of these avengers in any particular street or square, so that each spectator on his return home might have the luxury of believing that imprisonment and murder were being perpetrated next door to him without impediment or even suspicion by the police. The composition by Mr. Bauer of the letter which has been published in the Times could of course be interspersed with any quantity of pathetic exclamations on the hardness of his fate in being thus cut off at once from life and love. The author of the drama might, if he so pleased, seek a precedent for a dying speech among the Greek tragedies, but he must be careful not to allow Mr. Bauer to apostrophize the sun, because the supposition that that luminary appeared in London in January would be almost more ridiculous than that of the existence of a secret Society which murders and makes away with men whenever it sees occasion. It is remarkable, by the way, that Mr. Speke was said to have disappeared because he did not wish to marry, and that Mr. Bauer is said to have disappeared because he did.

Taking the story as it has been told, it appears that Mr. Bauer and his luggage were simultaneously abducted from the station. A telegram despatched at five minutes past twelve from Euston Square reached Messrs. Blews & Co. at Birmingham, and must therefore have been sent either by Mr. Bauer or by the Sufficient Number. But if they seized and carried him off before he reached the station, they could have no motive for taking the trouble and risking the exposure necessary to send this telegram. Considering, too, that Mr. Bauer was staying at the Charing Cross Hotel, and had an interview that morning with a gentleman upon business, he could only have been in places where the task of kidnapping him without exclamations, which must have attracted notice, would have been quite as difficult as at Euston Square. A good many years ago, when Burk and Hare were performing their exploits, timid people were ready to believe that a plaster might be placed over a man's face and the man thrust into a sack and carried off, say from the Strand or any other crowded thoroughfare. At that time, however, the very object of the crime was supposed to be the possession of a body, whereas now the existence of a body would be a great, and almost insurmountable, embarrassment to the criminals. But, supposing that Mr. Bauer did arrive at the station, we cannot but remark that the tendency of railway porters to exact fees from passengers, instead of being a fault, deserves to be regarded as a beneficent arrangement, of which Directors ought to be allowed to divide the credit with Providence. An instinct equally beautiful and useful with that which guides the bee to build her cells would have taught railway porters that Mr. Bauer was a foreigner requiring, and able to appreciate and reward, assistance. They would have captured him and his luggage in a friendly, but determined, manner the moment that he stepped out of the cab which brought him to the station, and it would have needed a very sufficient number to have taken him and his belongings out of their hands. We may doubt whether the police could detect a murder, but we cannot doubt that railway porters would have ensured the safety of Mr. Bauer.

It appears from a further statement in the Times that both the cabman who drove Mr. Bauer to the station, and a porter to whom he spoke at the station, have been found. It is not clear what became of his luggage. The letter purporting to be written by him states his belief that it had been destroyed by the intending murderers. But if it reached the station, they would not be likely to take the trouble to remove it even if they had the power. It is further stated that the letter signed "L. R. Bauer" and that subscribed "A Sufficient Number," have been pronounced by an expert to be written by the same hand. It is now stated that a body, which may possibly be that of Mr. Bauer, has been discovered in the Thames. We forbear to enter upon conjecture, but, if it clearly appears that he is dead, the first step will have been taken towards showing that he may have been murdered.

THE GROANS OF THE TRADESMEN.

MOST of our readers are probably aware that there are in London certain institutions called Co-operative Stores, whose members have the privilege of obtaining genuine articles of daily consumption at moderate prices. The two most important associations of this kind are, nominally at least, connected with the Civil Service; the labour of establishing these institutions was undertaken by persons in Government employment, but the qualifications of membership have been interpreted with extreme liberality, and members of either House of Parliament, clergymen, barristers, military and naval officers, and friends introduced by them, have for the purposes of these associations been considered as belonging to the Civil Service. The oldest institution of the kind in London was established in 1865, and its headquarters are in Monkwell Street. It has now large premises both in Monkwell Street and in Long Acre, and it numbers about 25,000 members. A kindred association, which is younger only by a few months than the one we have mentioned, has its headquarters in the Haymarket, and numbers about 12,000 members; and each of these centres of novel, but perfectly legitimate, trading is crowded with customers day by day, while the street is thronged every afternoon with the carriages of well-to-do persons, who fail to recognise the fact that their money is entrusted to them for the special benefit of their tradespeople. We are not surprised that many shopkeepers regard these institutions as things to be put down by all available means, whether legitimate or otherwise, and we are not altogether surprised that they should have made their grievances known to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, although the fact of their having done so, while it serves to show the straits to which they are driven, does not raise our estimate of their intelligence. We learn from the report of the interview that they first sought the assistance of the Premier, and were by him handed over to the sympathies of Mr. Lowe. Their condition is pitiable, and the frankness with which they publish their wrongs is engaging. It appears that at the two hateful "Stores" 630,894*l.* was paid for groceries, wines, drapery, and other articles during the past year. The deputation of tradesmen who waited on the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the 9th instant did not pour out to him the full measure of their sorrows and their wrongs: they might have made their tale more piteous by adding that very many members of their own class, wiser in their generation than themselves, and making peace with a power too great to be resisted, had connected themselves with the odious associations, and had been selling on very favourable terms to their members, and that probably goods to the value of some 250,000*l.* had been in the same period sold by these tradesmen at wholesale prices. The same course is, we presume, open to the members of the deputation, but they prefer to regard themselves as the objects of Governmental protection, and to demand that the energies of the Chancellor of the Exchequer shall be put forth in order that they may prey on the public with impunity. Their case was so weak that we can only admire the patience with which Mr. Lowe listened to them, and the well affected sympathy with which he bade them carry their grievances to Parliament. Impotent to put an end to the system, they demand that an unprecedented exercise of power shall be devoted to restraining civil servants from buying in the cheapest market. In vain were allegations recklessly made that these associations paid no Income-tax, that they sold excisable articles without licence, and that the time belonging to the Government was diverted to the management of their affairs. These assertions were at once and authoritatively contradicted; and at last the sole remedy which the deputation could propose was that Mr. Lowe should exact eight hours a day from clerks in Government offices instead of six, and that, by some means or other, not stated and probably not discovered, they should be compelled to pay exorbitant prices for everything that they required. If the tradesmen had their way, no two gentlemen who happened to be in the service of the Crown would henceforth be at liberty to club together in importing a hoghead of claret or a pipe of port. It is to be regretted that, if their own intelligence was unequal to the discovery, neither the Solicitor nor the Secretary to the National Chamber of Trade told that body, what their deputation had, to learn from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that "it has not been the practice of the Government hitherto to interfere with the engagements of civil servants during their own time; it is notorious that some civil servants write books, that others write plays, and that others edit or write for reviews; so long as a civil servant does his duty to his office, the rest of his time is at his own disposal, and it is not in our power to interfere with the use which he makes of his own time." Of course nothing else could have been expected from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and we hope the tradesmen will lay to heart the words of sound common sense which Mr. Lowe bestowed on them.

While the subject is before us we should like to have our say about it; and first we would remind the aggrieved tradesmen that the system of co-operation for the purchase of food and clothing did not originate with the civil servants, but with a body of artisans in the North, and that if, by the exercise of some hitherto unknown and arbitrary power, the stores connected with the Civil Service were closed next week, the system would continue, and the same associations would be carried on for the benefit of the same people, although probably the name might be changed. So thoroughly indeed is the principle established, and so perverted is the public conscience, which fails to see the duty of every householder to tax himself for the benefit of the shopkeepers, that such associations are springing up on all sides, with a rapidity indeed which has made us suspect in some instances that they are but private shops under another name. We have ourselves suggested in these columns a considerable extension of the system* to articles of daily use which are perishable in their nature. At present butchers, fishmongers, and greengrocers are unaffected by co-operative rivalry; but the establishment of markets in all our suburbs would bring these classes to the same depth of whining discontent and helpless dismay to which their brethren who deal in groceries and the like are reduced.

The real origin of the co-operative movement is to be found in the false and vicious principles on which retail trade is ordinarily conducted. The tradesmen have had their innings, and very long innings they have been; the public on whom they have preyed has been a helpless victim; for long it bore with adulteration and extortion, but the time came at length when the point of endurance was reached and passed. Not only are the labourer's beer and the spinster's tea doctored and drugged until the original properties of those articles can with difficulty be discerned, but the very medicines on the purity of which a life may depend cannot be obtained with confidence. The attempts to redress these evils were bungling and unbusiness-like at first; but they have now passed through the experimental stage, and are established in full working power. The consuming public has discovered the virtue of paying ready money and buying at wholesale rates; and persons who have made this discovery are not likely to retrace their steps—indeed they could hardly do so if they would. Even as it is, prices are increasing rapidly, and it is but sober truth to say that if this country were engaged in war next week, many households whose annual income is measured by hundreds of pounds would, under the pressure of increased prices, in a few months come in sight of something very much like want. Persons whose earnings are stationary, and who see little prospect of easier circumstances, will be slow to learn the duty of supporting retail tradesmen because they contribute to the Income-tax and are a part of our social system; and indeed we know of no amount of wealth which would make it criminal in its possessor to buy in the cheapest market. Instead of repressing efforts at independence and economy, the Government will do better to devote its attention to the more stringent enforcement of laws which exist, or, if necessary, to the passing of new laws, for the punishment of fraudulent traders. We question whether the rascal who poisons us by easy stages is less of a criminal than the garotter, and it may be that we shall not get wholesome food for our money until some highly respectable vestryman has been subjected to the same punishment, and we have had an opportunity of learning, through the energy of the Daily Telegraph, how he bore it. We are too apt to thank God that we are not as other men are, that wholesale frauds are not of such frequent occurrence amongst us as they are elsewhere; but after all we believe that to be the highest type of honesty and morality which is tried and not found wanting in the little things of everyday life. It is not given to every man to make a great coup which ruins hundreds while it enriches himself; but it is in the power of every tradesman to sell things which are pure, to measure them by honest weights, to charge, not what he thinks his customers can be made to pay, but what he knows to be a fair remuneration, and to give ready-money customers the full benefit of their prompt payments. The tradespeople seem at present to be much disturbed, and not without reason; they have clamoured for free trade, but, like the Yarmouth fisherman who advocated free trade in everything but herrings, they have demanded an exception to be made in their own interests. We would advise them, however, not to be too prone to seek the aid of the Government, lest they thereby become the subjects of its care in a manner which would be distasteful to themselves, although gratifying probably to their customers. It is futile for them to declare that they must live, and that co-operation is making this a difficult thing to do; that plea has often been put forward to justify evil deeds, and we fear that society is just now so hard-hearted as to deny the necessity. There is nothing so sacred in the interests of the individual shopkeeper as to make him the object of exceptional solicitude to the State; nothing so beautiful in himself or in his position as to render his preservation essential to the symmetry of society. If the aggrieved tradesfolk would take counsel from us, we would offer them a new prescription, and say, "Try a little honesty." Too long have they combined against their customers; they now find that it is a game at which two can play, and, in mercy to them, we forbear from prophesying which will win.

* See Saturday Review, May 6, 1871.

AMONG THE SPIRITS.

WE are indebted to the New York Herald for a report of a case in a police court, in which "the workings of the spirit world" are exposed by a medium who becomes disgusted and professes to tell all he knows. The medium was accused of stealing a gold watch, and the defence was that the charge had been trumped up to destroy his character and discredit the testimony which it was feared he would give against his employers. The complainant was Mrs. Elizabeth Fuller, "magnetic and electric physician," of New York, who stated on cross-examination that she had never graduated in any college, but she understood electricity, and thought herself competent to go ahead in her profession. She believed that she was assisted by spiritualistic agencies in her treatment of disease, and particularly by the spirit of an Indian girl named Pick, "the last of the tribe of Mohicans." She said that the defendant Sproul called upon her on a Sunday evening for the purpose of spiritualistic conversation, and after his departure she missed her watch. The defendant appeared and denied taking the watch, and gave a long account of his conversation with Gordon, who is alleged to have instigated Mrs. Fuller to bring the charge. He had assisted Gordon in séances, understanding that he should have a fair share in the proceeds of the speculation. The séances were opened with prayer. There was an altar, on which was a crucifix and seven lighted candles, and there was a swinging censor. Gordon was the High Priest. "The religious service at opening was that of the High Church of England," Gordon stated that he was controlled by a deceased Bishop White, and sermons were preached occasionally by him. Faces were exposed, and if any person asked whether that was "Susan" or "Emily," the figure bowed. This was Sproul's description of the business carried on by Gordon and his associates. Gentlemen were charged a dollar and ladies fifty cents, for admission. But before long the master spiritualist and his man quarrelled. Sproul had found a paste-board face of a pretended spirit in a trunk. He represents himself as having been up to this time deceived by Gordon; but we may suspect that he felt a justifiable indignation at the blundering manner in which his chief operated. "There," said he to Gordon, "is your spirit. You can't sit at a table and give séances worth a cent. I am going to set up a shanty of my own and burst you up." Hereupon Gordon put rage around his head and pretended to go out of his mind, and Sproul determined to expose the matter. At this point Mrs. Fuller appeared upon the scene as a spiritual reinforcement to Gordon. She called at Gordon's residence, and seeing Sproul, she told him that spirits were around him, but wanted some medium to get into him, and she was the medium. "Wanting to have some fun," he pretended to be under mesmeric influence. Mrs. Fuller then became unconscious, and "put it through," or, in other words, made a revelation by the help of the spirit of the Indian girl Pick, that Gordon could not give a séance that night, "as things were not harmonious," which they certainly were not. She invited Sproul to visit her, promising to give him more magnetic strength, and he accordingly called next evening, when the alleged theft was committed.

In cross-examination Sproul stated that he became acquainted with Gordon about three months ago. "He took a notion to me, and wanted me to become his spiritual brother." At this time Sproul was working at bookbinding. Perhaps he thought that if he could live without working it would be an improvement. He accepted Gordon's invitation, took charge of his rooms, and managed his financial affairs. He did not assist Gordon in the séances, but "acted in the audience"—a very expressive phrase. In the rooms which were placed in his charge he found cardboard pictures. They were fourteen inches one way and ten the other. One of them represented Gordon's spirit bride, dressed in diamonds and laces. This picture, apparently well known as the Queen of Beauty, was produced in Court. Another picture was of a boy, and had "Willie" underneath. People at the séances thought it was their darling little baby. Gordon held the pictures in his left hand. "The fraud was so bunglingly done that I did not think he would have the audacity to produce it." When he taxed Gordon with the fraud, he answered that Sproul was not yet far enough advanced to understand the spirits. The picture of the Queen of Beauty, adorned with a diamond stud belonging to Gordon, "was performed one night to convince a very sceptical gentleman." It is not stated whether he was convinced.

A witness on behalf of Gordon testified his belief that the spirits were real, and not an illusion produced by pictures or other fraudulent contrivances. This witness describes himself as a candid seeker after knowledge. He wanted to know whether forms of the departed could be produced, and he is satisfied after attending several séances that they can. Before following this witness through his description of what he saw, or supposed himself to see, we will remark upon the exceedingly wide field of inquiry on which the police magistrate allowed himself to enter. The only direct evidence of theft was that of Mrs. Fuller, who stated that she had a watch when Sproul visited her, and could not find it after his departure. The watch was not proved to have been found in Sproul's possession, or elsewhere, not to have been in any way handled by him; and in the absence of any evidence beyond that of Mrs. Fuller, it might have been expected that the case would have been dismissed. But American Courts of Justice always seem to be conducted on the principle of getting as much talk as possible out of every case. An observer of their proceedings will easily understand how it comes to pass that even lawyers of reputation can see nothing unreasonable in the claim to indirect damages for the Alabama's cruise. In their own domestic litigation they never seem to know where to stop in admitting evidence or arguing thereupon. In this case Sproul appears, and alleges that the charge against him has been got up to prevent his exposing Gordon's fraud. He describes proceedings which, if they occurred, were necessarily fraudulent. But, on the other hand, the prosecution produces witnesses who state that they did see spirits, and not merely manipulated pictures, at Gordon's séances, and we are told that Gordon himself would appear, and doubtless he would assert the reality of his own spiritual influence. It is unnecessary to observe that neither Gordon nor the inquirer whom he has converted can give any evidence relevant to the charge which the police magistrate has to try. If that officer considers himself called upon to decide whether the pretensions of spiritualists are true, we should think that he would find himself sitting upon the case even after the jury in the Tichborne case have been discharged. The sceptical gentleman for whose conversion the Queen of Beauty, according to Sproul's story, was adorned with diamond studs, would be a most important witness. For every sceptic on one side a believer might be produced on the other, and unless the spirits would appear and testify to their own existence, it is difficult to understand how the case could ever end at all. The candid inquirer denies that the effects which he saw could be produced as Sproul pretends they were. He asserts that machinery, erected at the cost of 50,000 dollars, could not produce them. He admits, indeed, that "the spirits never showed their backs," which to an impartial reader of the evidence rather indicates that they had no backs to show. At the end of the séance Gordon would appear to be in a trance. Sproul pretended that this was a contrivance to avoid moving until the company had departed. But the candid inquirer was satisfied that it was a real trance. On one occasion a spirit-child was seen in Gordon's arms. "A bloody-looking bunch" appeared on Gordon's arm when he came out of the trance. Some of the company who yet lingered in the room went forward to find out what it was, and found nothing. "They explained that it was a possible railroad accident somewhere, in which a child was being cut to pieces." The report of the case which we have before us is incomplete, and we cannot feel sure that the Judge may not have admitted evidence to show that there was a railroad accident in which a child was cut to pieces at that moment.

It matters little what the decision in this case may be, because believers in Spiritualism will continue to believe in it whatever estimate the Judge may form of the character or conduct of Sproul or Gordon. The cross-examination of the former was directed to show that he was a man who would do anything to avoid the necessity of working for his living. Assume that he is not what the other side say he is, and you have this remarkable result, that Spiritualism is "in advance of orthodoxy," and that Gordon is the high priest of an improved religion, and Sproul is his assistant. The proverb noscitur a sociis would appear to be applicable to the case.

REVIEWS.

BESANT AND PALMER'S JERUSALEM.*

A GREAT deal of new and concentrated light has been thrown of late on the history and topography of the Holy Land, and on that of the Holy City in particular. In the interval which must elapse before the scheme of a thorough survey of the country on a scientific scale can be carried into effect, or before a freer license to excavate can be expected to set at rest the controversies which rage as to the sacred sites, the public may be said to be in possession of the whole body of facts which the researches of the learned or the enterprise of explorers upon the spot has brought together for the comparison, to the mind's eye, of Jerusalem as she ruled in her queenly pride with what she is as she now sits captive in the dust. What was felt to be the most urgent need was something that should fill up the void in history between these two widely distant periods, and span the gulf of ignorance or obscurity which undeniably existed in all but a few specially instructed minds regarding the fortunes of Jerusalem, from the quenching of her light in the blood of her children to that rekindling of interest which forms so remarkable a sign of the intellectual life of our own day. This blank will now be in a great measure satisfactorily filled by the work which we owe to the joint labours of Mr. Walter Besant and Professor Palmer. The design of these writers is to give a connected history of Jerusalem from the period immediately preceding her fall to the present time. The city is shown to us in each of the three main aspects which she respectively presented under Herod, under Justinian, and under Saladin. In a succession of chapters we follow in review the siege and capture by Titus and the last desperate revolt of the Jews; the Christian occupation of three hundred years; the Mahommedan conquest, with its monumental record, the building of the Dome of the Rock; the Crusades, the Christian Kingdom, and the final settling down of the city under the long night of Mahommedan rule, unbroken till our day save by the periodical flocking of pilgrims or travellers to the Church of the Sepulchre, or by a more than usually scandalous outbreak between the Greek and Latin monks. It is with the less critically known period of this eventful history, that of the Mahommedan rule both prior to and following the Christian Kingdom, that the interest of readers at large will naturally be most closely bound up, and herein it is that the novelty and the consequent value of our authors' labours will be mainly found to lie.

* Jerusalem, the City of David and Solomon. By Walter Besant, M.A., and E. H. Palmer, M.A., Lord Almoner's Professor of Arabic in the University of Cambridge. London: Bentley & Son. 1871.

Two chief sources of information are open for the historian of this period. One is the contemporary and later chronicles of the Crusades, written either in Latin or in the Langue d'Oïl, from which Mr. Besant has constructed his portion of the work. The other consists of what the Arabic historians themselves have put on record, upon which the special learning and well-known industry of the Lord Almoner's Professor have been brought to bear well nigh for the first time. We would gladly have had some more definite account of the authorities on which Mr. Palmer has drawn for this addition to the more familiar sources of knowledge. It is scarcely possible to obtain from his pages the slightest clue to either the names, the dates, or the place in literature with which these novel materials are to be associated. To what extent they may have been disinterred by his own hands from the stores of native lore and erudition which are vaguely understood to lie hidden in Eastern repositories long sealed to the eyes of the Giaour, or may have been amassed by oral contact with such wise men as may still preserve, with the fidelity of Eastern memory, the traditions of their fathers, we have no information to guide us. Vague allusions to the "annals of the Mahommedan Empire" might be taken by many to imply a fund of official and authentic material such as has been opened up in the archives of Simancas, or in the records of our own State Paper Office. Letters and proclamations of caliphs or viziers are quoted verbatim, with an apparent exactness which we are far from calling in question, but of which the value and interest would have been unquestionably enhanced by an intimation of the place where the originals were to be consulted. When we are told of the description of the mosque of Omar, by "an early pilgrim who saw it," that it was a simple square building of timber, capable of holding three thousand people, and constructed over the ruins of some more ancient edifice, we think it hard upon the ordinary reader, who might wish to know more of this anonymous pilgrim and of the date of his visit, to be left to hunt out such points for himself among the books of reference at his command, with such faint guidance as the architectural features of the pilgrim's story may afford. The terms of capitulation between Omar and the patriarch Sophronius are given with all verbal formality, and the consequent scenes accompanying the surrender of the mosque and Sakhras are added in detail, with corrections of verbal inaccuracies in the version given us by Reynolds. We are then treated to "another account" of the same transaction, and further on to "another version of this conversation," but we are still kept in the dark as to the nature or comparative truthfulness of these independent authorities, though a tantalizing stress is laid upon "the great accession to our knowledge of the literature of this period which has been made during the last century." No doubt learned professors have all such minor matters as these at their fingers' ends, and feel supreme contempt for those poor souls who need to have the alpha betas of Arabic literature or the rudiments of Mahommedan chronology put under their eyes. But it is by no means the usual way with scholars, in our time at least, to withhold from those less richly fed at the table of knowledge such crumbs of information as they may not unreasonably beg for. Many would be glad to hear more of Ibn 'Asâkir, to whom we are referred for a statement of the grand proportions and rich adornments of the great Masjid of Omar, as he saw it early in the twelfth century, with its 50 doors, 600 marble pillars, and 385 chains, sustaining 5,000 lamps; and its 15 domes or oratories, exclusive of the lesser mosque or Cubbet es Sakhras, 24 large cisterns, and 4 minarets. There must be many things of interest which the author of the Muthir el Gharâm has to tell us, as well as the fact that he found inside the haram wall a stone tablet on which the length of the Masjid was recorded as 784 cubits, and its breadth as 455 cubits. Even if we are right in assuming the common cubit to be here meant, these figures are not easily reconcilable with those of Ibn 'Asâkir, who gives as the length of the Masjid 755, and the breadth 465, taking the royal cubit as his standard. We may complain of being left in doubt whether to ascribe to our author's own hand or not the full and authentic translation of 'Abd el Melik's inscription running round the colonnade of the Cubbet es Sakhras, though instances are given of the astounding ignorance displayed in the translation of this curious record in an abridged form in Reynolds's Temple of Jerusalem. The name of 'Abd el Melik has been erased from this remarkable inscription—the Quds text of which probably owes its preservation to the ignorance of the Christian occupiers of the city as to its denial of the Trinity, and of the Divinity of Christ—and that of 'Abdallah el Mawaffak substituted; the date, however (72 i.e. 691 A.D.), being left unaltered by the clumsy forger. The circumstance that several of the particulars of this incident are met with in the fine work of Count de Vogüé makes it the more tantalizing to us to find the authenticity for the residue of them withheld. Thus the Count is quoted for the statement of 'Abdallah Yâcût el Hamawi, a Christian Arab writer of the twelfth century, that the substructure of the Jewish temple served for the foundations of 'Abd el Melik's edifice, that monarch building a wall of smaller stones upon the more massive ancient blocks; the great substructures at the south-west angle, which have been much disguised of late, having been also raised by him to form a platform for the Aksa.

Many difficulties in understanding these native writers are cleared up by a more distinct attention to the terms employed by them. The Masjid el Aksa, for instance, is not to be taken as identical with the well-known mosque on the south side of the Haram. The latter building is called by the old writers El Jâmi el Aksa (the word Jâmi being exactly equivalent to the Greek συνογωγή, and applied only to the church or building in which the worshippers congregated), or simply El Aksa; the substructure being called El Aksa el Kadîmeh, the "ancient Aksa," while the title El Masjid el Aksa is applied to the whole sanctuary. Masjid, Mr. Palmer explains, is a general word derived from the verb sajada, "to adore," and is applied to any spot the sacred character of which invites to devotion. Our "mosque," a corruption of masjid, is applied in an incorrect sense to the building itself, as distinct from the whole sacred area. "The Jâmi el Aksa, Jâmi el Magharibeh, &c., are what we call mosques, but the entire Haram is a Masjid." The temple of Jerusalem was entitled generally El Aksa, "the remote," according to the Mahommedan doctors, either because of its distance from Mecca, or because it is in the centre of the earth: The title of Haram, or "sanctuary," it enjoys in common with those of Mecca, Medina, and Hebron. The Cubbet es Sakhras, imposing as are its proportions, is not properly speaking a mosque, not being constructed for public prayers and ceremonials. It is only an oratory, one of the numerous cubbehs with which the Haram area abounds, domed edifices marking the spots sacred in tradition. The form is all but identical with that of the ordinary Muslim weli or saint's tomb, while El Jâmi el Aksa is, on the other hand, a mosque on a plan similar to those at Constantinople and elsewhere, expressly designed for the worship of a large congregation. The primary motive which led to the building of the Cubbet es Sakhras is traced by Professor Palmer to the Koranic legend of Mahomet's night journey to heaven from the holy rock at Jerusalem. Over this rock, for the shelter of pilgrims, whose steps it was the Caliph's desire to divert from Mecca to Jerusalem, and moreover to restore the Masjid of Omar, 'Abd el Melik constructed his wondrous dome, without the slightest heed, we need scarcely say, to the notion of this rocky site having been either in fact or in legendary belief that of the Saviour's burial-place. For the safe custody of the treasure, equivalent to the seven years' revenue of Egypt, which he had amassed for this purpose, the Caliph first erected from his own design the small dome called Cubbet es Salsilah, which still exists, to the east of the Sakhras, and he was so pleased with the effect that he ordered the model to be followed in the more important building. Riya ibn Huiyih el Kauli was appointed controller of the treasure with the accompanying works, and Yezid ibn Sallâm, a native of Jerusalem, his coadjutor. Many curious particulars of the progress of the building, the ornaments and offerings lavished upon it, and the costly stulch and perfumes used for service, are collected by Mr. Palmer. In the reign of the second Abbasside Caliph, Abu Ja'far Mansûr (A.D. 755), the southern portion of the Haram es Sherif, standing upon its artificially raised platform, suffered severely from an earthquake; to repair which 'Abd el Melik's plates of gold and silver were stripped from the doors of the Masjid and converted into coin. Under his son and successor, El Mohdî, the mosque, having once more fallen into ruins, was rebuilt with many alterations of plan, the width being increased at the expense of the length. Still greater works were executed by El Mamûn, the son of the well-known Harun er Rashîd, to whom the Masjid may be said almost to owe its present existence.

With no less fulness or clearness does the work before us trace the history of the church known as that of the Holy Sepulchre, the object of pilgrim bands of Christians no less multitudinous or devout than those of Moslem devotees who flocked to the Holy Rock; its repeated destructions, especially that ordered by the madman El Hakem (A.D. 1010); and the successive restorations which have resulted in the stately but heterogeneous structure of our time. If the vicissitudes of the city and its holy places, newly culled by one of our joint authors from native records, differ at times in detail as well as in tone from those set forth by his colleague as represented by better-known witnesses or chroniclers, such minor discrepancies may well be excused on the ground put forth in the preface, that the one narrative is Mahommedan, the other Christian. We have dwelt by preference upon those portions of the work which lie somewhat beyond the usual sources of information; but the entire work will be found to sustain with exhaustive fulness and unflagging interest the historical drama of the City of Cities till the curtain falls upon the massacre of Acre, and the night of five centuries sets in during which Jerusalem has no history. In the appendix an excellent summary is added of the main points in the annals or the topography of the city which may be considered as definitely fixed upon historic evidence or verified by excavation, and which must needs be taken as a basis for all future speculation or research.

WHITE'S HISTORY OF THE BATTLE OF BANNOCKBURN.

THIS book presents itself in what a grazier might call "first-rate condition." In paper, printing, and covering it has everything that money can give and good taste approve. All is sobered down to a gravity becoming the sedate historian. Taking it in hand is like receiving a visit from some stranger of dignified and impressive mien attired in the perfection of gentlemanly propriety, who forthwith excites your curiosity touching the question whether the intellect within responds to the goodly exterior. Are you in the presence of a really great man or of "a solemn sham"? The reader will soon find the solution for himself in the present instance, and we shall not anticipate him by a prejudgment. There are certain features about the book which perhaps may at the commencement of his investigation puzzle him somewhat. It presents an odd mixture of ambition and simplicity, of modesty and conceit. The author begins by telling us that, having, "by the divine blessing, arrived at a period of existence when in a great measure" he had "overcome the toil and trouble of active life," he turned his attention to the early history of Scotland. Consequently, the present volume is the result of what he calls his "investigations" and of his reliance on his "own judgment among the numerous authorities" consulted by him. He affords us a list of these "numerous authorities," and this list is of a character that will be welcomed as new and refreshing to persons accustomed to the ways of the ordinary historical compiler. He—not the present author, but the ordinary compiler—having got his fact from some common source, traces his way back through the mazes of recondite authorities till he is able to lift it on the top of a mountain of learning. He has found it in Hume or Goldsmith, but he presents to you as his informers Nennius, Gildas, Venerable Bede, William of Malmesbury, Henry of Huntingdon, Ordericus Vitalis, and Giraldus Cambrensis. Mr. White plays no such game, but with a noble simplicity and candour gives the real names of his "numerous authorities"—as, for instance, "Hume, D., the History of England, London, 1808, 10 vols."; "Henry, R., the History of Great Britain, London, 1805, 12 vols."; "Turner, S., the History of England during the Middle Ages, London, 1825, 5 vols."; "Macaulay, T. B., the History of England, London, 1849-61, 5 vols."; "Buckle, H. T., History of Civilization in England, London, 1867, 3 vols." But these citations do not display the full extent of the author's candour. Few people would care to appeal to Buchanan except to show the skill with which he converts the facts of history into a romance, and we may be sure that, as a general rule, the original Latin would be cited, especially if that language were not among the accomplishments of the author who refers to him. But our friend here valorously cites "Buchanan, G., History of Scotland, translated by James Aikman, London, 1867, 4 vols." One would suppose that there was no occasion for the historian of Bannockburn to embarrass himself by citing Herodotus at the risk of showing that he was unacquainted with the language of Greece, but Mr. White with superlative candour reveals the extent of his education by recording among his authorities "Herodotus, the History of, translated by George Rawlinson, London, 1858, 4 vols."

More remarkable still than the recondite character of his authorities is the author's reliance on the success of his topographical investigations. He had "on several occasions carefully examined the whole of the ground on the field and around it, and bestowed ample consideration on every contingency connected with the event." To extract from the nature of the ground an exact account of the military operations of which it was long ago the theatre may be an attempt worthy of commendation, but it is not always successful. Local antiquaries, for instance, satisfied themselves, by accurate study, of the ground swept by Dundee's Highlanders at Killcrankie and the spot where he fell, and it has been all told accordingly over and over to the tourists and duly imbibed by them. But when the history of the affair is set forth by him who had the fullest reason for knowing all about it—poor Mackay of Scourie, the defeated general—came to be printed, it was seen that the battle was fought some two miles higher up the glen than the stone held to commemorate the fall of the victor. We entertain a general scepticism about the results achieved in such inquiries. As the present author, however, appears to feel assured of his success, it is perhaps but fair to give the reader a substantial specimen of the fruits of his peripatetic meditations:—

Robert Bruce, availing himself of the wisdom and experience of the chief men around him, made every arrangement for battle. Next day being Saturday, the 22nd June, on learning by his scouts that the English had come to Edinburgh and passed the night there, he gave orders that the whole army should move on towards Bannockmoor, which they did by the Roman road that led through the Torwood onward to the north, and lay a little to the west of Stirling. This causeway descended in a straight line from the west side of the farmsteadings of Snabhead and Pirnhall, crossed the Bannock, passed within a short distance east of the Bore-stone, and continued through the hollow on a part of the road between Coxet Hill and St. Ninians. But, as has been stated, a part of it from near Milton to the latter place was probably comprised within the New Park, and though the fences thereof might be destroyed, the locality would still retain the same name. Accordingly, when the army came to Milton, the King caused a number of active men, accustomed to the spade in agriculture, to dig a series of deep pits, close together like a honeycomb, across the neck of land from the lower end of Milton Bog to the lofty banks of the burn below that village. Both the ancient Roman way, and probably a more recent road, which may have been made to the east of the New Park when it was enclosed, were thus cut through, that all passage thereon, or near them, might be prevented. When those pitfalls were excavated, Bruce ordered them to be covered first with branches of trees, and above these green turf to be laid, and the earth so scattered about as not to show where the hollows really were. If the road at Brock's Brae was then formed, we may presume it was broken up, and the pits concealed in the same manner. Had these cavities been left open, the reader will perceive how easily the English might have caused them to be filled up, so that no obstacle then could have prevented them passing over. The Scots were occupied in digging them all night, and had them completed next morning.

About this time we may conclude the Scottish army occupied the height from the Whins of Milton to Calham Hill, with the hollow west of it, up to Coxet Hill, and if the staff of the royal standard of Scotland was ever planted in the Bore-stone, the broad folds of that banner must have waved from it during that Saturday afternoon. A few troops might be placed on the spot selected for battle, which was soon to be trodden down and flowing with human blood, but Bruce, we suspect, had the sense to leave that as it were open, till he saw the English advance, and if they took possession of the opposite ground near Foot o' Green and its vicinity, all would appear favourable. Still he was uncertain by what way or in what order they would approach, so that he could only hold his own army in readiness to meet them, and guard the passage to the fortress of Stirling. He took no rest during the night, but wandered about from one portion of his army to another, revolving in his mind the circumstances in which he was placed, and the bearing they might have on the future of Scotland, yet providing for all that might occur, and trusting to a higher power than that of man, so that when the shock of battle came these heroic men around him might be enabled eventually to achieve the freedom of their native land.

It is among the commonest of military experiences that men who have taken part in the details of a battle confess themselves to be ignorant of the general plan of operations on which that battle was fought. It may be assumed that one who draws certain details out of the profound depths of his own consciousness is not more likely to see the great lesson taught by the event. That lesson in the instance of Bannockburn was that mounted men-at-arms might be met and defeated by light-armed infantry. It was one of the occasions so common in war where a style of warfare or a class of warriors deemed in popular opinion to be irresistible encounter a reverse all the more astounding from this reliance on their irresistibility. Absolute reliance on the mounted man-at-arms, encased in his shell of iron plate, was a military superstition of the day. It was believed—and in countries where the peasantry were serfs, oppressed, and starved, it was a well-grounded belief—that one or two men-at-arms could cut through a peasant army as so many lions through a herd of deer. This belief gave an overweening confidence to a magnificent army like the English army of Edward. Its defeat was not wonderful when we look to the conditions on the other side. There was the choice of ground. It was not as if the two armies were free to choose, and tried to out-manoeuvre each other. The English King was to march to Stirling Castle and relieve it, and Bruce had the choice of the best ground where he could stop the way and get the support of the garrison. He had men under him hardy, well disciplined, conscious of a good cause, and cordially hating their enemies. Their tactic was a stationary resistance with long spears to the charges of the heavy cavalry, and bore a strong analogy to that of the celebrated squares of Waterloo. In fact, Bannockburn was not a solitary example of such a victory. It was part of a reactionary movement against that oppressive insolence which the mounted or baronial class of warriors were learning from their invincibility. Only twelve years earlier the workmen and peasantry of Flanders had defeated the chivalry of France at Courtrai. Only a few months after the battle of Bannockburn came the great Swiss victory over the Austrians at Morgarten.

Our author places much dependence on the historic accuracy of the "Bruce" of Barbour, and quotes it largely in his notes. To persons who are not acquainted with that curious and interesting work, we are inclined to recommend the present volume for the sake of these quotations. We are glad to see that the Early English Text Society is busy with the "Bruce." It commends itself to the student of early English literature, since it is written in a language more intelligible to the Englishman of the present day than the writings of the English authors of Barbour's period. But historical accuracy! Is it not a fact that he has put together his hero out of materials furnished by three generations of Bruces?

One word before parting with our author. Like all prudent men conscious of the possession of a valuable commodity likely to attract the covetousness of the unscrupulous, he announces "all rights reserved." We think we can conscientiously assure him that all these rights are in a condition of perfect security.

GUTHRIE'S SUNDAYS ABROAD.

DR. GUTHRIE'S account of his foreign travels might have dispensed with the catchpenny title (as we presume it is in Scotland) of Sundays Abroad, except that it gives him the opportunity of writing a preface on Sabbatarianism, which, as coming from a leading minister of the Free Kirk, is certainly a sign of the times. He thinks it necessary to defend his adoption of the term Sunday instead of Sabbath, which was exclusively applied by the early Christians to Saturday, and proceeds to observe that the day was changed during the apostolic age, "no doubt by divine authority," and that "instructions to that effect, though not recorded,"

Sundays Abroad. By Thomas Guthrie, D.D. London: Stephen & Co. 1872.

A History of the Battle of Bannockburn, fought A.D. 1314. With Notices of the Principal Warriors who engaged in that Conflict. By Robert White, Author of A History of the Battle of Otterburn. "Poems," &c. Edinburgh: Johnston & Douglas, 1872.

were "probably given by our Lord" to His apostles during the forty days between the Resurrection and Ascension—which is just the account usually given in Roman Catholic manuals of the institution of the Seven Sacraments. In short, the Presbyterian doctor falls back on unwritten tradition. He makes a vigorous protest against the "extremely rigid and gloomy views" about Sabbath observance prevalent in his own country, and against those "ministers of the Gospel they may be called, and 'defenders of the faith' they may fancy themselves to be, with their sour faces and overflowing bile, their dogmatism and self-conceit, their bitter tongues and uncharitable tempers," who seek to enforce them. And we have an amusing anecdote, in illustration of Scotch notions on the subject, of what occurred to the author when visiting a brother minister, who is described as a devout Christian and man of powerful mind, in the North Highlands:—

I said to my host, as I retired to my bedroom on Saturday night, "I may ring for hot water in the morning?" On this he instantly raised his hands, saying, "Hush, hush!" Astonished, and taken quite aback, and fancying, from his deprecatory manner and look, that he had greatly misunderstood my question, I repeated it. But this only called forth a more startling and emphatic warning, followed by this explanation, sotto voce, "Speak of shaving on the Lord's day, and you need never preach more in—shire!" However much I might disapprove of customs that required a tradesman to open shop on Sunday for such a purpose, I could not see the difference between a man shaving his beard and washing his face on that day. This want of logic, however, was a small matter compared with a want of consistency I could not reflect on without a little grief and much astonishment—this, namely, that in hundreds of houses where you could not get, for love or money, one drop of hot water to shave with on the Lord's day, you would get plenty wherewith to brew whisky-toddy—as if whisky was not the bane of the country, the present and eternal ruin of thousands, as well as the main cause both of our poverty and crime.

On another occasion the late Duke of Argyll, who was whistling a tune at his hotel window in Princes Street, was suddenly roused by a sharp, though cracked and groaning, voice from the pavement, where stood an old woman, her Bible in one hand, and shaking the other, which trembled with rage, in his face, as she cried out "Ye reprobate, ye reprobate!" But, superior as Dr. Guthrie may be to the ordinary forms of Scotch fanaticism, he is by no means free, as we shall presently discover, from narrowness and prejudices of his own, though as a rule his ignorance and not his malice is in fault. He is laudably anxious to do justice to the better side of the manners and customs of the benighted Papists he meets with, and if his charitable desire not unfrequently lands him in self-contradictions in successive pages, he may fairly claim to have given an honest record of his own not always very trustworthy impressions. His occasional excursions into the domain of Church history, where his knowledge seems to have been chiefly derived from Dean Stanley's picturesque word-paintings, would be thought rather surprising in a clergyman on this side of the Border, and he is apt to miss the point of the legends he quotes from imperfect acquaintance with very simple matters of fact. Thus we are told, as evidence of the regard for the Lord's day even in the dark ages, of a monkish legend which represents the Druidical remains in Scotland as men and women turned into stone "for working on the Sabbath-day." But Dr. Guthrie is chiefly arguing against Sunday amusements, and he should know that the Roman Catholic Church has always denounced "servile work" on that festival as strongly as he can do himself; and, indeed, the modern miracle of La Salette had for one of its principal objects to enforce this lesson on French Catholics. It is, again, quite unfair, though we have no doubt the unfairness is unintentional, to speak of "the shops (at Aix-les-Bains) open for business on Sunday, as is usual and all but universal in Roman Catholic countries." It is no doubt very general on the Continent, and universal, or nearly so, in foreign Protestant countries; but so far from the Church of Rome being responsible for it, the opening or closing of shops on Sunday may practically be taken as a gauge of the influence of the priesthood. Rome, under the Papal Government, presented all the appearance of London on a Sunday; at Munich the shops are closed except for an hour or two, when hardly any one enters them, while they are open at Berlin; and so, again, they are closed in the Catholic town of Lucerne, while at the Protestant Interlachen they seem to drive a roaring trade on that day. Dr. Guthrie is partly aware of the fact, and explains it by observing that "evil communications corrupt good manners, and those who protest against the errors of Popery follow one of the worst of them;" which is not only a gratuitous, but, on his own showing, a manifestly incorrect, explanation. He admits that in the most remote parishes of his favourite Waldensian valleys, where there are few or no Roman Catholics, Sunday is equally disregarded, and to the Waldensian sect he attributes—wrongly of course—an almost apostolic antiquity. On the other hand he has the candour to contrast the sobriety of Florence, where, during a week's stay, he did not see a single instance of intoxication, with the drunken "Protestantism and piety" of his own land.

We have said that, if the author is prejudiced and ignorant, he is never ill-natured, and moreover he has an eye for the artistic and religious beauty of institutions and observances which are not his own. He does not crack coarse jokes, like Mr. Spurgeon, on relics and images and the Virgin's milk, or summarily dismiss one of the noblest of Italian cathedrals, like the late Archbishop Whately, as "the biggest idolatrous temple I have yet seen." One of his earliest reflections is on the nuns at Aix-les-Bains, who, "in devoting their youth and energies and affections to works of benevolence and charity, mistaken as they might be, were an honour to their sex, and a blessing to society;" and he is so struck by the frescoes of Fra Angelico in St. Mark's convent at Florence as to "feel inclined to repeat the angel's salutation, 'Hail Mary, full of grace!'" We are indeed told elsewhere that nunneries, equally with monasteries, are "haunts of indolence, hotbeds of vile passions and the grossest sensuality," the Report of Henry VIII's Commissioners being referred to in proof of the indictment, much as Mr. Froude writes history from the preambles of Henry's Acts of Parliament; but the author proceeds just afterwards to speak of several monks he had fallen in with personally, who were well informed, courteous, and devoted men. His a priori conceptions are often prejudiced enough, as may be seen in his savage attack, dragged in head and shoulders, on the Contagious Diseases Act; but he never wilfully misrepresents such facts as happen to come within his own knowledge. In one respect he can hardly escape the charge of being rather Popishly inclined himself. Not only does he recount, with evident belief, an alleged miraculous interference in favour of the Madiai, who were imprisoned at Florence for Bible-reading some years ago, but he is half disposed to accept the legend of St. Peter's nocturnal visit to Westminster Abbey for the excellent moral it contains, and more than half ready to credit Savonarola with the gift of prophecy. At Florence we have the following graphic account of a preaching friar, where, by the way, we may observe that, "the three P's" are quite new to us:—

On returning in the twilight from a visit to the Duomo, we saw people entering a church; and, joining the stream, we found ourselves inside on the outskirts of a great crowd. Some sitting, others standing, they were gathered in front of one of the side chapels, under the arch of which stood a platform, raised some five or six feet above the floor. The whole interior was wrapped in gloom, save where the fading twilight, and the lamps of various "holy shrines," and a single candle fastened to one of the pillars, showed us an imposing figure in possession of the platform. The speaker, a preaching friar, was seen from head to heel. He was tall, erect, vigorous, full of power. His under dress was a white robe, and over it, sweeping down his back, hung a long black cloak. There stood a great orator, not stuck into a barrel; not reading an MS. spectacles on nose; but now pacing in freedom up and down the platform; now standing on its edge; now bending over the crowd below; now erect with outstretched arms and glowing face raised to heaven; now putting a question with the tones and accents of an interrogator, and now answering his own questions with a complete change of voice. He was discoursing on—not a very suitable topic, some may think, for a celibate, a Roman Catholic priest—domestic duties, and our relationship to God as our common Father and Friend. And such—though I followed him but imperfectly—was the charm of his oratory that I could have sat there, under an image and on the steps of an altar, long enough to hear him; as, alive to the importance in preaching of the three P's, as they have been called, he proved, painted, and persuaded. No doubt his gesticulations, which were thoroughly Italian, seemed occasionally outré, but it was real oratory, effective and affecting preaching; and I thought it were well if some of our narrow-minded ecclesiastics, instead of indulging in unmeasured denunciations of the Church of Rome and shutting their eyes to everything good out of their own denomination, would go themselves, and use their influence to send out students, to see such specimens of pulpit preaching. I saw no wandering eyes—none asleep, or even holding down their heads.

But for Dr. Guthrie the main interest of Florence naturally centres in Savonarola, of whose career we have a sympathetic and fairly accurate sketch, though it is coloured by the ordinary Protestant blunder of making him a precursor of Luther, which attains its most grotesque form in the Luther Monument at Worms, where the Dominican stands with his monastic habit and shaven crown, in very uncongenial companionship, as one of the four supporters of the great Protestant hero. It was reserved, however, for Dr. Guthrie to make him, not only the forerunner of Luther, but the successor of Leo the Isaurian, who "destroyed the images of Christ, the Virgin, and the Saints," which is the very last thing Savonarola would have dreamt of doing. But as we read on the next page of "the matters treated of by the Council of Vienna," and the efforts of "the Cardinal Julien at the Council of Basle," it is clear that the author's views of ecclesiastical history are derived from sources inaccessible to the general public, which it would therefore be rash to criticize. A similar reflection is suggested by his citation of the prayer of a Dominican monk—"Salvum fac populum tuum, et benedice hereditati tue"—which is hardly accordant with the version of the Breviary in common use. But we must make a passing protest against Dr. Guthrie's comparison of Savonarola, whose "breadth and tenderness of sympathy" he justly dwells upon, to the coarse and brutal John Knox, who is rather oddly described as wringing tears from Queen Mary, and "the liberties of his country from her bloody hand." Is it possible the author has confounded Mary Stuart with her Tudor namesake? This is the first time we have seen the epithet applied to the Scottish Queen.

At Venice our tourist is greatly impressed with St. Mark's, and, like most English travellers, he visits the Armenian convent. A city which was notable in former days for bearding the Pope, and where, as we are assured, a wonderful success has attended "the preaching of the Gospel" by Gavazzi and others since the expulsion of the Austrians, has of course special claims on so staunch a Protestant. But it is a little strange to find him passing over without any mention the Tintoretto's in so many of its churches, and the glorious Assumption of Titian in the picture gallery. Perhaps he was in too great a hurry to reach the "Waldensian valleys," which occupy his closing chapters. The Waldenses, who had been formed into a religious order by Peter Waldo towards the close of the twelfth century, after the refusal of Alexander III. to recognize their rule seceded from the Church. They were no doubt a much more respectable body than the Albigenses, with whom they are often confounded, and who reproduced and improved upon the worst abominations of the Manichees.

but to speak of them as handing down the "apostolical succession" of the primitive Church from time immemorial is simply absurd. Dr. Guthrie's description of their present state is interesting, though we should hardly have selected as the chief recommendation of their ritual the usage of reading out the Ten Commandments every Sunday. It is creditable, however, to his elasticity of mind that he admires, and even desiderates in his own communion, the use or partial use of a liturgical service, and objects to preaching being made a substitute for prayer. He may be pardoned for his somewhat childish raptures at hearing the Pope openly denounced by Garibaldi's chaplain, "in a land once crimsoned with the blood of martyrs;" but his pages would be none the less interesting if they were a little less rubricated, so to speak, by this perpetual infusion of martyr blood, which comes in, like the British Constitution in Burke's speeches, to fill up every vacuum. "Shrieks of mothers and babes murdered by Papists," "russian soldiery of the Pope," and "sucklings impaled on their cruel spears," are very sad reminiscences no doubt, but it is possible to hear too much of them. And would it not be worth while to remember that, if only Papists persecuted in the middle ages, when they alone had the power, Protestants have been in later times by no means remiss in following so bright an example? It is quite true, as our author remarks, that any attempt in this day to rekindle the fires of Smithfield would raise from most—he might have said all—Roman Catholic countries a cry of indignation. And it is equally true that no such cry rose three centuries ago from any single Protestant country when the stake was lighted by Protestant hands, at the bidding of the greatest but one of Protestant Reformers, to burn the Socinian Servetus. "The claws of the tiger are clipped," happily, or the heretical lamb might have little less to fear from the tender mercies of Exeter Hall than of the Vatican.

SCRAPS ON PRIMEVAL ANTIQUITIES.*

A NUMBER of what we hope it is not irreverent to call scraps on this or that special subject—little books, papers reprinted from the Transactions of Societies, and the like—have a way of gathering on the reviewer's table till he has the materials of making an article out of several of them together, none of which perhaps would have justified a separate notice by itself. Mr. Sutherland's Outlines come under the head of independent little books, and a very sensible little book this one is. Our other scraps are more literally scraps, being papers read before Societies, which we suppose are not, strictly speaking, published in this separate form, but which have come to us in the way of business nevertheless. Lieutenant Oliver's paper has his name in print, but we are not told from what Transactions it comes. Colonel Leslie's papers are anonymous as far as the art of the printer goes, but a manuscript note on our copies tells us whose they are, and that they were read "in the Anthropological Department of the British Association," on the 4th and 5th of August, 1871. A comparison of the Lieutenant and the Lieutenant-Colonel might make one think that promotion in the army at all events does not go by proficiency in archaeological studies. The Colonel is decidedly flighty; the junior officer—to be sure he is L.A., a disciple of the "Heppo balistarius" of Domestday—gives us a piece of honest, careful, and sensible work. All our writers take us among the Celts and the men of the old time before the Celts; but while Colonel Leslie and Mr. Sutherland keep in the northern part of the Greater Britain, Lieutenant Oliver carries us beyond sea into the Lesser. All three have got hold, more or less firmly, of the comparative method of inquiry, though the Colonel seems to be still airing the discovery with all the zeal of a first acquaintance:—

By a great philological authority we are told that there was a time when the ancestors of Celts and Germans, Greeks, Romans, and Slavonians, lived in Asiatic regions, and in close communion with the predecessors of the Persians and Hindus, and that this time was previous to the first appearance of any of the European branches of the Aryan race in Europe.

Colonel Leslie's chief object seems to be to prove that the stone circles and the like are not sepulchral but religious—that is, that they are actual temples; for, in a wide sense of the word, anything sepulchral may among most nations be called religious also. In so doing he shows a much greater knowledge both of Picts and of Phœnicians than we can pretend to, and he seems anxious moreover to run himself into great danger by getting into a dispute with the best authority on Scottish antiquities. We do not envy the fate of any one who knocks his head against Mr. Stuart and the Sculptured Stones of Scotland. There are certain sculptures which Colonel Leslie thinks good to call Pictish, and which, according to him, "exhibit traces of a Phœnician or Asiatic origin." We will not quarrel with the phrase "Phœnician or Asiatic," because it seems at least to show that Colonel Leslie has grasped the fact, which many people find it very hard to grasp, that Phœnicians once dwelt at Carthage and Gades as well as Tyre and Sidon. The other view is that these marks were signs of "family descent, tribal rank, or official dignity," in short, that they represented

"personal ornaments." Colonel Leslie, with praiseworthy curiosity, asks how these personal ornaments "were fixed on our naked ancestors." May we suggest the possibility of a naked ancestor having been tattooed, and remind Colonel Leslie of the existence of bracelets, earrings, and even nose-jewels? But the nakedness of his ancestors is a point to which the Colonel comes, seemingly with some satisfaction, more than once. We know not Colonel Leslie's pedigree, Pictish or otherwise. So we can only say, Speak for yourself, Colonel Leslie; our ancestors wore very decent breeches at least as long ago as the time of Trajan.

Mr. Sutherland's very clear and useful little book is designed to meet a practical object. "There are many," he says, "especially country people, who have by their own observation collected many facts and objects which are in a great measure lost for want of a few hints as to their meaning and use." This is true both in Scotland and elsewhere; and any one who, like Mr. Sutherland, puts together the results of scientific inquiry in a shape suited "to those who have not access to larger works," is doing a real service. Mr. Sutherland has worked in the wake of Professor Daniel Wilson and of Mr. Stuart, "whose archaeological knowledge may be considered as practically exhaustive." He carefully distinguishes between the facts gathered from these trustworthy sources and some "Speculations" at the end for which he himself is alone responsible. But Mr. Sutherland's speculations are modest enough, and show good appreciation of the comparative method. The following remarks strike us as extremely thoughtful and to the purpose:—

In dealing with these Archaeological Remains, the question very naturally arises as to the mode and means of their construction. The Cairn and the Mound are the results of labour and nothing more; but how were the immense blocks of the Standing Stones, and Cromlechs, and the like, moved, often from a distance, and then raised into position? In the present age of powerful and complicated machinery, we do not perhaps fully realize the effects of the simple mechanical powers when worked with patience and an adequate expenditure of labour. Our machines save time rather than increase force; and when the Megalithic Monuments were erected, time was of little value. With an inclined plane of earth, and wooden levers, and sufficient supply of men, and unlimited time, the aggregate result is out of all apparent proportion to individual effort. Union and perseverance and unlimited time are the secret of the immense labours of primitive man. A similar explanation may be given of the finer works of early ages. These are often so elegant in form, and so excellent in workmanship, that we can scarcely believe them to be the work of a rude people, without culture, and without anything that we would dignify with the name of tools. Commonly their beauty lies in the simplicity and freedom of design; and their execution is due to the immediate application of the workman's hand, a more delicate and pliable instrument than man has yet invented. The Hindoo artisan, sitting by the wayside, with a few rude tools not superior to those of an ordinary tinker, executes work more delicate than that of the European goldsmith, with "all means and appliances to boot," and at a cheaper rate; for the construction is regulated by the sensitive touch of his hand, and his valueless time is freely lavished on his work.

It is no less to the point when he says:—

What Druidism was is very obscure beyond the simple fact that it was a different system from the religion of Ancient Rome. The elaborate explications of Druidism brought forward in the 17th century are chiefly fancy sketches, and held their ground only so long as no one inquired on what foundation they rested.

Mr. Sutherland contends, as indeed Colonel Leslie does also, for the existence of a pre-Aryan race in Britain, the authors of the earliest remaining monuments, clearly distinguishing, what so many people find it hard to distinguish, between ancestors and predecessors. He argues on behalf of a long "Archæological Period," meaning thereby a pre-historic period; for Mr. Sutherland uses the word "archæological" in a way which strikes us as peculiar, and which is the exact opposite to its French use, in which it has got almost exclusively to mean mediæval architecture. He has also some good remarks on the extinction of animals, as a process still going on, and on the probability of many of the extinct animals having existed much longer than we are sometimes inclined to think. Perhaps, however, it would not be safe to carry this argument so far as to explain thereby the appearance of the elephant on the sculptured stones. The beast seemingly is an elephant. As drawn, he goes far to realize the light-of-nature description of that wonderful quadruped as a beast "with a tail at each end and never a head." Our elephant proudly tosses both his hindmost tail and his trunk, but his head and his tusks are held downwards in a lowly fashion. His legs and feet moreover are drawn in a way which by no means answers the popular description of "the elephant that boweth not the knee." He is more like the elephant whom a correspondent of the Spectator—we mean Steele and Addison's Spectator—saw kneel down at Bartholomew Fair to take the ingenious Mr. William Penkethman on his back. Colonel Leslie looks on the elephant, as well as some of the other figures, as "emblems of astral myths or atmospheric phenomena." Mr. Sutherland discreetly declines to commit himself to theories which he cannot prove. For our own part, considering the early times to which some Scottish pedigrees run up, we might have been tempted to see in the "olifant" a compliment to some primeval Laird of Gask, only we believe that the older form of the name is "Olfard," and that the pachydermatous spelling came in only in the late and dangerous times of William Wallace and King Edward.

Mr. Sutherland goes in a thoroughly clear and orderly way through the whole range of Scottish primeval antiquities, and his book seems to us entirely suited to the purpose for which he designed it. Lieutenant Oliver's contribution is a paper, and not a book; but he goes through his subject in a most business-like way, giving the results of his own inquiries made in company with Sir * Ancient Megalithic Sculptures. By Lieutenant-Colonel Forbes Leslie. Cornwall & Sons, Printers, Aberdeen.

Megalithic Sculptures. By Lieutenant-Colonel Forbes Leslie. Cornwall & Sons, Printers, Aberdeen.

On the Primeval Remains in Brittany. By Lieutenant S. P. Oliver, R.A.

Outlines of Scottish Archaeology. By Rev. G. Sutherland, A.M. Edinburgh: Blackwood & Douglas. 1870.

Henry Dryden, and also of the earlier researches in Brittany and elsewhere of Dr. Thurnam, Mr. Lukis, and Mr. Barnwell. He has his speculations, and he is strong in favour of the sepulchral as against the religious theory, a point on which his companion Sir Henry Dryden, seems less certain. Starting from the fact, which no reasonable person now doubts, that the cromlechs and other smaller sepulchral stone chambers are simply tumuli—may we say stumps?—from which the earth and small stones which covered them have fallen away, Lieutenant Oliver goes so far as to suggest that the like has been the case with the larger objects of the same class:—

We venture to suggest that the circles of stone in Brittany and elsewhere may be looked upon as the possible remains of colossal "peristylæ," the sole indications of gigantic tumuli which may formerly have filled their interior space, and which have now disappeared by atmospheric, aqueous, and human agencies during the lapse of centuries. Nor need we much wonder if no trace of the actual sepulchral chambers within be left, when we consider that the largest tumuli have generally been found to contain the most insignificant remains; besides, it is far from improbable that the builders of the huge mounds, such as those at Mont St. Michel, &c., in the immediate neighbourhood of the lines and circles, constructed their barrows from the material afforded by the debris of the more ancient tumuli within the circles.

He carefully compares the remains in Brittany with those in Wiltshire, or Dartmoor, and elsewhere, and other inquirers have pointed out that cromlechs, or something very like them, go on to this day being raised in some parts of India; he also points out that something which may pass as an ornamented form of the megalithic remains of Brittany is still in use in China, and that for sepulchral purposes:—

We read that the great tomb (the Ling or resting-place of Yung-Lo, of the Ming dynasty), thirty miles from Peking, consists of an enormous mound or earth-barrow, covered with trees. Its height is not mentioned, but it is evidently considerable, from the fact that the circular wall which surrounds it is a mile in circumference. In the centre of the mound is a stone chamber containing the sarcophagus in which is the corpse. This chamber or vault is approached by an arched tunnel, the entrance to which is bricked up. This entrance is approached by a paved causeway, passing through numerous arches, gateways, courts, and halls of sacrifice, and through a long avenue of colossal marble figures, sixteen pairs of wolves, kelpies, horses, camels, elephants, and twelve pairs of warriors, priests, and civil officers.

It is quite possible that avenues of rough stones might, in process of time, be improved into avenues of sculptured figures of this kind. Lieutenant Oliver goes on to mention other Chinese examples where, "although not covered by artificial tumuli, the sepulchral chambers are excavated in the side of the natural hills, whilst those belonging to high officials are approached through avenues of stone pillars and carved figures, animal and human, though on a much smaller scale than those of Peking and Nankin." Dr. Thurnam again is quoted as suggesting the possibility of Stonehenge itself having been roofed in.

In all these inquiries the wider our range of examples is the better. Forms exactly like one another are found in places the most distant from one another. It may be simply that nations, whether connected or not, produce works of a certain kind at a certain stage of their progress. This undoubtedly accounts for many cases of likeness between very remote times and places. But other cases seem decidedly to point to community of origin. Many things join together to suggest that these puzzling monuments are the works of a pre-Aryan race, traces of which may be found, perhaps in all three continents, certainly in Europe and Asia. How far we are to identify them with existing Lapps or Basques is another matter. For strictly historical purposes the negative argument is perhaps enough. Here is a good bit of argument of Lieutenant Oliver's:—

Now if the Veneti or their progenitors erected the menhirs and dolmens, it is naturally to be supposed that their descendants, the modern Morbihanais, would have handed down by tradition the true sepulchral character of these remains; instead of which we find that the construction of their chambered barrows is universally attributed by their folk-lore to the Keris and Twa, the mischievous elves and benevolent fairies; therefore these dolmen mounds would appear to have been constructed by a race who inhabited a large portion of America west of Vauxes, previous to the Veneti; so we must now assign the avenues and circles of amorpholites to a yet more ancient pre-Celtic race, not aboriginal, but probably intruders from the north and Scandinavia, of whom these long-lasting rough stone masses alone remain as memorials of their existence.

We have, we think, said enough to show that two of our inquirers are inquirers of the right sort. We shall be glad to hear more for either of them; and meanwhile there is the larger work of Mr. Ferguson on the same class of subjects calling for our best attention.

REDLANDS.*

THIS story is very moral and very dull. The lesson that it teaches is no doubt sound enough, but unfortunately, like many another lesson, it will never win the attention of those for whom it is meant. Miss Bowra writes what we may call a sermon-novel on bad temper and the sufferings that attend it. It would certainly be an excellent training for any young lady as peevish as the heroine to read through the eight or nine hundred somewhat closely printed pages of these two volumes. But we feel sure that if her temper was really bad, she would throw down the book in impatience long before she had reached even the part where sufferings begin to gather thick round the still hardened girl, and still longer before she had seen how the penitence that arises from suffering is rewarded by a husband, wealthy in himself, and with a still wealthier bachelor uncle. So moral a story will no doubt find many readers; but, unfortunately, readers of that excellent sort who, having no bad temper to cure, will derive from it merely matter for self-satisfaction. They will congratulate themselves once more that they are not as other girls are, though when, in the last chapter, the ill-tempered heroine at last somewhat suddenly gets the good husband, they may perhaps be inclined to ask whether after all a little bad temper may not be a good thing just to make a start with. In these moral novels there is always the great drawback that the prize gained at the end of the course is a prize bestowed on one who made a bad start. Moreover, the reward is so inseparably connected with the errors of the first volume, that it appears to be quite as much owing to these as to the virtues of the last volume that the prize is gained. The result therefore of reading these pious prosings, if we may so venture to describe such stories as the one before us, would be that the young reader who was anxious to gain that common reward of penitence, a good and wealthy husband, might think it advisable to begin by rousing penitence necessary. With a few more such stories on temper as this, every father will find his daughters becoming neglectful of their home duties and indulging in ill-temper, and, on his mildly remonstrating, will be informed that they are merely preparing themselves for a short amount of suffering, to be followed by a still shorter penitence and lifelong rewards. In morals, as in other matters, we shall have to say, with the French, il faut reculer pour mieux sauter.

Passing from these somewhat general considerations to the story before us, we must do Miss Bowra the justice to admit that her novel is free from two faults which are by no means uncommon among lady novelists. She neither indulges in those extravagant scenes which are known as sensational, nor has she written, as authors have often written whose morals are quite as lofty, a single line of which she or her readers need be ashamed. The plot of the story, absurd though it is in the legal part, is not altogether without interest. If any one, after having read the first fifty pages or so, were then to try reading one paragraph in every alternate page, it is quite possible that he might be tempted to go on to the end. After all, so given to matchmaking is the whole human race, that if in a story there are piled up hindrances to the marriage of any young couple, the writer must be dull indeed who cannot, just as a stoppage in a street gathers a crowd, keep his readers about him in their eagerness to see how the hindrances will be cleared away at last, and virtue be rewarded by Hyacin. Miss Bowra, like many another lady novelist, seeks in an eccentric will the chief part of her plot. We hope that the day will come when no author will venture in fiction to meddle with law without first consulting his solicitor. We should not indeed be surprised if there were to arise some day or other a special branch of the profession devoted entirely to giving advice to novelists on legal matters. We have long had fictions in law; it would be well to have law in fictions. "The conditions" of the will before us are described as being "easy enough to arrange with the pen." How easy they were will be seen by the author's own description of them:—

To Henry Murray, whom he professed to regard as his heir, he did indeed leave his fortune, amounting to 40,000l. a year, with all else of which he died possessed; but on condition that he married one or other of his cousins, Louisa Wainwright or Caroline Percival; and he further directed that the unmarried god-child should be paid the sum of 15,000l. on the marriage of the other. Should the cousin selected decline the proposed marriage, Henry was free to keep all; but should he refuse to fulfil the condition imposed, the money was to be divided among different hospitals, at the discretion of the Trustees.

Eccentric though this will was, still more eccentric was the reason that led to it. The mother of Caroline Percival, the heroine, had written to Mr. Mark Hunter to ask him to do something for her daughter, his god-child, and he apparently had seen no better way of helping her and his favourite nephew, Henry Murray, at the same time than by making this strange will. (Given such a will as this, and a highly moral, if not priggish, nephew on the one hand, and a beautiful but ill-tempered girl on the other hand, and it is not difficult to arrange an almost endless series of complications, quarrels, sermons, and remorse. When we add that, in addition to all this, the heroine has a drunken father, an evil genius in the shape of her fashionable cousin Louisa Wainwright, a highly honourable country parson for her brother-in-law, and a somewhat unscrupulous country parson for her lover, our readers will at once admit that we have the materials for a great deal of sound Sunday reading. Miss Bowra, indeed, in a long discussion on the observance of the Sabbath, proves the soundness of Sunday novel-reading altogether. The hero on his first introduction to the heroine reads her and her father, his uncle, a sharp lecture on their disregard of that day, having on a visit to their house surprised the heroine after church "poring over a book," which turned out to be a novel. He points out that on Sunday "we require to pause and, as it were, shake off the dust that has settled down, and plume our wings to enable us to rise above the earth, where we have been creeping." We venture to say that even Mr. Henry Murray would not have objected to such a work as Redlands, which has indeed all the merits of a sermon, and few of the drawbacks of a story. In fact, if such passages as the one we will now quote are not in sermon, they ought to be. Many a curate who is piecing together his next Sunday's discourse would find numbers of passages quite as suitable as this to insert bodily:—

* Redlands, or, Home Temper. By Harriette Bowra. 2 vols. London: Hoddin & Stroughton. 1872.

Misfortunes, in the general acceptance of the term, are sometimes messengers of mercy, and have a special mission to perform; but when ill-success or constant failure pursues a man's footsteps through life, it would be well to look below the surface of events, and try to trace them to their spring. In many cases the fault is with himself. There is a traitor in the camp, something defective in his views, an injudicious adaptation of means to the end proposed. There may be some failing he will not mend, some forbidden indulgence he will not resign, some one exertion he will not make, or some quality he will not acquire.

There are certainly, if we may rely on Miss Bowra's assertion, some lighter passages which would perhaps be judged scarcely grave enough reading for anything but a week day. She tells us on one occasion that the heroine, "fluttering gaily about her cousin, was ever ready to catch the ball at the rebound, and fling back the sparkling repartee," and she often mentions that there was jesting and laughter. At the same time we feel in justice bound to allow that the repartees and jests are never reported, and that, though the characters often certainly did laugh, yet, as far as we could see, it was most inexcusable conduct on their part. In addition to the serious qualities of the book, it can boast of a minute accuracy in details which cannot but have a most happy effect in training up young readers in the strictest truthfulness. It is all very well for a poet to burst in upon you with "a chieftain to the Highlands bound." A more scrupulously accurate writer would have taken at least two whole volumes, if not half the third, before he allowed the young couple to arrive at the shores of the loch. It is scarcely consistent with a love of exactness, certainly it is not respectful to the reader, not first to give an account of the ancestors of Lord Ullin's daughter and the chief of Ulva's Isle, and then to describe at due length the circumstances which led to this hurried flight. It would be necessary of course to give full particulars of the bride's dress, and of the limited trousseau which the hurried circumstances of the bridal trip required. It might be also mentioned that the heavier luggage had been sent on by the carrier, under the charge of the Chieftain's valet and the Honourable Miss Ullin's maid, whose absence in the poem, as it at present stands, is only too conspicuous. In pleasing contrast with such poetic abruptness is a passage such as the following, which is a fine example of the laborious accuracy of the whole story:—

Crossing over to the entrance near which Mr. Murray still stood, Miss Heywood proposed going home. He willingly assented; and, after calling the fly, went to fetch his cousin from the group among which she was sitting. She rose with reluctance.

On taking leave, Lady Bailey expressed a desire to cultivate a more intimate acquaintance, and promised to call upon her in a day or two. As the Beauchamps left at the same time, the two parties walked away together. The horses and the Redlands' fly were in waiting; and, while Mr. Beauchamp said a few last words to his companion, Henry offered to send his sister; an offer she gladly accepted, saying he was more expert than her brother. When he turned to help his own party, Caroline was already seated in the carriage, and Robert was on the box.

We cannot but think that Miss Bowra might have killed two birds with one stone, if she had insisted as much on the drunken habits of the father as on the bad temper of the daughter. We at once admit that she makes very great use of the brandy bottle, for unless the father had, after draining it, knocked down his daughter, broken an arm, put out the shoulder, and thrown her into "a rampant fever," it would have been scarcely possible for her to become good enough for her moral lover. Still an ill-looking intemperate father has quite as much need to be reformed as a good-looking, ill-tempered daughter; and if, as is the case, an excellent story has been written on the fact that "his mother drinks gin," we do not know why an equally excellent story should not be written on the fact that "her father drinks brandy." Something is certainly done by way of reform, but not nearly enough. We think that when a gentleman born, as was the heroine's father, has taken to drink, it is somewhat hard that while his daughter is allowed to reform and to marry an "interesting looking" man of fortune, the most that can be done with him is to allow him, "with the approbation of his family," to marry his cook, "who was aware of his failings, and knew how to manage him." Of course, if this had been a novel on temperance instead of on temper, the reformed drunkard would have had the chief prize, while other sinners would have picked up what was not required for him.

Accurate as Miss Bowra is on most points, we cannot congratulate her on her quotations. Even Longfellow, even the Psalm of Life, she can misquote: "Life is earnest, life is real," is not to be found among "those beautiful lines of Longfellow." On two occasions she would seem to be quoting Shakespeare—whether consciously or not we cannot pretend to say. When she writes "hew and shape events as we will," she can scarcely imagine she is altogether original; and yet, with all her love of amendment, she can scarcely be venturing to amend Shakespeare. We are fairly puzzled, however, when one of her characters suddenly breaks the silence with observing, with a comma curiously in excess, "The world is out, of course," and goes on to wish for a fairy's wand to make the crooked straight. There must, we presume, be some faint recollection of Hamlet's speech, though it is gratifying to notice that, so far from improper language being used, and rectitudes being expressed to set matters right, the speaker is most mild in the words he uses, and is anxious to reform things in general. Unhappily as we have had to judge of this work, happily there will be found quite enough very good and very dull passages to satisfy us thoroughly; and to praise the author as much as she could desire. She will not, therefore, we trust in the present case find in her own words that "life's highway is strewn with the debris of disenchantments, ruthlessly torn from us by the stern hand of experience."

CAPTAIN BURTON'S ZANZIBAR.*

THE two thick volumes before us are an addition to the literature of African travel by Captain Burton. They refer to the expedition undertaken by him in company with Captain Speke, which led to so many geographical results, and unfortunately also to a conspicuous illustration of the difficulty of brethren travelling together in unity. As Captain Burton reminds us, this journey has been the subject of four volumes published by himself; whilst it has been noticed in three others published by Grant and Speke. Perhaps the most natural question that will arise is, why a subject which might be supposed to have been exhausted should again be discussed more than ten years after the events to which it owed its principal interest. The answer, as explained in Captain Burton's preface, is that certain reports which he wrote at the time, and which were supposed by him to have been irretrievably lost, have only recently turned up; and he thinks it worth while to publish them, inasmuch as Zanzibar, the place to which they principally refer, is increasing in importance, and has not been adequately described. Besides this, Captain Burton apparently desires to relieve his mind upon various points, and has still something to say about his relations to Captain Speke, and upon various subsidiary matters. The result is the present book, which is marked by the author's usual qualities, but which we cannot conscientiously assert to be very interesting to the general reader, unless that person should be contemplating a trip to Zanzibar. If, according to the usual formula, one person should have been prevented from executing so rash a design, these pages will not have been written in vain. In other respects we find it rather hard to commend them to the world at large. They contain, indeed, a great deal of curious information as to the manners and customs of the natives. They abound in the usual vein of caustic and cynical remark by which Captain Burton delights to vindicate his cosmopolitan superiority to the prejudices of the untravelled Briton, to show his contempt for the commonplaces of missionaries, and to prove that he is capable of regarding with philosophical impartiality the peculiarities of Christian, Mahomedan, or heathen belief. When mentioning, for example, the practices of the African Mganga, or medicine-men, he points out that analogous superstitions are to be found amongst the Esquimaux, the inhabitants of Siberia, and the Indians of North and South America; that Irishmen and Fins and Hindu Jogis lay claim to similar powers; and he observes that "in civilization the last remnant of the barbarous belief is the practice of public prayers for rain, a process far less troublesome and not so efficacious as planting trees and preserving the land from being disforested." These little sallies, mixed with expressions of contempt for any unlucky geographer who happens to have disagreed with his theories, give a not unpleasant acidity to his pages. We may add, though it is comparatively a trifling remark, that some oddities of expression seem somehow to harmonize with the eccentricity of substance. Within a few pages, for example, we meet with such words as these:—a "fuyant" brow, a "chetif" body, the "querelle" of the frogs, the "coolth" of the steam, the "provaunt" on which his men subsist, and so on; phrases which savour of the same indifference to grammatical laws of propriety that he elsewhere exhibits to laws of more importance. In spite, however, of the character which is everywhere stamped upon Captain Burton's writing, he has a fault which goes far to spoil the effect of his peculiar idiom. He is, to speak plainly, unpleasantly long-winded. It is a fault to which African travellers are painfully liable. After spending a year in travelling three or four hundred miles, they are naturally inclined to bestow half-a-dozen pages on every mile. We can understand the temptation, and would be lenient accordingly; but the consequence is too often to make the reading nearly as heavy work as the travelling. Where there is really an exciting story to be told, the interest may carry us through without too much impatience; but in the book before us Captain Burton has really no story to tell. The expedition to Lake Tanganyika being omitted as already narrated, the whole book is devoted to what in an ordinary book of travels would merely furnish the introduction and the conclusion. The description of his starting-point fills nearly the whole of the first volume, and that of a preparatory expedition, together with his remarks upon Captain Speke, occupies the second. The consequence is that the shrewd sayings with which his pages are sprinkled are insufficient to keep up the attention of any one who has not a special knowledge of the subject. We shall confine ourselves to a few remarks on the most distinctive points.

The last chapter is devoted to a kind of brief biography of Captain Speke. Shortly after poor Speke's death, in 1864, Captain Burton was asked, as he tells us, to publish a sketch of his life and adventures; but at the time he "had hardly heart for the task." Certainly it might be doubted whether, under the unfortunate circumstances, Captain Burton would have been the best man to perform such a duty. The two fellow-travellers had become, as Captain Burton puts it, angry rivals, and when one of them was smothered away by a strange accident in the middle of the controversy, the other could scarcely reconcile the demands of sincerity and generosity when speaking over his fresh grave. We confess to a doubt whether the lapse of seven years has quite removed the obvious objections; but, if the thing was to be done at all, we have no great fault to find with Captain Burton's performance. He speaks warmly enough in general terms of Speke's energy, "temper, patience, single-mindedness," of his "earnest and indomitable pertinacity," and his "almost heroic determination." And yet the biography written by the rival reads of necessity almost as much like an indictment as a panegyric. In order to justify himself, Captain Burton is forced to dwell upon the shortcomings of his colleague, and to lay stress upon the wrongs which he conceives himself to have suffered. He is speaking, as we do not in the least doubt, precisely what he believes to be the unvarnished truth, and the portrait which he draws of Speke, if not showing marks of partiality, shows also no sign of temper or of posthumous hostility. It is to all appearance a frank explanation of the view taken of Speke by a shrewd observer who is not disposed to be lenient, but desires to be just. The only question is, whether it might not as well have been left unsaid. To Captain Burton the quarrel which deprived him of what he conceived to be his just claims as a discoverer doubtless has a greater importance than it will have to other people; but perhaps it would have been—we can hardly say more magnanimous—but in better taste, to leave the settlement of the question to other people. The facts are pretty well established by this time, and we do not perceive that Captain Burton adds anything of material importance. Whatever may be thought of the propriety of this conclusion to his volume, the chapter is interesting in itself, and is indeed, in our opinion, the best written part of the book.

* Zanzibar. By Richard F. Burton. London: Tinsley Brothers. 1872.

We turn to a very brief notice of some of the other points in these portly volumes, and perhaps it will be sufficient if we attempt to describe the delightful city of Zanzibar. The permanent population of this interesting place was, in 1857, about 25,000, rising to nearly double that amount by periodical influxes from the surrounding districts. The West end is comparatively decent, though we read disgusting accounts of the dead bodies and other disagreeable remains which lie about on the sands. Here, however, there is a gutter, whilst further back all signs of civilization vanish; the streets are variegated with green and black puddles, and "the festering impurities render strolling a task that requires some resolution, and the streets are unfit for a decent (white) woman to walk through." In front are certain simple mosques, and the houses of the superior Arab inhabitants are occasionally tolerable. There is a rude fort arranged so that a broadside would blow the wall into pieces, and every bullet which struck the fort would inevitably kill some of the gunners. It was once stormed successfully by a sailor, with a party consisting of a Newfoundland dog, who dispersed the garrison and endeavoured to liberate a couple of his comrades. The prison in which these persons were confined is "the beau-ideal of a prison—a place whose very name should develop the goose-skin, and which the Chinese significantly call 'hell.'" It used to be visited by foreigners in order to see what Captain Burton, in his peculiar language, calls the chief "curio" of the place—an unlucky native, accused of having been an accomplice in the murder of a Frenchman, who was chained to a gun in heavy irons in such a position that he could neither stand up nor lie down, and who remained there for twelve years. The native city in the rear consists of a hideous collection of pestiferous hovels; a lagoon almost surrounds the place at high tides, and when the waters retire they leave behind them a rich legacy of fevers and other terrible diseases. There are a few wells with tolerable drinking water; but the sites have to be frequently altered, as the form of the ground directs the drainage into them. When rain has not fallen for some time they become as thick as horseponds, and, as Captain Burton tells us, he could hardly bear to look at the women as they filled their jars from them. Dysentery and fever are the natural consequences of these arrangements to the inhabitants and to the ships which visit them. But, besides these nuisances, a veil of noxious gas overhangs the whole shore at low tides and after dark, owing to the deficient arrangements for drainage. The population which fills this detestable place is motley enough; there are Arabs, native Jews, Baloch merchants, half-breeds from the western shores of the Persian Gulf, and swarms of negroes, whose variety of origin is indicated to the experienced eye by the different tribal marks, where the artificial scars are strangely complicated with those left by all manner of diseases. Of these diseases Captain Burton gives a hideous list. No European, he says, should stay in the place more than three or four years, and we do not envy him if he stays so many. Careful directions are given as to the precautions by which diseases may be kept at bay, though not for more than a brief period. Drunkards, we may remark for the benefit of teetotallers, live longer than water-drinkers. Ague and fever may be avoided by sleeping under a blanket in a closed room; but Captain Burton doubts whether the effects of this mode of treatment are not worse than those of the fevers themselves. If bad for men, the climate is inevitably fatal to European women. Why, asks Captain Burton, should Englishmen poison or stab their wives when a few months at Zanzibar would do the business more quietly and effectually? Probably the expense is one objection. Meanwhile, men and women alike are subjected to all kinds of horrors. Contagious diseases which we regard with disgust, and which are attributable partly to the gross immorality of all the inhabitants, are so common as scarcely to be noticed. Elephantiasis afflicts twenty per cent. of the population, though Europeans escape. All kinds of ulcers and abscesses are common. Fever of course is rampant, and leaves behind it a long series of evil consequences. Pulmonary diseases of various kinds abound. Small-pox is terribly fatal, and disfigures half the population. Cholera was unknown till 1859; but in that year Captain Burton, returning from the interior, found that it had broken out, and he gives a hideous description of the sights which greeted him at a place called Kilwa, on the coast. Corpses lay about in every direction, and "the smooth oily water was dotted with remnants and fragments of humanity; black and brown when freshly thrown in; patched, mottled, and particoloured when in a state of half pickle; and ghastly white, like scalded pigs, when the pigmentum nigrum had become thoroughly macerated." In 1870 the plague appeared again, and one-third of the entire population is said to have been swept away. On the whole, Zanzibar strikes us as scarcely an eligible place of residence even for gentlemen who are anxious to get rid of wives; if, however, any one resolves upon going there, he may find in Captain Burton's work a great mass of information, geographical, meteorological, historical, anthropological, and other, which must make it useful as a handbook, though scarcely light reading for the general public.

BARING-GOULD'S LEGENDS OF OLD TESTAMENT CHARACTERS.*

THE readers of Mr. Baring-Gould's pleasant volumes on curious mediæval myths, and of his valuable contributions to Mr. Henderson's work on the folklore of the Northern English counties, will expect to receive not less of instruction and delight from this collection of Talmudic and Mahometan legends which have clustered round certain characters of the Old Testament. Nor will they on the whole be disappointed. They will find here a large number of stories grouped under the names of the persons to whom they relate, together with an immense number of Aryan and other myths to which they are supposed to bear some resemblance; and they will also find references to the books from which Mr. Baring-Gould has taken them. In this respect his volumes may be contrasted favourably with M. de Planey's Legends of the Old Testament, which, for lack of such references, he found to be of little or no use in his task, and also with some graver historical works which still receive considerably more than their due share of authority.

But if Mr. Baring-Gould's readers look for that critical or scientific treatment of legends of which his previous works gave good promise, they will, we fear, come to the conclusion that he has gone back rather than forward, and will experience the unpleasant feeling of being in the hands of a guide who shows himself uncertain as to the track which he ought to follow. Here and there they will come across passages which seem to imply that popular stories are things which may be treated scientifically, and that they have a relation to language which it is not safe to neglect; more often they will see the legends of Jews, Mahometans, Buddhists, of Aryan, Turanian, and Semitic nations or tribes, brought together apparently for no clear purpose, and certainly not for the establishment of any definite conclusion. Amongst the stories dissected in the Curious Myths of the Middle Ages are some which Mr. Baring-Gould has handled with the legitimate confidence of a man who knows that when traditions of different tribes exhibit in the same sequence a series of extraordinary or impossible incidents, and when moreover they have a distinct philological connexion through the names which occur in them, these traditions may be grouped in classes, and furnish a prima facie ground for thinking that similar tales in which the philological connexion cannot be traced may be classified in like manner. In this way the legends of St. Ursula and Tanhäuser, of Schamir and of the Swan Maidens, were made to furnish some noteworthy results. The conclusions might be right or wrong, but Mr. Baring-Gould had no hesitation in giving his reasons for thinking that Ursula with her eleven thousand virgins is the moon attended by her myriad stars, the Asterodia who wanders on her starry pathway among the fifty children of Endymion, the sleeping sun, the Venus who reappears as the charmer of Tanhäuser in Ursula's hill, the Horselberg, and of True Thomas in the secret places of Ercildoune. Even where, as in the myth of Tell, he spoke more diffidently, the work of placing the evidence on both sides before the reader was fairly done; while the large number of intricate myths which were reduced to the simple elements asserted by comparative mythologists to be the groundwork of all primitive myths seemed to warrant the inference that the method might be applied to all legends, in the absence of special reasons for holding it to be inapplicable. If we open the present volumes with this expectation, we shall soon discover that Mr. Gould's trumpet gives a very uncertain sound indeed.

As a class, the Talmudic and Mahometan legends labour under this disadvantage, that, although they may contain a good deal of really old matter, they are on the whole comparatively modern, and are so far the result of mere arbitrary manufacture as to bring the whole body of such stories into grave suspicion. But if Mr. Baring-Gould seems to decline the task of discriminating in each between the more ancient and the more modern tales, he throws the subject into further uncertainty, and may seriously mislead readers by expressions which seem to imply that the legends springs from Jewish traditions, just as not very long ago common belief, not yet wholly dead, that all languages were derived from the Hebrew. It is unfortunate that these passages should in some instances suggest questions which our author might find it embarrassing to answer. From Anastasius of Sinai he cites the tradition that when men saw how the face of Seth shone with divine light, and heard him speak with divine wisdom, they said "He is God!" and therefore his sons were commonly called the sons of God; and his comment is that, "as Seth was an ancient Egyptian sun-god, the origin of the myth of his shining face can be ascertained without difficulty" (i. 24). But if the story of the Adamite Seth be a solar myth, we need a reason to show why the same story, when related of Moses, may not be a solar myth also; and if, on the other hand, the Jewish tradition has the priority, then it is not easy to see why Egyptians should choose for their god the name of one of the sons of Adam and Eve, and why, in turn, a myth relating to this sun-god should be fastened on the Adamite Seth.

* Legends of Old Testament Characters. By the Rev. M.A. London: Macmillan & Co. 1872.

The same uncertainty runs through the section which treats of the Fall of the Angels. Having given first "the Catholic theory of this fall," which "historically is represented as a war in heaven," Mr. Baring-Gould relates the Talmudic legends of Samael or Satan and his four wives (of whom the first, Lilith, is also said to have been the first wife of Adam), and then adds that, "among the heathen traditions of the Angelic apostasy and war have remained." Among such traditions he notices those of Mahisasura, and Ahiriman, of Loki, Typhon, Kronos, Hephaistos, and the smith Wayland. Mr. Gould's readers are surely entitled to know his meaning. Are these legends cited as being actually "traditions of the Angelic apostasy and war" of which the Talmudic stories speak, and which of course refer to the war between Michael and Satan spoken of in the Old and the New Testament? If so, the Hebrew tradition is not only the oldest, but is actually the source from which all the other traditions here brought together have been derived. We can but ask for some evidence for a conclusion so astonishing, while we may fairly suspect that a closer examination of "the tradition" might furnish a clue to the answer. In Mr. Gould's words—

The Indian story is as follows:—

At the head of the apostate spirits is Mahisasura, or the great Asur; he and those who followed him were once good, but before the creation of the world they refused obedience to Brahma, wherefore they were cast down by the assistance of Shiva into the abyss of Onderah. Mahisasura is also represented as the great serpent Vritra, against which Indra fought, and which, after a desperate struggle, he overcame.

From this it would seem that the story of Mahisasura and that of Indra and Vritra may be regarded as to all intents and purposes the same, and that the one is as old as the other, or that there is no particular reason for giving precedence to either. This, it may be safely said, is an inadequate and slipshod mode of dealing with the subject, and one which, if applied to the ascertainment of physical facts, would render the growth of any science impossible, for it consists simply in not observing all the phenomena. The very phrase "the Indian story" betrays the root of the evil. Not an effort is made to distinguish between the various forms which the myth assumes; not a hint is given of any differences which distinguish the mythology of the oldest Vedic songs from the latest extravagances of Hindu belief. The seeming unconsciousness of the enormous difficulties which are thus quietly put aside is amazing. If all Hindu traditions are to be regarded as on a par, we are bound to begin by giving our reasons for denying the priority of the Rig Veda to the Puranas; if we shrink from this, or admit it to be impossible, we have a starting-point from which we may go on to deal with the myth. But as soon as we enter on this path, we find that in the most ancient records of the Aryan race not one word is said of spirits who, originally created good, are thrust into the bottomless pit for their pride and rebellion; while, instead of this, we have a great struggle between Indra and Vritra, of the nature of which no one who has the least acquaintance with the subject has the faintest doubt. The songs themselves speak with unequivocal clearness of the battle between Indra, the god who refreshes the earth with rain, and Vritra, the demon who shuts up the waters in his prison-house. Whether under these names, or with those of Ahi or the Panis, of this struggle, and of this alone, they speak. One solitary sentence alone seems to furnish the germ of that moral and spiritual meaning which, never attached to the myth in the land of the Five Streams, grew on Iranian soil into a system of theology to the influence of which it is not easy to place limits. It is unnecessary to go further. The only reason for saying so much is the need of showing that vast masses of traditions, the result of generations and centuries, and exhibiting frequently points of wide difference, cannot be spoken of as the Indian or the Persian or the Norse story. Still less can all these be huddled together with a number of Rabbinical and Mahometan legends, and dismissed with the remark, "How far they refer to a tradition common to the human race, and how far they relate to the strife between summer and winter, sun and storm cloud, I do not pretend to decide." On Mr. Baring-Gould's ground that the heathen traditions represent the Jewish traditions of the Angelic apostasy and war, there can be no doubt as to the answer. In this case the notion of the physical spoken of in the Vedic songs is a comparatively recent addition into legends which spoke originally of something different. It is enough to say that the difficulties of this theory are difficulties of our author's making, and would disappear before the honest effort to note the facts of the case. He has unfortunately chosen a path which seems smooth at first, but which will leave us entangled in impenetrable thickets. One of these snarls lies in the last "identification." Djemachid "is probably to be identified with Tubal-cain" (i. 99). Xisuthrus "is the same as the Biblical Noah" (i. 119). "Zerovanos is the same as Zoroaster" (120) and "Herorus supposed that Ham was the same as Zoroaster" (138). Lastly, "the names Vulcan and Volundr bear some affinity to Tubal-cain; for, cutting off Tu, we have Balcain or Vulcan" (103). If we are allowed to do this, we may identify the Caribbean Luogno with the Norse Loki without being at the trouble of cutting off anything at all.

We have had no scruple in speaking thus plainly of the faults of this book, partly because Mr. Baring-Gould is not likely to be readers, but chiefly because he does himself injustice by assuming the place which he might fill to the great benefit of mythological and historical science. As it is, the reader is tempted to ask why, if no clear result is to be looked for, so vast a number of Aryan, Turanian, or other myths should be brought together in a book treating of traditions with which it is not shown that they have anything to do. But while he may regret that Mr. Baring-Gould has not done more with his materials, he will not deny their abundance, and it will be to his own loss if he foregoes the pleasure and the profit of reading these entertaining volumes.

CALL'S GOLDEN HISTORIES.*

MR. CALL apologizes for this volume of small poems by quoting a couplet from Walter Savage Landor:—

The birds have different voices, yet we hear
To hear those sing which do not sing the best.

The weakness of the analogy makes it a dangerous one to use, as the birds do in reality all reach excellence in their respective kinds and the difference between bird and bird is rather that between the violin and the triangle in an orchestra than between poet and poet; moreover, to sing is a very different thing from publishing. Yet, in spite of this weakness, and in spite of the degree to which volumes of minor verse tax one's endurance just now, we should not be disposed to follow Professor Ruskin in his well-known sweeping condemnation of all metrical writing which is not of the highest and best order. Metrical writing has more than one side to it; and if it sometimes reaches an almost divine level, giving exercise to the supreme efforts of human genius, it has also a low and (as it were) a kind of professional field, where scholarship and culture and disciplined facility not only have a right to work, but may and do succeed in producing genuine pleasure. The mischief is that this field is constantly overrun by people who bring neither scholarship, nor culture, nor discipline to their work, nor anything else in many cases but unlimited assurance, and the feeblest of all hankerings after distinction. It is only fair to Mr. Call to say that he does not belong to this objectionable fraternity of verse writers. If his book cannot be ranked among those which add to the sum of actual poetry, it may take a respectable place among volumes that are best described as carefully worked protests in behalf of culture, and which sometimes do good service by leading a reader to compositions higher than themselves.

What really causes surprise in a collection like Golden Histories is the question how the writer could have found pleasure in producing before the public eye a series of minor poems which while possessing many merits of their own, are perpetually suggesting and impressing on the attention unfavourable contrasts on one side with the work of Keats, on another with the work of Wordsworth. For instance, The Legend of Ariadne, which fills nearly a quarter of this book, was clearly written many years ago under the strong influence of Keats's Endymion. The whole conception of the legend is moulded on the Endymion; Ariadne, after the departure of Theseus, pines, as the Latinian shepherd pined with a longing which nothing but the superhuman will satisfy being in the end translated to the skies, as he was; and when Peona, the consoling sister, was to Endymion, the same is Phodra to Ariadne. The mystic scenery, the attempt to correct a certain vagueness in the story by a succession of highly coloured effects, the mixture of a mildly transcendental insight with the simplicity of the old heroic and legendary characters are common to both poems; and, except that Mr. Call has discarded rhyme, there is hardly a single point in the general structure of the earlier poem which he has not kept in view. The very tricks of Keats's language—phrases, for example, like "marble pieties" and "beautiful divinings"—are reproduced not indeed without a very considerable degree of taste and judgment in the imitation, but with the effect, as we before said, of impressing a contrast. And the contrast shows that, while the shortcomings of Endymion, which are many and great, are more than atoned for by the splendid force and vigour of genius which burns through the whole poem, it is just this excess that is wanted as a justification for Ariadne. The surprising reflection is that Mr. Call probably knows this more thoroughly than any critic's suggestion could point it out to him. It is quite certain that he must have a genuine feeling of the inferiority of his own work relatively to its model; for, if there is one feature which his character of mind more distinctly than another, it is a remarkable delicacy in receiving and appreciating the impressions stamped by genius—a power which he himself feels very highly, and has treated in his little lyric called Epithalamium. In spite, however, of his insight and knowledge, he has produced a poem which, had there been no Eudymion, would have deserved recognition as a composition bold in design and with many beauties of execution, but which, as Eudymion exists, must needs affect the reader very much as a manifest copy would affect him when hung side by side with an original Titian or Correggio. It is just the same with a large number of small lyrical poems in this volume that recall the ideas and the manner of Wordsworth. Page after page is written in the mood of "O blithe new-come," or of the opening lines in the "Ode on Immortality," but not once in all the pages are we arrested by anything resembling the power and beauty of those two undying passages. A man who does not bring a high degree of creative genius to his task may yet be quite justified in handling subjects metrically, and may succeed well in his design; but he should by all means avoid the sort of contrast which we have been describing; for where is the use of going over ground that has been sketched and coloured by genius, and showing what the difference is when genius is less or is absent? Mr. Call's verse, also, though richly melodious, and for the most part thoroughly scholarlike and well handled, is wanting in variety. Too many of the smaller pieces turn on the thought of how beautiful was life in early years, and how ecstatic were the dreams and the simple pleasures of vanished childhood and youth. It has been said of Mendelssohn that, though his modes of altering the treatment of one and the same theme are in themselves often bewitching with a subtle charm, yet his frequency of recurrence to certain themes shows in some degree a limited range of ideas. Mr. Call's "Romantic Poems" suggest a similar reflection, and with much more pertinacity of iteration. But we should be sorry to do scant justice to a writer of so much modesty and conscientiousness in work as Mr. Call. Ariadne, notwithstanding the unfortunate effect of contrast, is filled with passages that have a certain grace and merit of their own; like the testimony to Bacchus, for example, regarded as the god of passion in its nobler phases:—

* Golden Histories, &c. By William Mark With Call. London: Smith, Elder, & Co. 1872.

He is the life that throbs in burning stars,
And gleams in clouds; from whom sweet longings come,
Fierce joys, and thoughts dreadful and beguiling;
Shadows of mightier worlds by mightier suns
Thrown in glad colours on the world of man.
Of him is song that honours human life,
And the wild sweet enthusiasm of love,
And ecstasy, and dream and oracle.

And the disenchantment that follows when the god departs—the quenching of the ecstatic halo of fancy, the removal of

The light that never was on sea or land, and the bareness of unrelieved material objects—is touched with fine effect a little later:—

But ere he spoke, the conscious forests sank,
The sobbing rivers left their channels dry,
The green swift life of trees, as in a frost,
Paled into death; where late were glorious flowers
Sprang pulpy stems; what once were noblest lakes
Shrank to mean waterpools, with sordid wood
O'erflung; and all that magic forest-realm,
Now disenchantèd, lay a waste forlorn.
—A common waste among four common hills.
So is it ever when the Gods depart.

Three or four longer poems intervene between Ariadne and the quasi-Wordsworthian lyrics of the volume. The story of the Dictator Fabius, and of the magnanimity shown by him to his recalcitrant Master of Horse, Minucius, is worked together, out of the twenty-second book of Livy, with the spirit and care which Mr. Call brings to any translation or adaptation from Greek or Latin antiquity. Abnegation of self is the text also of the poem Khaled—the "Sword of God" in Moslem chivalry—who served loyally under his inferior, Obaidah, without promotion and without recognition from the Caliph Omar. Manoli is a rather ghastly legend adapted from the Moldo-Wallachian myth of a guild of master masons, whose only means of neutralizing the efforts of evil genii who thwarted their work was to immure the first woman who chanced to cross the new threshold. This woman turns out to be Manoli's own wife; and the unstinted horror of her cries and entreaties, as the walls close in around her, is not relieved by falling back on the philosophical dichum that "the affections, even in the affectionate, are powerless against the tyranny of ideas." This is quoted from Mr. Lowen's Life of Goethe, and no doubt, in certain individuals, and—at certain crises in the world's history—in masses of men, it has been true; but it does not convert Manoli into a beautiful poem. One would fain hope, in spite of the Moldo-Wallachian legend, that, among all the sacrifices of personal affection which have been made for the sake of ideas, the ideas of genuine art have been responsible for very few indeed. It is at any rate a remark worth setting aside by side with this rather sombre reprint from the Corradini, that among the really great artists of the world, no matter in what department, a very large majority have been conspicuous for the vitality and faithfulness of their domestic affections, as well as for the truth and endurance of their personal friendships. In art, happily, as in other great fields of human effort,

The best men ever are the wisest too.

Art never in reality demands as an absolute condition a ruthless surrender of personal love; and the legend of Manoli is, we think, in spite of some power in its treatment by Mr. Call, a blot on the Moldo-Wallachian fancy.

The volume concludes with a set of translated pieces; the Homeric "Hymn to Demeter"; the long chorus from the opening of the Bacchæ; several little pieces from the Greek Anthology, and some lyrics from Catullus and from Heise. We so far think highly of Mr. Call's powers in translation as to regret that he did not translate Catullus's Epithalamium (LXIV.), containing the story of Ariadne, instead of waiting the poem with which this collection begins. He might also have added to the "Hymn of Demeter" his translation of the "Hymn to Apollo," and parts of the "Aphrodite," which were all included by him in a small and very pleasant volume of versions from the Greek, written in his Cambridge days, nearly thirty years ago, and called Lyra Hellenica. His rendering from the Bacchæ is spirited, though he is sometimes led off the track by the influences of rhythm and rhyme, as where he writes

Blithe is Bacchus, when in glory
He descends from mountain heavy—for what is in reality, "Jovial is the Bacchant, when he throws himself rollicking on the ground." The translation which in our opinion is not far from being the best thing in the whole book is that of Catullus's remarkable poem (LXXVI.), beginning and embodying a serious effort, in a profound soliloquy, towards the mastery of a hopeless and unworthy passion. The last lines, from the O di, si vestrum est misceri of the original, run thus in Mr. Call's version:—

Siqua recordanti benefacta priora voluptas,

If ye can pity, if in death's last strife
Gods! ye have lent your aid,
If I have lived a pure and holy life,
And holily have pray'd;
Behold me in my misery, dread and deep.
Drive, drive this plague from me,
Which glides into my limbs like death's last sleep,
And banishes all glee.
I ask not now that she may love me. No!
I ask for love no more,
I ask not that she may be true, for ah!
'Twere vain. The Past is o'er.
I would regain my strength, I fain would drive
This loathsome plague away;
Hear me, O Gods! for holily I strive
Your precepts to obey.

These lines are not perfect; but, judging from the volume as a whole, we believe that Mr. Call might produce a translation of all Catullus's works which, in point of even and durable merit, would more than deserve a place beside either the brilliant one of Mr. Martin or the learned one of Mr. Ellis.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

THE voluminous stores of Varnhagen von Ense's correspondence continue to be available for publication, but the restriction of the contents of the latest issue to personages little known to the world at large is perhaps indicative of an approaching exhaustion of the supply. The measure of celebrity, however, is not always the measure of attractiveness, and the persons whose lives and characters are illustrated in the present volume offer features of more genuine interest than many whose names would be more generally familiar. This is especially the case with the two principal—the physician Koreff and the poet Clemens Brentano—in the portrayal of whom Varnhagen has expended all the resources of biographic art. He uses the pen as if it were an engraver's tool; the execution is incisive, and the effect indelible. No subjects can be more adapted for picturesque portraiture than these abnormal personages; the brilliant medical adventurer, half sage, half charlatan, and the wayward man of genius, alternately libertine and anchorite. Some of the anecdotes here given of Brentano's morbid love of mischief and unusual association of mystical raptures with entire callousness to ordinary human feeling would appear incredible if they were less in harmony with what is known of him from other sources. The memoir, however, is avowedly drawn up under the influence of feelings of strong aversion; while, in his account of Koreff, the writer does not dissemble his intention of extenuating as far as possible the failings of his erratic friend, whose career might easily have been made to wear quite a different complexion. The memoir is in both cases far more valuable than the correspondence to which it serves as introduction. There is also an interesting sketch of Caroline von Fouqué, whom Varnhagen describes as infinitely superior to her husband, the author of Undine. Something of the jealousy of Berlin literary coteries peeps out here; Rabel and the Baroness von Fouqué were evidently not on the best of terms; and regard for the former may not improbably have biased the biographer's opinion of her early friend, the Countess von Pacht. This lady's history, recounted by Varnhagen with singular effect, resembles a novel of George Sand's, but the grotesquely pathetic catastrophe would have surpassed the imagination of most novelists. The letters of Henri Campan and Scholz merely serve to swell the volume.

* Biographische Portraits. Von Varnhagen von Ense. Nebst Briefen von Koreff, C. Brentano, Frau von Fouqué, Henri Campan und Scholz. Leipzig: Brockhaus. London: Williams & Morgate.

It is the distinction of Giovanni Antonio Bazzi, surnamed Il Soddoma*, to be less known than any of the great Italian painters, both as regards his life and his works. His life, though psychologically interesting in many respects, was not marked by striking events; his works are not very numerous, and many of the most important of them lie out of the ordinary track of travellers. The painter's very name has been erroneously read as Razzi until quite recently; his careless, jovial character has afforded scope for the misconceptions or misrepresentations of Vasari. He has at length found a kindly and discriminating biographer in Herr Jansen, who, without claiming for the artist an earnestness, or for his works a significance, to which neither advanced any pretensions, eulogizes in both rarer and more incommunicable qualities—the naïveté, spontaneous cheerfulness, and pure naturalness of the best periods of classic art, the delightful freshness of feeling which can only exist at the very best and happiest period of development, whether of an art or an individual. This conception of the fundamental characteristics of Soddoma's genius supplies the key-note to Herr Jansen's criticism on his works, which is conveyed in the pleasantest style, with exhaustive but unobtrusive erudition.

Fräulein von Lagerström's "Biographical Memorial Book"† consists of a series of short biographical notices of eminent persons, one for each day in the year. They are in general characterized by good taste and good feeling.

Dr. Straeter's biography of Oliver Cromwell‡ is founded upon Mr. Carlyle's Letters and Speeches, and may almost be regarded as a digest of the latter, reduced to a regular narrative, and adapted in point of style to the taste of readers of the nineteenth century. The raciness of the original Cromwellian utterances has of course disappeared, but the substitute tendered by Dr. Straeter is clear, compact, and consecutive. As concerns his views, the writer is a disciple of Mr. Carlyle, and an unflinching admirer of Cromwell, whose most doubtful proceedings are systematically vindicated. A natural coolness of temperament and a studied moderation of language prevent this advocacy from degenerating into partisanship, and the author's conception of Cromwell's character as an enlightened and patriotic ruler is so substantially just that the possible inaccuracy of minor details is overlooked in the fidelity of the general representation.

The character of Gustavus Adolphus§ offers a similar problem to Cromwell's, and although the contrasts it affords are not so violent, it is perhaps even more difficult to determine where religion ends and policy begins. Professor Droysen, whose elaborate biography is just concluded, is evidently disposed to lay principal stress on the latter spring of conduct. In his opinion Gustavus's great object was neither the rescue of the Protestant religion nor the attainment of the Imperial Crown of Germany, but the foundation of a great Scandinavian Empire. The book is written entirely from the political point of view, in the manner of Ranke. Tried by the ordinary standard of historical writing, it appears tame and insipid; but if regarded as an endeavour to deduce conclusions from existing materials for the use of subsequent historians, its unimpassioned sobriety of style must be admitted to be well adapted to the end in view.

Another important contribution to the history of the Thirty Years' War is the extensive publication, edited by Dr. M. Ritter||, of documents referring to the league of Catholic princes formed about the beginning of the seventeenth century, under the auspices of the Elector of Bavaria. Like so many similar publications, it is issued by the Historical Commission of the Academy of Munich, at the expense of the late King Maximilian. The first volume, including the period from 1598 to 1608, contains nearly six hundred documents, comprising letters, confidential reports, instructions to diplomatic agents, and protocols of conferences. The most important are given in full, the others in abstract. There can be no question as to the great value of the collection as illustrative of the causes and preliminaries of the Thirty Years' War.

The documents published by*Dr. F. W. Ebeling¶ from the Saxon archives are important illustrations of the history of France under Charles IX. They include memorials from the French Protestants to the Saxon Court, letters from Coligny, reports from envoys, and other interesting papers. The longest is a contemporary detail, by J. W. von Botsheim, of "cyclopica illa atque inaudita hæcæna detestanda atque execranda laniæna," the massacre of St. Bartholemew.

Dr. M. Haushofer's work on statistics**, after a brief essay on the history and philosophy of this branch of scientific inquiry, adduces tables of results in nearly all the departments of knowledge to which it admits of being applied; such as the population, public health, revenue, commerce, agriculture, marriages, &c., of most civilized nations. The value of such a condensed mass of research is obvious, and the work appears to be very carefully executed.

Archbishop Philaret's history of the Church of Russia* is a dry book, even in the German version, and would have been much drier still but for the translator's resolute action in unmercifully docking his author of his accumulated appendages of textual citations. It derives, however, some adventitious importance from the probability of a schism in the Church of Rome bringing the pretensions of the Oriental community into notice, and even those who are indisposed to regard such questions from an ecclesiastical point of view may find some interest in observing how the case of the Russian Church is put by an official advocate, for there is no mistaking the ultimately polemical object of the work. The result of the inquiry is not encouraging; all the obstinate immobility, stolid fanaticism, and courtly servility popularly supposed to characterize the Russian Church are faithfully reproduced in the work of its episcopal chronicler. There is no trace of elevated moral feeling; the crimes of "orthodox" sovereigns, from the partition of Poland downwards, being extolled or glossed over; but there is abundance of abject superstition in connexion with relics and anchorites, and morose hatred of schismatics abroad and dissidents at home. If the book fairly represents the spirit of the Russian Church, a very considerable change must come over her ere she can be acceptable to any considerable section of religious opinion in the West. Considered as a repository of information, the Archbishop's volumes no doubt possess considerable value; his record, though tame and bald in point of style, is rich in picturesque details, and he has unconsciously managed to convey a vivid conception of the extraordinary union of religious fervour with absolute intellectual stagnation by which his communion is characterized, and which can only be explained on the hypothesis of the utterly superficial character of Russian civilization. The translator has added two appendices—one comprising an explanation of the symbolism of the Russian liturgy, the other the catechism of another Archbishop Philaret, the late Metropolitan of Moscow.

Iwan Golowin's desultory volume on the decline of France† seems to be seriously intended; but it is difficult to discover any guiding idea or direct purpose in it. It is in the main an incoherent medley of anecdotes, some relevant, more irrelevant, a few amusing, not many authentic. Without being exactly favourable to France, the writer is inimical to Germany, and prognosticates war for 1875 as a consequence of the Russian policy of non-intervention.

There are probably few mundane transactions involving a more flagrant discrepancy between theory and practice than the election of a Pope, and there are few controversial weapons admitting of employment against the Church of Rome with more destructive effect than the too naively accurate reports of her own "Conclavisti" on the proceedings habitual on such occasions. Dr. Zöpfel's treatise on the Papal elections of the mediæval epoch‡ is not compiled with any polemical purpose, and relates to a period when the art of electoral intrigue was in a comparatively rudimentary condition, when the Holy Spirit was not as yet liable to be overruled by the French or Austrian Ambassador, and ere the Pope's pretensions as universal Bishop were stultified by the practical restriction of the privilege of election to the Italian Cardinals. There is, however, quite enough to exhibit Ultramontane claims in the most propitious light. The tone of the work is singularly dispassionate and impartial, and its scope purely scientific. It includes an interesting inquiry into the development of the ceremonies now observed at the election and enthronization of a Pope, and an excursus on the double election of 1130. The conclusion arrived at is, that neither the recognized Pope nor his competitor, Anacletus, was canonically elected.

Dr. Wilken's history of the religious drama in Germany§ contains a full account of the extant remains of compositions of this description, whether founded on Scriptural themes or on the legends of saints. As was but natural in performances principally designed for edification, the spectacle seems to have been always considered of more importance than the diction of the piece, and there is no symptom of any tendency on the part of these rude representations to acquire literary significance, as in the case of the Greek Dionysiac exhibitions and the Spanish autos.

Professor Friedrich's|| diary in Rome during the sittings of the Vatican Council has already been the subject of so much discussion that it is unnecessary to do more in this place than mention its publication. We may take a future opportunity of noticing it more fully. A work on "Romanizing tendencies" in the German Churches¶, by a minister at Berlin, exhibits, under the cloak of an apparent protest against whatever is specifically Roman,

* Leben und Werke des Malers Giovanni Antonio Bazzi von Vercelli, genannt Il Soddoma. Von Albert Jansen. Stuttgart: Ebner & Seubert. London: Williams & Norgate.

† Biographisches Gedenk-Buch. Von Angelika von Lagerström. Quart. 1. Gotha: Perthes. London: Williams & Norgate.

‡ Oliver Cromwell. Ein Essay über die englische Revolution des 17ten Jahrhunderts. Von B. T. M. Straeter. Leipzig: Froberg. London: Williams & Norgate.

§ Gustav Adolf. Von G. Droysen. Bd. 2. Leipzig: Veit & Co. London: Nutt.

|| Ursach und Acten zur Geschichte des dreissigjährigen Krieges in den Zeiten des vorwärtenden Bischoffes der Wittelsbacher. Bearbeitet von M. Ritter. Bd. 1. München: Rieger. London: Siegle.

¶ Archivische Beiträge zur Geschichte Frankreichs unter Carl IX. Von Dr. F. W. Ebeling. Leipzig: Wöller. London: Asher & Co.

** Lehr- und Handbuch der Statistik. Von Dr. M. Haushofer. Wien: Braumüller. London: Asher & Co.

* Geschichte der Kirche Russlands. Von Philaret, weiland Erzbischof von Tschernigow. Ins Deutsche übersetzt von Dr. Blumenthal. 3 The. Frankfurt and London: Baer, Sotheman & Co.

† Frankreich's Verfall (1870-71). Von Iwan Golowin. Leipzig: Froberg. London: Trübner & Co.

‡ Die Papstwahlen und die mit ihnen im nächsten Zusammenhang stehenden Ceremonien in ihren Entwicklung vom 11. bis zum 14. Jahrhundert. Von Dr. R. Zöpfel. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht. London: Asher & Co.

§ Geschichte der geistlichen Spiele in Deutschland. Von Dr. E. Wilken. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht. London: Asher & Co.

|| Tagebuch während des Vaticanischen Concils. Von Dr. J. Friedrich. Nördlingen: Beck. London: Williams & Norgate.

¶ Über romanisirende Tendenzen. Ein Wort zum Frieden. Von F. W. Schulze. Berlin: Stilke & Van Meyden. London: Trübner.

a decided inclination towards the principles which have found their logical development in the decrees of the Vatican Council. A Life of Christ, by Dr. Krüger-Velthusen*, is a compromise between the orthodox and the rationalistic schools, which will hardly satisfy either.

Dr. Bastian† seems not clearly to apprehend the objections advanced by criticism to his modus operandi. He most justly observes that one of the cardinal vices of modern thought is the disposition to erect imposing theories on an inadequate substructure of fact, and that the accumulation of materials must precede the working them up. His fault is not the diligent aggregation of particulars, but the incoherence which renders his diligence almost useless. The gigantic commonplace book which he has recently published under the title of "Contributions to Ethnology" is indeed a magazine of most valuable information on the subject, but before this can be rendered practically available, it will need to be analysed, digested, and re-arranged with scarcely less labour than that demanded by the original compilation itself. Scissors, paste, and a book of blank paper are almost indispensable requisites for the profitable perusal of any work by Dr. Bastian.

Herr Platzmann's comparative vocabularies‡, designed to establish the connexion between the languages of America and Europe, seem to prove a little too much. He makes out just as strong a case for the American affinities of the Aryan and Semitic as for those of the Turanian languages, and thus seems almost logically conducted to his strange proposition of the probable origin of the human race in America.

Dr. Seidlitz's lectures on the Darwinian theory§ are clever, entertaining, and more thoroughgoing in their advocacy of the hypothesis than the author of it himself, since Dr. Seidlitz is apparently prepared to assert the adequacy of natural selection alone to account for the phenomena under investigation. A bibliography of works and essays on the subject is a valuable addition to the treatise, but incidentally proves the writer's unacquaintance with the formidable criticism of Mr. St. George Mivart. An observation in reply to M. de Quatrefages is characteristic of the habits of thought of many modern scientific writers. He objects to the French naturalist that he opposes the theories of others without bringing forward any of his own. Why should he? M. de Quatrefages has probably a salutary distrust of the "provisional theories" and "working hypotheses" which, put forward in the first instance as mere aids to the co-ordination of facts, so easily become accepted dogmas, to which facts must accommodate themselves as best they can.

Unsere Zeit || exhibits its usual opulence of able and instructive articles, both literary and political. Among the former may be especially noticed excellent papers on Schiller, Dickens, and the German Romantic School; among the latter those on the last days of the Second Empire, the Commune, the political situation of Austria, the affairs of the Netherlands, and the progress of Russia in Central Asia.

It is a genial extravagance worthy of "Hans Breitmann" at his best to introduce Joseph Victor Scheffel¶, the author he has now undertaken to translate, as "the most popular poet in Germany." If the statement is accurate in any sense, it can only be in that in which "John Gilpin" might be described as the most popular poem in England. No doubt these quaint humorous lyrics, more distinguished however by a pervading jollity of mood than by the brilliancy of individual strokes of wit, may command an extensive public in South Germany, and they seem to have lost so little of their point in Mr. Leland's skilful hands that we are disposed to presage a fair degree of success for them in England.

We have to record the completion of W. Unger's excellent series of engravings of the masterpieces of the gallery at Cassel.** The fourth and concluding part contains the whole of the letter-press.

* Das Leben Jesu. Von W. Krüger-Velthusen. Elberfeld: Friderichs. London: Nutt.

† Beiträge zur Ethnologie und darauf begründete Studien. Berlin: Wiegandt & Hempel. London: Trübner.

‡ Amerikanisch-asiatische Etymologien. Von J. Platzmann. Leipzig: Teubner. London: Trübner & Co.

§ Die Darwin'sche Theorie. Von Dr. G. Seidlitz. Dorpat: Mattiessen. London: Williams & Norgate.

|| Unsere Zeit. Deutsche Revue der Gegenwart. Herausgegeben von Rudolf Gottschall. Leipzig: Brockhaus. London: Williams & Norgate.

¶ Gaudamus! Humorous Poems. Translated from the German of J. V. Scheffel and others. By C. G. Leland. London: Trübner.

** Die Galerie zu Cassel in ihren Meisterwerken. Nach den Originalgemälden radirt von W. Unger. Vierte Serie. Leipzig: Seemann. London: Nutt.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we decline to return rejected communications; and to this rule we can make no exception.

The SATURDAY REVIEW is duly registered for transmission abroad.

Now ready, VOLUME XXXII., bound in cloth, price 10s. Cloth Cases for Binding all the Volumes, price 2s. each. Also, Reading Cases, price 2s. 6d. each. May be had at the Office, or through any Bookseller.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 531, FEBRUARY 17, 1872:

The Assassination of Lord Mayo.
The American Claim. The Debate on Sir R. Collier's Appointment.
The Ballot. The French Assembly and the Recent Elections.
The Government and the Contagious Diseases Acts. Cathedral Reform.
The Scotch Education Bill. Parks and Churchyards.

The Coming Comet.
The Administration of Lord Mayo. The Thanksgiving Ceremony.
Ministers and Taxpayers. The Government Whip. Episcopal Justice.
The Swiss Constitutional Question. A Strange Story.
The Groans of the Tradesmen. Among the Spirits.

Bosant and Palmer's Jerusalem.
White's History of the Battle of Bannockburn. Guthrie's Sundays Abroad.
Scraps on Primeval Antiquities. Rollanda. Captain Burton's Zanzibar.
Baring-Gould's Legends of Old Testament Characters.
Call's Golden Histories. German Literature.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LONDON INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, 1872.—FINE ARTS.—WORKS FOR EXHIBITION must be delivered at the Buildings, at the Entrances, and on the Days named below:

March 7 and 8.....Paintings.—West Goods Entrance.
" 11.....Architectural Designs.—East Goods Entrance.
" 13.....Engraving, Lithography, Photography.—West Goods Entrance.
" 27.....Sculpture.—West Goods Entrance.

A Numbered List of the Works submitted for approval must be sent in with them, stating the Name and Address of the Artist, the Title and the Price (if for sale) of each Work. To each Work itself a label must be securely attached, bearing the same information and the corresponding number in the List. Artists who have not made preliminary application to submit Works for Exhibition should do so at once, by letter addressed to the Secretary. Not more than three Works of any one Class can be submitted, and they must have been executed since 1865.

HENRY Y. D. SCOTT, Major-General, Secretary.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—THIS DAY and NEXT WEEK.

SATURDAY (February 17).—SATURDAY CONCERT, at 3 P.M.
MONDAY—ORCHESTRAL BAND, GRAND ORGAN, &c.
TUESDAY—SPECIAL CONCERT BY GLEE and MADRIGAL UNION.
WEDNESDAY—ORCHESTRAL BAND, GRAND ORGAN, &c.
THURSDAY—SPECIAL CONCERT BY GLEE and MADRIGAL UNION.
SATURDAY—SATURDAY CONCERT, at 3 P.M.

The Fine Art Courts and Collections, including Picture Gallery (the Works on Sale); the Technological and Natural History Collections; all the various Illustrations of Art, Science, and Nature, and the Gardens and Park always open. Music and Fountains daily. Admission, Monday to Friday, 1s.; Saturdays, 2s. 6d. Guinea Season Tickets free.

CRYSTAL PALACE MUSIC MEETINGS, June 27, 29;

July 2, 4, and DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZES, July 6.—Choral Societies (Male and Female), Church and Cathedral Choirs, Glee and Madrigal, and Non-Vocalists, Military and Volunteer Bands, Amateur Soprano, Contralto, Tenor, and Bass Solo Singers, intending to compete for Prizes at the First Annual National Music Meeting of the Crystal Palace Company, must send in their applications before April 15. The Rules, Forms of Application, List of Music to be prepared, and other details, are now ready. All Communications to be addressed to Mr. WILLIAM BRADBURY, at the Crystal Palace.

By Order,

GEORGE GROVE, Secretary.

MADAME SCHUMANN begs to announce that she will give TWO RECITALS of PIANOFORTE MUSIC, in the St. James's Hall, on Thursday Afternoon, February 22 and 23. Vocalists, Madlle. Anna Rogers. To commence each day at Three o'clock precisely. Box-stalls, 2s.; Gallery, 1s.; Admission, 1s.—Programmes and Tickets at Chappell & Co.'s, 30 New Bond Street; and at Austin's, 25 Piccadilly.

MR. and MRS. GERMAN REED'S ENTERTAINMENT.—KING CHRISTMAS (Last Representations), written by J. R. Planché, (MORE FOR THE HOLIDAYS, by Mr. Cornely Grain, and CHARITY BEGINS AT HOME, written by B. Howe, Esq. Music by Alfred Cellier. Every Evening (except Saturday) at 8. Thursday and Saturday Afternoons at 2.—Royal Gallery of Illustration, 14 Regent Street.

THE SOCIETY of PAINTERS in WATER-COLOURS.—The WINTER EXHIBITION of SKETCHES and STUDIES will CLOSE on Saturday, March 2, at their Gallery, 5 Pall Mall East. Ten till Five. Admission, 1s.

ALFRED D. FRIPP, Secretary.

ELIJAH WALTON'S ENTIRE COLLECTION of OIL and WATER-COLOUR PAINTINGS, now ON VIEW, at his GALLERY, 4 Westminster Chambers, Victoria Street, Westminster.—Admission, 1s. Open Daily from Ten till Five.

DORÉ GALLERY.—GUSTAVE DORÉ, 35 New Bond Street. EXHIBITION of PICTURES (including "CHRISTIAN MARTYRS," "MONASTERY," "TRIUMPH OF CHRISTIANITY," "FRANCESCA DE RIMINI"). Ten to Six.—Admission, 1s.

ART-UNION of LONDON.—Subscription, One Guinea.—Every Subscriber receives a Series of EIGHT COAST SCENES, engraved in line, from the Originals by David Cox, Copley Fielding, and Samuel Prout; besides a chance of one of the numerous valuable Prizes; the chief of which is the Life-size Marble Statue, THE WOOD NYMPH, for which the Sculptor, Mr. Birch, received 2000. The Prizes are now ready.

444 W. Strand, February 1, 1872.

LEWIS POCOCK
EDMUND E. ARTHURSON Hon. Secs.

INSTITUTION of NAVAL ARCHITECTS.—NOTICE.—The THIRTEENTH ANNUAL MEETING of the Institution will take place on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, the 31st, 1st, and 2nd of March next, at the Hall of the Society of Arts, John Street, Adelphi.

Papers on the Principles of Naval Construction, on Practical Ship-building and Marine Engineering, on Steam Navigation, on the Equipment and Management of Ships for Mercantile and for War, will be read at this Meeting. Naval Architects, Shipbuilders, Naval Officers of the Royal and Merchant Services, and Engineers, who propose to read Papers, are requested to send immediate notice of the subject and title to the SECRETARY; and the Paper itself, with illustrative drawings, must be deposited at the Office of the Institution on or before the 25th inst. Candidates for admission as Members should send in their applications by the same date. The Annual Subscription of £3 5s. is payable on admission, and becomes due at the commencement of each succeeding year.

C. W. MERRIFIELD, Hon. Secretary.

9 Adelphi Terrace, London, W.C., February 15, 1872.

CHELtenham COLLEGE SCHOLARSHIPS.—Twelve Scholarships, May 1872—viz., Six Junior Scholarships, 450 for Three Years; Two Senior Scholarships, 500 for Three Years; Two Junior and Two Senior, 250 for Two Years.—Full information given by the SECRETARY, The College, Cheltenham.

WOOLWICH.—INDIAN ENGINEERING COLLEGE and GIVE SERVICE and LIFE.—Rev. Dr. HUGHES (Waring, Joh. Col. Cam.) who during the last 20 years has passed over 200 Pupils for the service, continues to receive CANDIDATES.—Basing, W.

THE

SATURDAY REVIEW

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 852, Vol. 33.

February 24, 1872.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

THE ALABAMA QUESTION.

MR. GLADSTONE'S answer to Mr. DISRAELI'S repeated inquiry as to the date of the reception of the American Claim suggests a painful doubt of his qualifications for avoiding or removing an international misunderstanding. On the first day of the Session, on Monday last, and again on Tuesday, Mr. DISRAELI asked for information as to the time and circumstances under which HER MAJESTY'S Government first became acquainted with the American Case. It would be impossible to frame a simpler question; and, as it happened, voluntary informants had already supplied an equally distinct and precise answer. No Minister but Mr. GLADSTONE would have been capable of making on such an occasion a statement which occupies two-thirds of a column of the Times. It appears from the report that several printed copies of the Case were received at the Foreign Office on the 26th of December; but as a copy was "debited," or in plainer language sent, to Mr. GLADSTONE from the Foreign Office on the 20th, there must be some mistake as to the dates. By a singular casualty the copy seems to have been lost on the road; but Mr. GLADSTONE is careful to explain that, if he had received the volume, he would not have taken the trouble to read it, or even to glance over its contents. He had "devoted considerable time, at no small inconvenience," to the comparatively useless occupation of studying the English Case, "of which I had" quite unnecessarily "read every word." With regard to the American Case he would not have ventured to form an opinion without the guidance of the legal advisers who drew up the counter Case. The remaining copies were unluckily required for every possible purpose except for the information of the members of the Cabinet. Some were wanted in the Foreign Office; one was sent to Lord LYONS, perhaps to gratify Mr. THIERS'S curiosity, and another to Lord RUSSELL, to divert his mind from the question of Education and the crimes of the Church of England. After getting rid of as many copies as possible, there were five copies left; and by glancing at the index or the table of contents, any Minister would have been referred to the material passages of the Case, and in ten minutes he might have understood their general effect; but "there was not a sufficient number of" copies for the members of the Cabinet," and the Foreign Office printers were perhaps slack in their work on Boxing Day. In spite of Mr. GLADSTONE'S description of the helpless ineptitude and imbecility of the public departments, and of the assumed stupidity or carelessness of his colleagues, it is impossible to believe that, whatever may be the PRIME MINISTER'S appreciation of his duties, no person in the Foreign Office took the trouble to look at the American Case. Its contents must have been known to Lord GRANVILLE within a few hours; and there can be no doubt that he must instantly have called Mr. GLADSTONE'S attention to the extravagant demand for indirect damages. No explanation worthy of a moment's attention has been given of a delay which was assuredly not caused by the reasons alleged by Mr. GLADSTONE. If there is any misunderstanding, the PRESIDENT and his SECRETARY OF STATE might possibly have been willing to rectify it before the question was complicated by discussion and popular agitation. The actual communication, as it would have been made by the FOREIGN SECRETARY, would not have been mystified or rendered unintelligible by the use of Mr. GLADSTONE'S favourite style. It is highly probable that any representation would have been useless, but frivolous details about the number of copies of the Case in the Foreign Office furnish no shadow of excuse for a flagrant dereliction of duty. It may, notwithstanding Mr. GLADSTONE'S lumbering and irrelevant statement, be taken for granted that the delay really arose from more adequate causes.

The spectacle now presented to the world by England and the United States has no precedent in history. For the first time in living memory Englishmen of all parties are unanimously convinced that they are justified in resisting a claim which seems to them demonstrably wrongful. On the other side there is too much reason to believe that the American Government and an overwhelming majority of the people are resolved to insist on their demand. The more respectable American papers admit that the claim of three or four hundred millions for the alleged prolongation of the war is extravagant in amount, and they are probably correct in their assumption that it would not have been seriously pressed. Several American writers have sneered at the mention of an enormous sum which, as they contend, has never been mentioned by the Government of the United States. It may be perfectly true that the Americans neither spoke of three hundred millions, nor intended to insist before the Tribunal on a demand which could evidently not have been enforced except by war; but it is undeniable that the claim is as definitely advanced in the American Case as if it had been reduced into figures. At the 479th page of the Case the American agents say, "Thus the Tribunal will see that after the battle of Gettysburg the offensive operations of the insurgents were conducted only at sea through the cruisers; and, observing that the war was prolonged for that purpose, will be able to determine whether Great Britain ought not in equity to reimburse to the United States the expenses thereby entailed upon them." The whole cost of the war for a year and three-quarters is thus claimed in explicit terms; and the amount would certainly not be less than 400,000,000*l*. For the purpose apparently of impressing on the minds of the Arbitrators the full extent of the claim, the American Government proceed to suggest as the date from which interest is to be calculated the 1st of July, 1863. The battle of Gettysburg was fought on the 4th of July, 1863; and it is implied that both principal and interest are due from the time at which fortune began to incline to the stronger belligerent. Mr. MONSE, in one of his able and temperate letters to the Times, has both illustrated the frivolity of the demand, and expressed his opinion that it is not within the terms of the Treaty. The Alabama had, as he observes, as much to do with the prolongation of the war as the Flying Dutchman, and surely the English Government is not bound to admit, even hypothetically, its liability for any acts which may be attributed to the Flying Dutchman. The argument that an unjust and extortionate claim would not be sanctioned by the Tribunal has no bearing on the English objection. It is impossible to believe that the Commissioners could have intended to submit such a claim to arbitration; and, according to the English construction, the claim was not so submitted by the Treaty. An able Prussian writer contends that the English Government ought to proceed with the arbitration, but in the event of an adverse decision on the indirect claims to refuse to submit to the award. It seems a simpler and a more legal course to refuse in the first instance to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. If a single million were awarded on account of the prolongation of the war, the Arbitrators would, according to the English contention, have exceeded their powers; yet the sympathy of the world, which would attend a refusal to pay the cost of one or two years of the civil war, might be withheld from a technical objection to the payment of a comparatively insignificant sum.

It is desirable, at the risk of repetition, to explain that the submission to arbitration under the Treaty relates exclusively to "the claims generically known as the 'Alabama' claims." A refusal on the part of the English Government to refer any other question to arbitration can by no possibility involve a repudiation of the Treaty. Both parties assumed that the definition of the claims was intelligible and sufficient; and it was only in the diplomatic correspondence between the Governments that the term "Alabama claims" had been officially used. In his voluminous and unfriendly despatch, addressed to Mr. MOTLEY, Mr. FISH expressly stated that he made no claim of any kind. It is therefore only from the language used by his predecessor, Mr. SEWARD, that the interpretation of the submission is to be found. In a despatch of August 27, 1866, to Mr. ADAMS, Mr. SEWARD enclosed a list of "claims of citizens of the United States against Great Britain for damages suffered by them . . . by means of depredations upon our commercial marine committed on the high seas by the Sumter, the Alabama, the Florida, the Shenandoah, and other ships of war;" and Mr. SEWARD further stated that "the principles on which the claims are asserted by the United States have been explained by yourself in an elaborate correspondence with Earl RUSSELL and Lord CLARENDON." "The claims upon which we insist are of large amount. They affect the interests of many thousand citizens of the United States. The justice of the claims is sustained by the universal sentiment of the people of the United States." Enclosed was a list of claims solely for direct damage alleged to be suffered by private citizens; and neither before nor after the date of the despatch has any other class of claims been either presented to the English Government or "generically known as the Alabama claims." In the negotiations relating to the REVERDY JOHNSON Convention, which was afterwards rejected by the Senate of the United States, the "Alabama claims" were uniformly distinguished on both sides from all other claims, and the term was strictly confined to private claims of owners, freighters, and insurers who had suffered directly from the depredations of the cruisers. The demand for a portion of the cost of the war was first advanced by Mr. SUMNER in the notorious speech which caused the rejection of the Convention, and at that time the claim purported to be founded, not, as in the American Case, on the acts of the cruisers, but on the general unfriendliness attributed to the English Government, and more especially on the Proclamation of Neutrality. Mr. SUMNER's speech was not a diplomatic document, nor could it have extended the meaning previously attached to the term "Alabama claims"; and his hostile and extortionate demand was not even preferred as a claim connected with the Alabama. It is difficult to understand how American lawyers can contend that any claims but the Alabama claims are referred to arbitration, or that those claims include a portion of the cost of the war. Perhaps the most conclusive proof that the Treaty includes only direct claims preferred by private citizens consists in the hatched contrivance by which the framers of the American Case attempt to connect the prolongation of the war with the operations of the cruisers. Neither Mr. SUMNER nor Mr. FISH preferred the demand as a part of "the Alabama claims," nor has it at any previous time been so described by American writers or speakers. The astute lawyers who framed the Case knew that any claim which they advanced must be an "Alabama claim," or, in other words, they adopted the English construction, which excludes the indirect damages from the scope of the Treaty.

It may be admitted that if the Treaty is to be construed together with the Protocol of the 8th of March, the expenses of the United States' cruisers and the loss of Government vessels sunk by the Alabama might be included in the reference. The English Government would not refuse to give effect even to an informal understanding contained in the Protocols, or expressed by the English Commissioners orally or in writing. If there has been any misapprehension, it is perhaps not too hazardous a conjecture that, while the American Commissioners thought that it would be sufficient to abstain from pressing the claim for indirect damages before the Tribunal, the English Commissioners believed that the "amicable settlement" of the Treaty was the "amicable settlement" of the Protocol, and that the indirect claims were accordingly withdrawn. If, indeed, the American Commissioners intended to keep the claims alive, the charge of carelessness and want of skill which has been urged against the English representatives must be transferred to their American colleagues. If nevertheless their Government can show that they were misled, there may still be room for a friendly adjustment. The delay of an answer to Lord GRANVILLE's Note may probably be explained by a prudent determination to postpone a decision till the debates in Parliament have been carefully considered. It might also be worth the while of the American Government to reflect on the unanimous and sincere belief of all parties in England that the reference to arbitration of the indirect claims is wholly impossible.

THE ARMY.

WHATEVER criticism may be bestowed on the various details of Mr. CARDWELL's speech, every one must acknowledge that he had a scheme to submit to the consideration of Parliament which dealt with the army as a whole, and aimed at giving vitality and organization to its component parts. More especially Mr. CARDWELL has made a serious effort to introduce that principle of localization which is the key to all effectual army reform. The essential idea, as he told the House, of the plan which he wishes to adopt is that of territorial districts, each to contain two Line battalions, two Militia infantry battalions, and a certain quota of Volunteers, formed into an administrative brigade; the whole to rest on the brigade depôt or centre. As one-half of the troops of the Line will be serving abroad and the other half at home, it is intended that one of the two Line battalions of each district shall be always abroad, and the other in the United Kingdom. At the head of all the forces in each district is to be placed a lieutenant-colonel of the regular army acting as a brigadier, and commanding in chief not only the Regulars and Militia, but also the Volunteers of the district. All recruits, both for the Line and the Militia, will be trained at the local centres, to which also will be attached the Army Reserve men and pensioners residing in the district. All the infantry, Militia, and Army Reserve arms, clothing, and other stores will be collected at the centre, and the Militia will be trained there under canvas. The districts are to be 66 in number; 9 in Scotland, 8 in Ireland, and 49 in England. No regiment is to be sent abroad until it has been six years at home. But the system of localization is not to be absolutely and rigidly carried out. It has been found to conduce to the efficiency of the army that there shall be an admixture in the battalions of English, Irish, and Scotch soldiers; and means will be taken by which such an admixture may be preserved in the remodelled army, although its main character will be that of a force attached to local centres. The general result will be, Mr. CARDWELL says, that in each district there will be a depot battalion and two Militia battalions, in such a state of preparation that the Line battalion of the brigade at home could be put at once on a war footing, while at least one other Militia battalion would be ready for immediate embodiment, and the depot would remain in a state to raise and train recruits and to furnish the required reliefs. The Artillery is to be dealt with on similar principles, although the districts to which the force is to be attached will be fewer and larger. Each division of Artillery will, however, be under the command of the general officer in charge of groups formed out of the sixty-six districts above described. A lieutenant-colonel of the Royal Artillery will be appointed for the Militia and Volunteer artillerymen of each Artillery district, and ten lieutenant-colonels trained at Shoeburyness have been already sent to different districts for the purpose of instructing the Militia and Volunteer Artillery in the latest improvements in the science. The adjutants of the Militia and Volunteer Artillery are to be supernumerary captains of the Royal Artillery, and the permanent staff is to be composed of non-commissioned officers of the Coast Brigade, who, if they fail in their duty, will be sent back to their regiments. The Yeomanry Cavalry are to be associated with the cavalry of the regular army by the adjutant of the Yeomanry being a supernumerary officer of the regular cavalry, and by the permanent staff being composed of non-commissioned cavalry officers.

It is hoped that by this scheme the spontaneity and all the other advantages of the auxiliary forces may be united with the highest possible amount of training which the regular army can furnish. By the association of every regiment and battalion of the army with some particular district it may be expected that the ties of kindred and of locality may bring a better class of men into the army, that the Militia may be willing to furnish recruits for the army, and that only men of a certain age and of fixed constitution will go out to discharge the duties of soldiers abroad. In order to get rid of billeting, which Mr. CARDWELL rightly holds to be an evil of great magnitude, the Militia regiments will be trained either at the depôt centres, where they will be partially under canvas, or at larger stations to be provided for them. At present barracks have been built without any reference to strategical considerations, and the counties have had to bear the expenses of Militia barracks. From this burden the counties are to be henceforth released. Where the county buildings are suitable for the purposes of district centres, the Government will buy them from the county; where they are not, the Government will place the existing buildings at the disposal of the county, and will erect once for all the new buildings necessary for the carrying out of Mr. CARDWELL's scheme. For this purpose 3,500,000*l.* is to be raised by terminable annuities. Land for parade-grounds at each centre will also be bought for the use, not only of the regular troops, but of the Militia and Volunteers. When the training of the Militia is over, the tents used by them will be left standing for the training of the Volunteers. The drill of Volunteers is to be made as far as possible more continuous, and is to last during a definite portion of the year, in order to be assimilated to that of the Regulars. But, although the Volunteers will be under the command of the lieutenant-colonel commanding the district, their internal organization will remain, subject only to certain new rules of great importance. No officer will be allowed to hold commissions in two corps. Every officer and non-commissioned officer will be obliged to qualify, and he will not be allowed to draw the capitation grant without attending drill like a private. No one will be allowed to continue a rifleman without going to the target, unless he has become a marksman. Volunteers are to be obliged to attend once a year for brigade instruction, when called on to do so by the general officer commanding, and on such occasions not less than half of the enrolled strength of each corps must attend, or the corps will lose the capitation grant for the current year. In this way a reasonable hope may be entertained that before long Volunteers will have none but qualified officers, that they will be all practised rifle-men, that the regulations will be strictly enforced, and that inefficient officers or corps will be got rid of.

The English army of the future will consist of about 130,000 Regulars, half of whom will be serving abroad, 140,000 Militia, and 30,000 Reserve and other minor forces. Of this force of 300,000 men, one-half will be liable in case of urgent necessity to serve abroad. In addition, there will be the Volunteers. Their numbers, which now reach nearly 170,000, will very probably fall off at first; but then those who remain will be worth having. The Volunteers of the future will be trained troops, good shots, accustomed to act under an officer of the regular army, and acquainted with the duties that they would be called upon to fulfil in time of war. Those who are Volunteers in order to enjoy a holiday at the seaside would retire into the civilian life for which they are naturally adapted. If only 100,000 Volunteers remained after the amateurs have been weeded out, England would have 400,000 soldiers trained, attached to local centres, knowing where to go and where to look for stores, armed with the best weapons, and, although of course of very different degrees of efficiency, yet all efficient for some of the purposes of defensive war. We should require about 65,000 at the least of the best of our troops to be constantly absent from the country, and this number would be naturally increased if we were engaged in a war with any country powerful enough to think of invading England. To the invader we should have to oppose the finest fleet in the world and 300,000 soldiers; and we think that we may say, without vanity, that the defence would be likely to have the best of it. But then everything depends on this force of 300,000 men being made a real, practical, fighting force. We have had a paper or huckram force of 300,000 men for so many years that we grow weary of counting them. For the first time, a plan for giving us a real force has been afforded to the long-suffering and much deluded English taxpayers. Unfortunately, at present it only exists in the brain of Mr. CARDWELL, and no one can say whether it will ever be realized. The nation longs to have a real army for its millions of money, but the nation is powerless unless the right men do the right thing. There are two preliminary questions which will instantly occur to every one, and on the answer to which much of the success of the scheme obviously depends. What is to be the cost of the army of the future, and what will be the temper and feelings of the officers of the regular army when they are invited to give that co-operation without which the scheme must entirely collapse? Mr. CARDWELL thought himself justified in giving satisfactory answers on both heads. The army is to cost a million less than it did last year, and a quarter of a million less than was anticipated is to be expended in the extinction of purchase. With regard to the officers there are certainly two very encouraging facts. The number of those who have applied to retire has not only been greatly less than the critics of the Government prophesied, but it has been considerably less than the Government itself estimated. Then, again, officers are showing themselves most unreservedly anxious to embrace every opportunity of perfecting their professional education.

They attend diligently garrison instruction, study good maps, and armise themselves with the Kriegsspiel. On the minor measures proposed by Mr. CARDWELL for the improvement of the position of officers—providing them with horses, paying for their bands, cheapening their messes, placing the Guards and the Line on a footing of something like equality, and accelerating promotion in the scientific corps—we must forbear for the present to comment. There will be enough opportunity hereafter to criticize details. It is the broad features of Mr. CARDWELL's scheme that command immediate attention, and although this scheme may on examination need many modifications, it seems to be in its broad outlines simple, bold, and practical.

THE LAST OF THE COLLIER CONTROVERSY.

THERE is at last an end of the COLLIER controversy, if a one-sided discussion can be so called;

Si pugna est, ubi tu pulas, ego vapulo tantum.

The Government, indeed, would willingly have warded off the blows of its adversaries or have struck in return, if there had been any ground of defence or of retaliation. The Duke of ARGYLL attempted to divert attention from the miscarriage of his colleagues by a violent onslaught on the Lord Chief Justice; but he has properly apologized for a portion of his speech, and perhaps he may be aware that the rest would have been better omitted. The virtual condemnation which the House of Commons has substituted for a Parliamentary censure will perhaps be sufficient to prevent the repetition of the offence. A Government with a clear majority of eighty, in the face of an Opposition which avowedly wished to avoid a change of Ministry, has escaped by twenty-seven votes from a direct Parliamentary censure; and curious statisticians profess to have ascertained that, as the Lord Chancellor procured his own escape from censure in the House of Lords, the majority in the Commons exactly corresponds to the number of official votes. Sir ROUNDSELL PALMER, who undertook the protection of his friends, expressly limited the terms of his amendment to the proposition that "the House finds no just cause for Parliamentary censure." In his speech he called attention to the exact issue which he had raised, as involving, not the nature or merits of the act which had been committed, but the extent of the penalty. The House had no alternative between the sentence proposed by Mr. CROSS and a concession of impunity which must not be confounded with acquittal; and it would be unreasonable to blame those supporters of the Government who thought themselves at liberty to adopt Sir ROUNDSELL PALMER's lenient estimate of the deserts of the Ministers. Mr. GLADSTONE in his vehement way protested that, if he were found guilty of the conduct imputed to him, "a man so blasted by the sense of 'the House ought to be expelled from its walls by the sentence 'of the House, and if he were not so expelled, he ought himself to decline to be a member of it.' The House never thought of either expelling or blasting Mr. GLADSTONE, and it voted by a small majority that his conduct was not even culpable enough to require a formal Parliamentary censure. It is no defence for a person who is accused of a misdemeanour to insist that he has not committed a capital crime. It is interesting to observe that Mr. GLADSTONE congratulates himself on the opportunity of appealing to the House of Lords in its judicial capacity rather than to an ignorant and prejudiced rabble; yet surely the rabble, including the entire English Press and the Lord Chief Justice, is our own flesh and blood. Sir ROUNDSELL PALMER, in his double capacity of counsel for the accused and member of the judicial tribunal, admitted that the frequent repetition of colourable appointments would deserve censure, although it is evident that no accumulation of blameless acts could amount to a wrong. In dealing with the question whether the appointment was proper or improper, he reminded the House that when he "used the words 'proper and improper, he meant proper or improper in 'a sense pertinent to Parliamentary censure.' " "I do not 'propose to enter into the discussion of any question about 'of that, as to whether a man may think it is or is not 'the wisest act that could have been done. The question 'before us is whether it is an improper act in the sense of 'being censurable.' Much less would he have deemed it a question of blasting Mr. GLADSTONE or expelling him from the House. Less logical in this respect than Lord ROSSLYN, and having, perhaps, not associated with that eccentric coterie which approves of the appointment, Sir R. PALMER agreed with the Lord Chief Justice that it would be improper to make a barrister an Indian Judge for the purpose of qualifying him for the Judicial Committee. The scandal of acting on Lord ROMILLY's doctrine would have been more flagrant, but it would have been of precisely the same character with the appointment which was made to the Court of Common Pleas.

Sir R. PALMER concluded his apology for the Minister by an appeal on behalf of Sir ROBERT COLLIER, who might perhaps, as he said, have thought it necessary to resign his office in deference to a vote of the House of Commons. An address to a Legislative Assembly which, unlike a jury, has a right to exercise a discretion, could not have been more judiciously framed for its purpose. It might perhaps not have been possible to obtain a verdict of not guilty, but political expediency might fairly be allowed to determine a vote on the punishment to be inflicted. Neither Sir R. PALMER nor the LORD ADVOCATE attempted to explain the utility of the restricting clause in the Act on the assumption that it might be innocently evaded. Serjeant SIMON, the only non-official lawyer except Sir R. PALMER who defended the appointment, was compelled to argue that the House, in considering an alleged evasion of the law, was bound to be guided by the strict interpretation of the Act. The adoption of such a rule would enable every evasion of the law to be perpetrated with impunity. The Ewelme rectory was legally conferred on a Cambridge graduate for the express purpose, and with the undoubted effect, of evading a statute which was passed for the benefit of Oxford. In construing an Act of Parliament, as in answering a question, Mr. GLADSTONE makes it his first object to baffle the legislator who had vainly thought to bind him, or the troublesome querist who desires information. Thus after three attempts Mr. DISRAELI extracted but a cloudy explanation of the reasons which rendered it impossible for the most industrious of Ministers to read within three or four weeks a document on which the question of peace or war may perhaps be found to have turned. If there had been a law requiring Mr. GLADSTONE to read the American Case as soon as it was printed, he would probably have contended that Parliament must be supposed only to contemplate a legitimate and official impression executed at the Foreign Office.

The faithful organ of the Government exults in the abstinence of the Opposition from any attempt to prove that Sir ROBERT COLLIER was not qualified for the Judicial Committee. If an unfit Judge had been appointed, the PRIME MINISTER and the CHANCELLOR would have committed a grave offence of which, in the present instance, they have never been accused; but unless they had also evaded the spirit of the law, as in the colourable appointment to the Bench of the Common Pleas, there could have been no pretext for the charge which has narrowly failed to subject them to Parliamentary censure. The speeches of Mr. WATKIN WILLIAMS, and more especially of Mr. DENMAN, are more significant than scores of party votes. The personal and political reasons which must have rendered it painful for Mr. DENMAN to express the universal feeling of disapproval were fully appreciated by the House of Commons. As he asserted with undoubted truth, he has stood by Mr. GLADSTONE when it was difficult for a Liberal not to waver in his allegiance; nor is it a light thing for a leader of the Bar to censure the conduct of the head of his profession. The flippant assertion that the minority gave a party vote happens, in this instance, to be the reverse of the truth. The Bar at least has from the first, as the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE stated, been practically unanimous in opinion; and it is satisfactory to observe that neither of the English law officers could be induced to defend the impropriety which has been committed.

If Mr. DENMAN with his strong convictions was in the right, it is not to be assumed that the majority was necessarily in the wrong. The statement that the House of Commons is at any time engaged in a judicial duty is always more or less figurative and incorrect; and it becomes especially inapplicable in cases where the prisoner at the bar and his accomplices occupy a seat on the bench. It is the business of a legislative body to decide, not what is legal, but what in all the circumstances of the case is conducive to the public interest. As a general rule it is not expedient to condone a violation or evasion of law; but even in such cases a sovereign Assembly is entitled to exercise a discretion. If for any reason the majority desires to keep a Government in office, it must in consistency abstain from a direct vote of censure, which is a measurable and definite punishment ordinarily involving resignation of office. There are various modes by which disapproval may be indicated, as by the intentional absence of leading members, by the silence of habitual partisans, and by the defection of a few more scrupulous adherents. All these hints and warnings were administered to the Government in the recent debate; and Sir ROUNDELL PALMER's limited and cautious amendment was in itself an admission that the proceeding had been liable to objection. A member of the majority might fairly convince himself that the conduct of Mr. GLADSTONE and Lord HATHERLEY was not deserving of Parliamentary censure, although it would have been wrong, on grounds of party convenience, or even of public interest, to meet Mr. Cross's motion with a direct negative. It is highly desirable that judicial and political functions should be kept distinct, even when Parliament is called upon to deal with an alleged infraction of the law. Before impeachments became obsolete, although the House of Lords was transformed for the purpose into a strictly judicial body, the duty of the House of Commons was to determine on political grounds whether it should prefer articles of impeachment. If no high crime and misdemeanour had been committed, the prosecution could not be supported; but when the offence was established, it was for the House to determine whether it was desirable as well as just to proceed. A simple vote of censure is still more obviously a matter of discretion; and the House of Commons has perhaps shown wisdom in adopting the amendment, especially as it has been adopted by so small a majority. Those who voted with Mr. Cross were clearly in the right; those who voted with Sir R. PALMER were perhaps in the right; and those who intentionally stayed away were also in the right. It is pleasant to arrive at the conclusion that all persons concerned, except Lord HATHERLEY and Mr. GLADSTONE, may by a benevolent interpretation be considered to have done their duty.

THE NEW VICEROY.

THE choice of a Viceroy for India is necessarily limited. The holder of the office must be a nobleman on the Ministerial side of some eminence, but not in the front ranks of his party. The list of such men is small, and it is further reduced by the obvious conditions that he must give a fair promise of showing the peculiar qualifications which the successful discharge of the office requires, and that he should be willing to go. When all these requirements are added together, it is obvious that the number of possible appointments might be counted on the fingers of one hand. Lord KIMBERLEY, Lord DUFFERIN, Lord MONCK, and Lord NORTHBROOK are probably the only names that could have been easily suggested, and they would probably have occurred to most people in the order in which we have given them. Of these Lord NORTHBROOK is to be the man, and no one can possibly say anything against the appointment. If not much is known of Lord NORTHBROOK, nothing is known against him, and the little that is known is in his favour. He has had something like a quarter of a century of official life, has been private secretary to various Ministers, and has been Under-Secretary of State on various occasions, having been Under-Secretary of State for India for two years. All that early and long official training could do for a man it has, therefore, done for Lord NORTHBROOK. And such training is no doubt very valuable for a Viceroy. It gives him habits of patience and industry, it supplies him gently and gradually with a great variety of information, and brings him into contact with a considerable number of people of different ranks and different habits of thought. It is a clear advantage that the new Viceroy should enter on his office with such an amount of knowledge of India as must have been gathered in two years by an Under-Secretary of State. Probably few men who have not been in India know so much about it as Mr. GRANT DUFF, and if the industry and passion for knowledge exhibited by Mr. GRANT DUFF are in some measure exceptional, yet any able Under-Secretary must learn in two years far more of the geography, resources, needs, and history of India than is possessed by the ordinary intelligent Englishman who has not been through the training of the India Office. Perhaps it is not too much to say that Lord NORTHBROOK starts in this way with a knowledge of India essential to the discharge of the duties of a Viceroy which he could not have gained in less than half a year after his Viceroyalty had begun. He is very much in the position of a diplomatist knowing already the language of the Court to which he is accredited. But Lord NORTHBROOK has also been for a long time Under-Secretary for War, and here too his experience will be of great use to him. The Viceroy of India governs a vast Empire dependent for its existence on the supremacy and efficiency of a comparatively small military force, and to understand the machinery of army organization is to understand how the main instrument of his rule practically works. A Viceroy can know nothing of military science, nor can he form any trustworthy judgment of military operations, from merely having been Under-Secretary of State for War; but he must have learnt very much of that which it is the peculiar province of the Viceroy to know with regard to the Indian army—how troops are got together, quartered, and cared for, how much they cost, and what are the general antecedents of the regiments, and of the officers commanding them. Lord NORTHBROOK starts, therefore, with two kinds of knowledge which will be very useful to him. But all special knowledge is but the scaffolding on which the fame of an efficient Viceroy is to be built. The qualities he mainly needs are far higher, far more personal, than any which training can give. He must have insight, calmness, boldness, and generosity. No one can pretend to say whether a man who has only filled subordinate offices in England will exhibit such qualities when he is made Viceroy of India. Something must be taken on trust and accredited to the mere fact that he is the choice of the Government, which is deeply interested in making a good choice, and the chiefs of which have abundant opportunities of gauging the character and capacity of their subordinates such as no one else can have. Lord NORTHBROOK, too, has had one opportunity of showing that he possessed qualities of a higher calibre than the possession of a subordinate office would necessarily imply, and he took ample advantage of it. Last year it fell to his lot to introduce the Army Bill in the House of Lords; and he did so with such a comprehensive grasp of his subject, with such a knowledge of details, and such a power of weaving details into a whole, that he not only effaced the memory of the weak and incoherent manner in which Mr. CARDWELL had advocated the Bill, but he silenced the criticism of the Duke of RICHMOND. A subordinate official who could make such a speech fully deserves to have an occasion given him of showing all that he can do on a large scale and in a high sphere.

Lord NORTHBROOK has by no means an easy task before him. Lord MAYO has been very popular, and has merited his popularity, and his sudden and awful death will cast a halo round his memory, which will easily make men feel it a duty to themselves to have had a warm and abiding esteem for him. It will be harder for Lord NORTHBROOK to be considered at first a fit successor to Lord MAYO than it would have been if Lord MAYO had served his time, and come home safely to England, and Lord NORTHBROOK had then replaced him. But, apart from this, the Viceroy of India, whoever he may be, has many causes of anxiety pressing on him. Two especially seem to press more heavily every day. In the first place, there is the financial difficulty, which is very serious. India is taxed almost as much as it can bear, and yet the proceeds are scarcely sufficient to meet the inevitable expenditure. The Indian Civil Service, otherwise so rich in ability, has certainly not produced the financial ability which can deal with the revenues of the Empire as a whole. The experiment of sending out financiers from England has been a failure, with the exception of Mr. WILSON; and the only other resource is to have as chief financier an official trained in India. Sir RICHARD TEMPLE is perhaps as competent as any one that could be named, but he has shown that he is quite unaware whether he has got a surplus or a deficit, and has no knowledge how a new tax will practically work. In military matters and in legal matters the Viceroys have on the whole been very fortunate. They have had men of great ability and ready resources to help them. Lord NORTHBROOK himself begins his rule auspiciously in this way, for the Bar could not have supplied him with a legal adviser better fitted in every way to assist him and to imprint a large character on his legislation than Mr. HOBHOUSE, who goes out at the same time with him. But in finance Lord NORTHBROOK will get very little help worth having, except that which will be afforded him by the experience, industry, and accumulated stores of information which he will find at his command in almost every higher branch of the Indian Civil Service, and which will serve him as a trustworthy basis on which his general schemes of finance may be founded. The English Government in India is necessarily enormously expensive. It cost us a great amount of money to conquer the natives, and now we have to make them pay the interest on the cost of conquering them. What weighs India down is the burden of debt incurred to conquer India, coupled with the enormous cost of having enough European soldiers to guard our conquests now that they have been made. If we have no more wars of any magnitude in India for many years, the country will become much richer, and the burden of debt will consequently be relatively lighter. But as things are at present we cannot possibly reduce our military expenditure. We have not got a soldier or a rifle too many in India, and the natives must somehow be made to find the money necessary for the army. Savings might perhaps be made here and there, but they would be trifling. There is, in fact, only one change which, if it were possible, would really permit a reduction of expenditure, and lessen the pressure of taxation. If we could persuade the native princes to disarm on condition of a guarantee of quiet possession from any exterior force, we should be relieved from one of the causes of danger which make our military expenditure so heavy. These princes amuse themselves by keeping on foot and equipping with arms of the newest pattern armies of very considerable size for no apparent purpose whatever. These forces are ten times what they need for the internal police of their territories, and there is no external enemy that could touch them. The real object of these armies is that their masters, if bad times came for the English, might rule the situation, and ask their own terms. We are at present on excellent terms with these princes, but we are obliged to watch their armies and keep armies of our own ready to hold them in check. The consequence is that the vast majority of the natives of India bear the burden of taxes which they hate, and which grind them terribly, in order that the princes of a small minority may enhance their dignity by keeping up armies to frighten us with.

The other new and somewhat serious danger which a Viceroy has to face is that of religious fanaticism impelling men to kill or rise against those who are their religious enemies, even though they will certainly sacrifice their own lives in the attempt. We do not mean that Lord NORTHBROOK has to contend with the fear of being himself assassinated. It is very unlikely that such a thing should occur twice, and even if it were more likely than it is, Lord NORTHBROOK is an Englishman and would never dream of shrinking from his duty for fear of his life. But the head of a great Government has to think of other people, and this new danger of assassination does undoubtedly throw a cloud over Indian life. Let it be granted that no number of assassinations would prevent the Indian Government from having a constant supply of fit servants at its command; there still remains the immense amount of family distress and apprehension that must prevail, and which would cause a man of feeling in the position of Viceroy the most poignant regret. Hitherto the servants of the Crown in India have gone about their daily duties in happy tranquillity, as if they had been in England; and it would be a terrible change to them if they began to feel as if they were living in Westmeath. Nor is it only assassination that is to be feared. We have not heard as yet the true history of the extraordinary Kooka outbreak, and of its still more extraordinary suppression. The severity with which the insurgents were punished, the wholesale sacrifice of life after all resistance was at an end, can only be justified on the ground that the officials on the spot saw in the movement a far more serious danger than those not on the spot could appreciate. It is not pleasant for Englishmen to read of deeds being done on people under our rule which the leaders of the Versailles troops scarcely rivalled last May. Both such assassinations as that of Chief Justice NORMAN and the Kooka outbreak seem, as has been truly remarked in the Daily News, to be due to the operation of general causes, the effects of which are clearly traceable in Europe at present. As modern thought prevails in the world, the bigotry of the bigoted becomes intensified and furious. What is called religion poisons more and more the hearts of those who think themselves pre-eminently religious. Ultramontanes are the Kookas and Wahabees of the West. The last news from Berlin is that the police have cautioned Prince BISMARCK against probable attacks by fanatics roused by Ultramontane agitation, and have arrested a Papal Zouave who, they thought, was meditating his assassination. This may be all nonsense; the police may be unnecessarily apprehensive; and if any Ultramontanes have formed such a design, they must be Ultramontanes of whom the general body of Ultramontanes would be thoroughly ashamed. But there is no saying to what lengths religious fanaticism, when it feels its empire tottering under its feet, will not go; and the base attacks made daily on the Abbé MICHAUD by the Ultramontane press in Paris exemplify to what depth of infamy men calling themselves religious will sink, and how eagerly they will try, although they spare the body, to destroy by lies and calumnies the moral life of a man who, although he agrees with them on ninety-nine out of a hundred points of their religion, ventures to differ from them on one.

PARTY PROGRAMMES IN FRANCE.

IT has for some time been evident that neither of the two great parties into which the French Assembly is divided would have patience to pursue much longer a policy of self-restraint. The first to depart from it has been the Right. The recent manifesto of the Count of CHAMBORD was an intimation to the more reasonable Legitimists that they must take matters into their own hands. All that HENRY V. would do for them was to make their position in the country more and more impossible. A monarchical restoration is obviously unattainable unless it can secure the support of all sections of the monarchical party. Viewed from the dynastic side, a fusion is easy enough. The head of one of the rival houses is childless, and the head of the other is his natural heir. A settlement that would make the Count of CHAMBORD King would at the same time place the Count of PARIS next in succession to the throne. If in this way the present would be given to the Legitimists, the future would be reserved for the Orleanists. The one would have all they could look for under any circumstances, the other would have as much as they can hope for under the actual circumstances. Viewed, however, from the side of principle, this solution is not so much a matter of course. The monarchy of July represented the supremacy of the national will in constitutional questions. To ask its supporters to accept the Count of CHAMBORD as their King, without any reservation, would be to ask them to abandon all for which they have been contending, whether in power or in Opposition, for the last forty years. And even if their support could be obtained on these terms, the more reasonable Legitimists are no doubt aware that, though they might be valuable as a Parliamentary reinforcement, they would bring with them no real force in the country. Any power the Orleanists may possess outside the Assembly would be lost by their unconditional submission to the White Flag. The state of affairs in France is hardly such as to make it safe to postpone the consideration of the attitude to be assumed by the monarchical party in the event of the constitutional issue being suddenly presented to the nation. In name, no doubt, the Bordeaux compact is still in force, and the position and conduct of M. THIERS is certainly as exceptional, and in that sense as provisional, as anything can well be. But the maintenance of the singular compromise under which Frenchmen are now living depends absolutely on the life and temper of one man. The death of M. THIERS must inevitably put an end to it; his resignation may put an end to it any day. The wisest thing that all parties could do at this moment would be to lay aside all thoughts of the future, and devote themselves to the needs of the present. But two considerations may be supposed to have prevented the monarchical party from taking this course. In the first place, they probably fear that the country is, to say the least, not growing more monarchical. They are stronger in the Assembly now than they can feel sure of being by and by. In some form or other dissolution, total or partial, must eventually overtake them, and if they wait much longer before giving shape to their policy, they may have to formulate it in the character of a Parliamentary minority. In the second place, they can have no assurance that their adversaries will be equally forbearing. There may be sensible Republicans, as there may be sensible Monarchists, who wish to see established, not the form of government they themselves prefer, but the form of government which has the best chance of securing a working majority in the country. But the more active members of the Left have as little intention of submitting their cause to the judgment of the nation as the most ardent partisans of Divine Right. They are willing to put up with a Government which, though in form Republican, is in effect provisional, because they think that time makes for them rather than for their opponents. But, if they changed their opinion upon this point, they would precipitate a revolution or a coup d'état with no more hesitation than if it were a change of Ministry. The Right are not likely to underestimate the danger to themselves involved in this frame of mind, and the dread of it has probably helped to drive them into more decisive action.

The first move came, as might have been expected, from the Moderate Right. They were not so pledged as the extreme section to await the initiative of the Count of CHAMBORD, while the Right Centre, consisting chiefly of Orleanists, had no manifestoes to escape from, and could consequently afford to wait while the Legitimists tried their hands on the construction of a common platform for the whole monarchical party. Accordingly the Moderate Right drew up a programme which was signed by about eighty deputies, and then taken to Antwerp to be submitted to the Count of CHAMBORD. The Count appears to have behaved with unexpected prudence. What he said on the subject has not been made public, but at all events he left so much freedom of action to his supporters that on the return of the deputation to Paris the programme was signed by the whole of the Legitimist Right. It seems certain that this programme contains nothing which is opposed to Orleanist principles, though it may be silent upon some points which the latter party would like to see included. The difference between the two is not however sufficient to prevent the Orleanist Right Centre from signing a letter of adhesion addressed to the authors of the programme, and claiming to share in their belief that constitutional Monarchy is the best government for France. The programme and the letter of adhesion have between them obtained not far short of 280 signatures.

It seems to be understood that the programme of the Right will not be put forward as a call to immediate action. Probably nothing would be less to the taste of the deputies who have signed it than a sudden rupture with M. THIERS. They may be expected therefore to disclaim all thought of disturbing the existing order of things, or of anticipating by a premature application of their principles the constitutional settlement which must follow upon M. THIERS's retirement. It remains to be seen, however, whether the PRESIDENT will overlook their avowed enmity to Republican institutions in consideration of their tolerance of the particular Republic he has taken under his protection. M. THIERS is probably sincerely convinced that the Republic is the Government best calculated to unite the nation, and such personal ambition as he may possess must lead him to desire the permanence of institutions with which his name will be inseparably associated. Until a day or two back it was believed that the Left and the Left Centre were nearly all agreed upon a programme by which M. THIERS should be declared President either for life or for a long term, an Upper Chamber could be created, and the dissolution of the Assembly should be spread over three years by the expedient of partial elections. Parties in the Assembly are too nearly balanced to justify any confident prediction as to the result of such a proposal. It differs from that of the Right not only in the nature of the settlement which it aims at effecting, but also in its more open departure from the Bordeaux compact. There would be nothing provisional about a Republic with a regularly constituted Legislature, and M. THIERS as Life President. It would rest on a direct exercise of that constituent power which the Left have hitherto denied to the Assembly, and it would be quite inconsistent with that subordination of the constitutional controversy to the more immediate needs of France which M. THIERS has hitherto preached. Whether these features in the scheme would be favourable or unfavourable to its success in the Assembly it is hard to say. On the one hand, its adoption would give the Republic a formal sanction which it has not yet received, and would so far defeat the ends of the Monarchists. On the other hand, it would give the Republic an evident stability which does not now belong to it, and so might conciliate that class of Conservatives which is more anxious to obtain a strong government than careful of the shape in which it is cast. On the whole, it seems most probable that, should the question be submitted to them, the majority of the Assembly will prefer the course which offers them the smallest amount of immediate and conspicuous change—a recommendation which is certainly possessed by the programme of the Left. The additional stability conferred on the position of M. THIERS will affect its duration, but will not alter its visible character; and some even of those who have signed one or other of the documents put out by the Right may persuade themselves that in making M. THIERS President for life the Assembly will be only carrying out the principle laid down at Bordeaux, and deferring the final determination of the form of government until the special work which he has undertaken has been completed. The victory of the Right, if followed by the resignation of M. THIERS and the break-up of the existing Government, offers a far more alarming prospect to timid politicians. The Republican party would certainly not allow the majority in the Chamber to carry out its designs unopposed; and to provide an open conflict with them, with the German troops still occupying French territory, and a Monarchist faction watching every occasion of turning the dimensions of their adversaries to their own ends, would be an act of unexampled folly. It is possible also that M. THURM might rather to recognize the right of the existing Assembly to proclaim a Monarchy, and might thus force the Right to take their choice between submitting their scheme to a fresh Assembly, of whose disposition they could have no assurance, and facing the armed forces of the Republic with Marshal MACMAHON at their head. Considering the unsatisfactory nature of these prospects, it will be strange if French Conservatism, after it has once aired its monarchical predilections, does not find some excuse for consigning the expression of them to the journals of the Assembly.

At the last moment, however, it appears to be doubtful whether the Government have not repented of their intended abandonment of the existing order of things, and whether the Bill introduced on Tuesday by the Ministers of the Interior is not meant to be their answer to the movement of the Right. M. LEFRANC proposes to take power to prosecute "under the law of the 17th of May, 1819," all attacks upon the rights and authority of the Assembly and the Government legally constituted by successive votes in 1871. An Orleanist journal characterizes this Bill as an attempt to make the Republic permanent by a side wind; and it is so unusual to find the Left supporting a measure of so stringent a kind, that this description, though it comes from a hostile quarter, may perhaps be admitted as substantially true.

MR. GLADSTONE IN THE TANTRUMS.

IT is evident from a variety of indications that the political atmosphere is at present in a highly electrical condition; and those who are under its influence exhibit all the symptoms of restlessness, irritation, and general malaise which are usually observed when there is a storm in the air. The temperature is sultry, gusty little breezes are blowing about from all quarters, and sparks are extracted on the slightest provocation. Of course the wind may change and the weather may clear up, but at present there is every reason to look out for squalls. At any moment the gathering clouds may come together with a crash. Mr. GLADSTONE's nervous and sympathetic nature is peculiarly susceptible to meteorological conditions of this kind, and it is not perhaps surprising that his temper just now should not be at its best. It is enough to try the equanimity of the most placid and philosophic statesman to find that, after being accustomed to wield a large and docile majority, he is compelled, in the very first week of a new Session, to withdraw a motion lest he should be ignominiously beaten; and that on a grave question of Parliamentary censure he can, with all his efforts, muster only a bare majority of twenty-seven. The train of reflections is not a pleasant one, and probably accounts for the strange outbreak of Thursday night. It has been remarked that while the Ministry were singularly successful in the two great measures which they first brought forward, they have, by a curious fatality, gone wrong in almost everything else. Sometimes they have made a false start to begin with; sometimes they have started right and have then skittishly and perversely bucked up a wrong turning, or wheeled round and dashed off in the opposite direction. On the Royal Parks Bill, which has supplied a striking illustration of their freakish and uncertain temper, their course seemed to be too plain and simple for the possibility of mistake. It is absurd and intolerable that the Royal Parks should be the only public grounds in which there are no adequate means of maintaining peace and order. If they had happened to be under the care of any municipal body they would at once, and as a matter of course, have fallen within the scope of enactments providing for the strict and efficient supervision of the people frequenting them, and for the suppression and punishment of disorder. The wording of some of the clauses of the Bill is perhaps open to improvement, and the question how far the park-keepers should be assimilated to the police is one which may be usefully discussed. But the general purpose of the Bill was so obviously reasonable and necessary, that it was startling to find that even Mr. VERNON HARCOURT could discover anything in it to object to. Mr. HARCOURT, however, has laid himself out to play a particular part. It is impossible to be a great agitator if there is nothing to agitate about. It is Mr. HARCOURT's misfortune, not his fault, that he did not happen to be in Parliament when the Six Acts supplied a tempting subject for patriotic declamation. But if there are no Six Acts now, why then, of course, patriots must make the most of what there is. The country manager took care to bring his tub and pumps into the play because he had picked them up cheap, and felt bound to turn them to account. Mr. HARCOURT has apparently laid in a stock of stale invective from the storehouse of Hansard, and the Parks Bill happened to be the best one he could find for his laborious recitations. A great many good things and strong things have been said in the course of time about the liberty of the subject, and Mr. HARCOURT is not weak enough to be debarred from repeating them merely because the question was settled before he was born. Mr. ARRYEN remarked that it is very easy to get up in the House of Commons and read off pages of Hansard, but we fancy there is only one member capable of doing it—at least in Mr. HARCOURT's way.

It is impossible to suppose that there was any collusion between the Government and Mr. HARCOURT, but the sudden surrender which they attempted on Thursday was certainly suspicious. One of the provisions of the Bill is that the Ranger shall have power to draw up by-laws for the regulation of the Parks, which are then to be submitted for the approval of the Chief Commissioner of Works. The effect of this arrangement would of course be that the Government would be responsible, through the Chief Commissioner, for the regulation of the Parks. In deference, however, to Mr. HARCOURT, the HOME SECRETARY proposed suddenly, and without notice, to transfer the responsibility from the Government to Parliament. The real contest is, of course, about the right of holding meetings in the Parks; and the consequences of this amendment would necessarily be, as Mr. HARDY pointed out, to keep open a dangerous controversy, and to provoke protracted and irritating contests as often as the question was raised. It is obvious that a matter of this kind ought not to be settled definitely and permanently, and that there ought not to be periodical squabbles as to whether one meeting should be allowed and another meeting prohibited. Mr. GLADSTONE holds that there "might be cases of particular celebrations in the Parks which might present exceptional circumstances, and which might perhaps require regulations of a special and temporary character." It will be at once apparent that there is the widest difference, for example, between a meeting held in honour of Mr. GLADSTONE and a meeting held to protest against his policy and to ridicule his character. Mr. GLADSTONE's "flesh and blood" is bound to agree with him on all questions, to sit with humble admiration at his feet and look up admiringly, to sing his praises and to do his bidding with prompt and servile obedience. For a long time the meetings in the Parks and streets have all been on Mr. GLADSTONE's side, and the whole force of the police has been placed at the disposal of the agitators. But there have been of late some indications of a change of tone in the howlings of the mob, and Mr. GLADSTONE is now satisfied that there are circumstances under which these meetings may require some regulation. It is unfortunate that this discovery should not have been made at an earlier period. Mr. GLADSTONE admits that six years ago "the power and authority of the Legislature and of the Crown were placed at the mercy of the populace of London." The attempt to shirk responsibility for the present Bill is hardly more discreditable than Mr. GLADSTONE's attempt to fasten the blame of this melancholy incident on the Conservative Government which was then in office. The Government of that day certainly did not manage the matter discreetly, but the difficulties in which they were placed were in no small degree caused by Mr. GLADSTONE himself, who did what he could to prevent, not only the enforcement of the law as it was, but the passing of a new law intended to prevent a repetition of these dangerous disorders.

If Mr. GLADSTONE has exhausted his stock of heroic policy, he has still abundance of heroic language which he can turn on at a moment's notice. Mr. HARDY's candid criticisms were denounced as "a most wanton and extravagant manifestation of the acid and venomous spirit of party," while an unpleasant reminder that he had welcomed the rioters at his own house was declared to have not "a single shred, syllable, or shadow of truth in it." Mr. DISRAELI was under a misapprehension when he said that Mr. GLADSTONE addressed a mob which had assembled outside his house. It was a member of Mr. GLADSTONE's family who did the honours on that occasion to the tumultuous guests; but on a subsequent day Mr. GLADSTONE himself received the most notorious and disreputable of the ringleaders of the mob at his house, and conferred with them in an encouraging manner as to the arrangements for a demonstration on the next Sunday afternoon. It was then that Mr. GLADSTONE, addressing FINLEN and his companions, said "he was always happy to receive a deputation of real working-men, such as the one before him," and intimated that "expressions of public opinion" were good for the House of Lords. On Thursday night Mr. GLADSTONE said that he did not consider the famous meeting, for which he promoted Mr. BEALES to be a Judge, an illegal assembly. It is known that the PREMIER has peculiar views as to the interpretation of statutes and the authority of the law. His moral consciousness is no doubt superior to the paltry restrictions of ordinary jurisprudence. Mr. GLADSTONE must have been aware in 1866 that Sir A. COCKBURN, Sir R. BETHELL, and Mr. WILLES had signed an opinion that "the public" "have not acquired any legal right to use the Parks by reason of the continued user under the license and by favour of the Crown." Moreover, he cannot have been ignorant that Sir GEORGE GREY, before he left office, had given precisely the same orders as Mr. WALPOLE in regard to popular demonstrations. In point of fact, the law has remained the same as when successive Home Secretaries, supported by authoritative advice, declared that meetings in the Parks were illegal; yet for five years such meetings have been repeatedly held in defiance of the law, under the tacit encouragement of Mr. GLADSTONE, and some at least of his associates, who have even gone so far as to place the police at the service of the agitators as a guard of honour. Whether political meetings in the Parks and streets should be allowed is a question on which there may be some difference of opinion; but there can be no doubt that it is dangerous and discreditable that the law on such a matter should be left in a state of uncertainty, or rather that the law should be certain and that the authorities should be indisposed or afraid to carry it out. Mr. GLADSTONE is now reaping the fruits of his own factiousness in other years.

RAILWAY AMALGAMATION.

THE House of Commons has approved the proposal of a Joint Committee to inquire into the projected schemes of railway amalgamation. A similar course was adopted some years ago with reference to the schemes of metropolitan railways; but in the present instance the plan is rather plausible than expedient. It might be reasonably contended that an impartial tribunal, not fettered by the examination of details, would be competent to determine the general course of the lines which would be best suited to the accommodation of London. A fuller inquiry was afterwards conducted in the usual manner by an exceptionally able Select Committee under the presidency of Lord STANLEY; and its task was partially simplified by the previous elimination of some of the competing schemes by the decision of the General Committee. The proposed amalgamations are not competing schemes; and the expediency of each union must depend on the particular circumstances of the case, which can only be ascertained by a detailed inquiry. It is not likely that a Joint Committee will propound any general principle by which the merits of amalgamation can be affirmed or denied. Mr. CARDWELL's Committee nearly twenty years ago propounded a doctrine which still deserves attention, though its application is liable to qualifications and exceptions. The Committee recommended that, as a general rule, amalgamations of continuous lines should be favoured, but that parallel and competing lines should be kept reciprocally independent. Select Committees have since that time not unfrequently disregarded both rules in special instances; and their decisions have in the great majority of cases been sound. If a just conclusion may not be certain of attainment even when all the conditions of the question are fully known, much less will it be secured at random, and in ignorance of the facts. Some amalgamations are useful; some are mischievous; and any general proposition which applies to both cases must necessarily be false.

The largest scheme of amalgamation which has been proposed for several years was, after an arduous and exhaustive inquiry, rejected by a Committee of the House of Lords; and, although the promoters were naturally disappointed, the soundness of the judgment, as representing the balance of expediency in a difficult case, was generally acknowledged. The traders in one district, containing perhaps a million of inhabitants, supported the proposed amalgamation; the traders in another district, with half the population, petitioned and appeared against it, and three or four Railway Companies considered that their own interests and those of their customers would be seriously injured by the measure. All the statements and arguments on every side were carefully weighed; and the decision was given exclusively with a view to the public interest. If the case had been considered by such a Committee as that which is now to be appointed, any judgment which might have been formed would have been as worthless as a decision by the cast of the dice. Without minute inquiries it would have been impossible to judge how far traffic would be cheapened, facilitated, or diverted by the union of two Companies, or which of the representations of the various parties to the contest ought to prevail. All the disputants were from their respective points of view more or less in the right; and there was no royal road to the result of ascertaining the balance of expediency. If a Committee of Judges had sat on the TICHBORNE case before it was submitted to the jury, they could only have formed a conjectural opinion of the truth; and the expediency of an amalgamation is a more complicated question than the truth or falsehood of a narrative. If Parliament had arrived at a resolution that no Railway Company should be allowed to possess more than a certain mileage, or a certain amount of capital, it would be perfectly reasonable to supersede a detailed inquiry into a proposed violation of the rule; but in such a case it would be idle to remit the question to a Committee, which can have no special qualification for imposing general rules on Railway Companies. It was long ago discovered that first principles in science and philosophy were barren, and first principles about railways are at least equally unprofitable. It may be confidently asserted that any proposition which should be equally applicable to the lines in the South-west of England, to the London and North-Western and Lancashire and Yorkshire, and to the Midland and Glasgow and South-Western, would be at the same time arbitrary and nugatory. A partial investigation of any of the cases, in the absence of full information, would be in the highest degree unsatisfactory.

Some of the commercial bodies which have urged on the Government, or on Parliament, the adoption of an exceptional mode of inquiry, appear to have thought that the applications for amalgamation furnished a suitable occasion for imposing on the Companies a reduction of rates. It is not impossible that in some cases such a course might be just and practicable, but no Committee can fairly lay down a general rule on the subject, unless it is assumed that all the existing charges are both equal and excessive, and that the working expenses would be largely reduced by amalgamation. If a General Committee recommended a reduction of rates as a condition of granting the proposed facilities, the Companies might refuse to proceed with an amalgamation which might nevertheless be required by the public interest. As the actual rates are, with few exceptions, far within the Parliamentary powers of the Companies, a mere reduction of legal tolls would in the majority of instances operate only on the margin between the Parliamentary tariff and the practical rates. On the other hand, it would be unjust to reduce the legal rates within the limits which have been fixed by the judicious liberality of the Companies. It is not improbable that some of the Companies may be prepared to offer a reduction of some special charges as a price for the boon which they ask of Parliament; but no General Committee in a summary inquiry will have the opportunity of examining whether their offers are sufficient. It is out of the question to do justice in complicated matters of business without entering into minute details. As the two Companies propose by their Amalgamation Bill to revise and consolidate their joint tariff, the traders of the district will have an opportunity of being heard on the question of rates which they may regard as objectionable; but the revision of the tariffs of the London and North-Western and the Lancashire and Yorkshire Companies is incapable of being summed up in a few general propositions. The uncertainty which is often invidiously attributed to the decisions of Parliament on such questions as those of railway amalgamation is inherent in the subject-matter, and not in the judgment of the tribunal. As long as some amalgamations are desirable and some are undesirable, a just solution of the questions which arise must be sometimes positive and sometimes negative.

It is difficult to exaggerate the importance of the issues which are apparently to be decided in haste, because they especially require careful and leisurely deliberation. It will probably be alleged by some opponents of the London and North-Western amalgamation that it will terminate a beneficial competition, and that it will place large manufacturing districts at the mercy of a single Company. Other opponents will contend that it will frustrate the policy of Parliament by directing traffic exclusively on certain lines, and by rendering useless the authorized outlay of millions of capital. The effect

Boards will be prepared with answers to objections which they will not have failed to anticipate; and both parties will be prepared with statistics and skilled opinions in support of their respective opinions. It may be assumed, on the authority of those who know best, and who are directly interested in the result, that unless unduly severe conditions are imposed by Parliament, the amalgamation will be immediately beneficial to both members of the intended partnership. Whether it is prudent for railway shareholders to combine into gigantic monopolies, is a question of ulterior policy which Boards of Directors apparently think too remote for notice. A Company with eighty or ninety millions of capital and two thousand miles of railway offers to its enemies the temptation of presenting a single neck to a future blow. Parliament will, however, not consider so carefully either the near or the distant prospects of the shareholders as the interest of the great body of travellers and freighters who may be affected by the proposed combination. The advantages which will be offered have been on several occasions enumerated by the allied Boards, but hitherto the principal customers seem to apprehend a balance of loss and inconvenience. On every point, except the interest of the amalgamating Companies, the General Committee will only be able to acquire a vague and general knowledge. If, not satisfied with the complexity of each separate inquiry, they attempt to deal comprehensively with all the Companies which ask either for amalgamation or for working agreements which will have nearly the same effect, they will only arrive at a decision by excluding from consideration the most important elements of every case.

DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

SOME surprise was expressed during the debate on the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill on Wednesday that the COMMON SERJEANT should, with unaccustomed modesty, have been content to move the second reading by simply nodding his head, and should have remained bashfully in the background while the discussion was proceeding. Considering his latest appearance in connexion with the measure, it is perhaps more surprising that he should have mustered up courage to present it once more, even mutely, to the consideration of Parliament. Mr. CHAMBERS must have been painfully impressed by the tameness of Parliamentary procedure as compared with the exhilarating liveliness of an indignation meeting in St. James's Hall. There was discretion, if not wit, in the brevity of his remarks. He may possibly be reserving himself for a lime-light demonstration among the lions of Trafalgar Square; and it is natural that he should keep his eloquence for those who appreciate it. Mr. CHAMBERS observed on Wednesday that argument on the Deceased Wife's Sister question was exhausted, and this is an obvious inference from the incendiary policy to which he pledged himself last year. If he had had any faith in argument, he would not have appealed to the Red Republicans of the metropolis to assist him in destroying any parts of the Constitution which seemed to stand in the way of his pet scheme for revolutionizing the marriage law. His democratic allies were more logical than their leader in demanding the abolition, not merely of the Bishops, but of the whole House of Lords; for if the Bishops had abstained from voting, the Bill would equally have been rejected. It may be admitted that if all the checks of the Constitution were removed, legislation by crotchet-mongers or interested agitators would be much facilitated. If the COMMON SERJEANT had happened to be a deceased wife's sister who did not want to marry her brother-in-law, and who felt that it was cruel and unjust to expose her to the suspicion that she had an eye to her sister's shoes because she was kind to her nephews and nieces, he would certainly have felt justified in proposing the abolition of a House of Commons which passed such Bills.

It is acknowledged that the demand for this change in the law of marriage comes only from a small knot of people. It is known that the anonymous Society which conducts the agitation with so much spirit and such a lavish expenditure is mainly supported by one or two rich widowers who are living with their wives' sisters, and who, having gratified their passions in defiance of the law, now desire to procure an indemnity for their selfish and deliberate misconduct. Mr. GULPIN, who is a supporter of the Society, repudiated with not unnatural heat the suspicion that he has himself done anything of the kind; but of course he could not deny that the ladies and gentlemen who ambuscade behind the Secretary have the strongest personal reasons for seeking an alteration of the law, and for not allowing their names to be published. We are asked to believe that it is in the interest of the poor that the change is advocated; but this plea has been repeatedly exploded. In the first place, the cohabitation of a deceased wife's sister with her brother-in-law is by no means so frequent among the labouring classes as has been asserted. The Royal Commission of 1847, which was got up by the agitators, which was biased in their favour, and was supplied with evidence that they had been at great pains to collect, could discover only forty cases of such unions among the poor. In two large and populous metropolitan parishes the closest and most persevering research brought to light only a couple of instances. But even if it were true that these unions were common among the working classes, that would in itself be an obviously insufficient ground for bringing the law into accordance with the peculiar habits of ignorant and impulsive people. There are among the poor more cases of marriage within other prohibited degrees, and of the worst kinds of incest, than of this particular infraction of the law; but it will hardly be argued that incest should be legalized in order to whitewash those who have committed an abominable crime. No doubt the law is a grievance to those who are suffering from having broken it; but it is a grievance of the rich rather than of the poor. It is the rich man who feels most acutely the scandal of his position, and the difficulties which he has placed in the way of leaving property to his children. Previously to 1835 there might have been some confusion of mind as to the legal aspect of the question, but all doubt was then removed, and a fair warning given to all who might think of forming a connexion within the forbidden degrees. It is impossible to speak too strongly of the reckless selfishness of the men who have contracted unions of this kind, regardless of the consequences to the partners and offspring of their shame. A similar spirit is now displayed in the demand that the established usages of society, fortified by custom and justified by experience, shall be revolutionized, to the pain, perplexity, and disorder of the whole community, in order that a small number of persons who have deliberately and wilfully broken the law may be relieved from the penalties of their misconduct. It is known that the Scotch are strongly opposed to this measure. In Ireland, as Mr. MAGUIRE said, it is regarded with loathing and execration. In England there is perhaps more indifference on the subject; but it cannot be pretended that there is any popular desire for a change in the law; and it is certain that one of the affinity restrictions cannot be removed without loosening the rest. At present the law rests on a distinct and consistent principle which everybody understands; but if the marriage of a deceased wife's sister is sanctioned, it will be difficult to produce logical reasons why a man should not be allowed to marry his mother-in-law, or his wife's aunt, or niece; or why women should not marry their deceased husband's brothers, nephews, uncles, or fathers.

Even if it could be shown to be not contrary to public policy to permit men to marry their deceased wives' sisters, nothing could be more demoralizing than that a retrospective indemnity should be allowed to those who have violated the law; and it is also objectionable to legislate with regard to a particular relationship without settling the whole question of affinities on some intelligent and unmistakable principle. In point of fact, however, the partial relaxation of the affinity restrictions which is now proposed is, in itself, impolitic and mischievous. Custom has much to do with the sanctity and force of laws, and it is important that the public mind should not be unsettled on such a subject as marriage without serious cause. At present most people are satisfied with the law as it is, and suffer no inconvenience from it; and that is an excellent reason for letting it alone. But we are also of opinion that the Bill, if passed, would create greater hardships than any which it removes. It is singular that the advocates of the measure do not see how completely and conclusively "the natural protector" argument recoils against themselves. It is true that in the hour of affliction the sister-in-law appears upon the scene as the natural guardian of the bereaved family; but if it were to be understood that she might perhaps be chosen to console the widower as a second helpmate, her position would be materially altered. It is simply because the deceased wife's sister is regarded as a real sister that she is able, without scandal or offence, to show sisterly attentions to the widower, and to take a motherly charge of the children. By the COMMON SERJEANT'S Bill the "natural protector" would be at once banished or abolished; and auntie would become a marriageable woman who has her character to look after. It is possible that this measure may again pass the House of Commons; but loose and care-has legislation on such a matter is not creditable to that assembly. The majority on Wednesday was a shade more than the majority of last year, although less in proportion to the numbers present. There is no subject on which the House of Commons has displayed so much hesitation and uncertainty. The Bill has been thrown out in one House quite as often as in the other, and though the declarations of the Commons in favour of any measure ought of course to be duly taken into account by the Lords, the Lords are also entitled to consider how far these declarations embody sincere, earnest, and permanent convictions.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.

THE Public Health Bill seems likely to encounter more criticism from the friends than from the enemies of sanitary reform. At first sight this may seem a virtual condemnation of the Bill. There are, it may be objected, so many interests and prejudices which will be, or think that they will be, injured by effective legislation on the subject, that to say that a measure has any chance of escaping their hostility is equivalent to saying that it is worthless. That the public health will not be properly cared for without a stand-up fight with all manner of local abuses may be readily admitted. The only question is, at what stage of the campaign the decisive battle should be fought. Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY holds that there is no time like the present. He regrets that Mr STANFELD has not aimed at consolidating the existing sanitary laws, as well as at amending and completing them. The reason he gives for this regret is perfectly sound in itself, but it fails to support the conclusion which he bases on it. It is true that the law at present is so confused, contradictory, and scattered that nobody knows it. That is a conclusive argument for future consolidation, and if those were the only defects that can be charged against the law as it stands, it would be a conclusive argument for immediate consolidation. As a matter of fact, however, the existing law has other faults, and the question which Mr STANFELD had to consider was whether, in attempting to remove both kinds of defects by one and the same process, he might not be less successful than in applying a remedy to each separately. The necessary amendments and additions may not be very numerous, but many of them relate to matters of extreme importance, and—what is more to the purpose—to matters whose full importance can only be seen when they are viewed in connection with the existing law. These new provisions will constitute the missing wheels which are to set others in motion. Until they have been supplied it may not be expedient to make the capacity of the machine too well understood. There are many sanitary powers already created by Act of Parliament which are inefficient simply because there is no proper authority to put them in operation. Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY's plan of action would amount to a proclamation that such or such a sanitary authority is to be constituted in every district, and that the powers vested in it are to be of such or such a kind. A warning like this would naturally arouse whatever latent opposition there may be on the part both of those who will have to exercise and those who will have to submit to the new authority. All that it can do, or make others do, would be flouted in the face of opponents at the very moment when the House of Commons is asked to call such an authority into being. The danger of active resistance would thus be immensely increased, and in a body like the House of Commons active resistance to reforms unconnected with a political party is usually successful for a time. The Opposition knows what it wants, and is willing to subordinate all other considerations to the one object it has in view. The authors of the measure, supposing it to be introduced by the Government, have other things to think of besides the passing of this particular Bill, and may easily be tempted to conciliate support in other directions by showing themselves pliable on this point. It is asked why the same danger will not arise whenever the work of consolidation is taken in hand, the answer is that the House of Commons scarcely ever troubles itself about a consolidating Bill if the Minister who has charge of it is able to assure the House that it contains no new matter. The fact that it only puts into shape the existing law is a sufficient reply to any criticism either in Parliament or out of doors. The merits of the several provisions incorporated into the Bill have presumably been discussed at the time they were separately adopted, or they may be discussed hereafter when the repetitions, contradictions, and omissions which at present obscure them have been removed. But even if amendments be introduced, and every member is free to criticize them to the utmost, and to criticize the existing statutes so far as he can show that they are altered or extended by the amendments. A Bill which consolidates and amends the law at the same time is a challenge to adversaries to survey the measure as a whole. It provokes discussions which by a different procedure might have been avoided altogether.

Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY would perhaps say that the evils arising from the absence of consolidation are so great as to neutralize all the good derived from amendment. Even this statement would not really dispose of the argument in favour of keeping the two processes distinct. After all, the value of consolidation greatly depends upon what it is that is consolidated; and, if the consolidating measure of 1873 contains valuable provisions which would have been omitted from the consolidating measure of 1872, the ultimate benefit will compensate for the year's delay. But this extreme view of the mischiefs which only consolidation can cure is certainly exaggerated. The very Report of the Royal Commission to which Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY refers as making consolidation easy enables the Government to dispense with consolidation for a little time longer without serious inconvenience. Among the most valuable of the many valuable labours undertaken by the Commission was the reduction to a homogeneous form of the Sanitary Statutes now in force, together with an enumeration of the amendments required under each head. Now, assuming that the Public Health Bill introduces these amendments, there is no reason why the law on every important point that can arise should not be as familiar to the Local Government Board now while the Consolidating Bill exists only in draft as hereafter when it has been embodied in a statute. The central sanitary authorities will know what is the local authority in every part of England to which they must look for the carrying out of sanitary improvements. They will know what improvements the local authority may be compelled to undertake, and what are the means through which this compulsion is to be exercised. So far as the Government are concerned, this knowledge is the main thing which they need. It has been wanting hitherto not because the law on the subject was not consolidated, but because it was defective. In some places, and for some purposes, there was no local authority; in other places, and for other purposes, there were too many authorities, or they were of the wrong kind. And everywhere and for all purposes there has not been sufficient means of making them use the powers which the law gives them. When these errors and omissions are remedied, the essentials of sanitary administration will be secured. And if they can be secured a year sooner by postponing consolidation, it would be an eminent instance of more haste worse speed to hurry it forward.

We are not, of course, depreciating the value of consolidation. The administration of the laws on Public Health will be made greatly easier by it. One of the greatest obstacles with which the central authority will have to contend is the apathy of those who ought to keep the local authorities to their work. The Local Government Board will stand to the Town Councils and Boards of Guardians in the position that the Court of Chancery stands in towards trustees. It is ready to compel them to do their duty, but it often only hears of a case for its interference when its aid is invoked by the beneficiary owners of the trust fund. In the same way no apparatus of inspection and supervision will enable the central authority to exert with full effect the powers vested in it by law, unless the persons for whose health the local authorities are bound to make provision—the population, that is, of every town and every parish in the kingdom—are ready to appeal to the local government whenever their obligation is neglected. It is in this respect more perhaps than in any other that consolidation may be expected to do real service. Until now those who have felt themselves aggrieved by the permitted existence of nuisances have constantly been ignorant to whom to look to abate them, and in what legal nuisance consists. The former uncertainty will be removed by the Public Health Bill. The latter will be removed by consolidation, provided that the result of consolidation is to throw the law on the subject into the shape of a statute so framed, or at all events capable of being so edited, that he who runs may read it. The preparation of a Code of Public Health—and the Consolidating Statute ought to be nothing less than this—requires more time and thought than can possibly be given to the subject by a department which has to amend and add to the law as well as to reduce it to shape. Supposing that the Public Health Bill contains all the provisions necessary to make the machinery of sanitary administration complete—supposing, that is to say, that when it conjunction with the statutes already in force, it gives the right powers to the right persons, and takes the right occasion for the proper exercise of those powers—all the materials for the construction of the required code ought to be in existence by the end of this Session. The Local Government Board will then have a clear field before it, and twelve months hence we may hope that sanitary legislation will have passed from the work of creation to that of simplification. The inquiry whether the measure introduced last week answers to the description here given of what it ought to contain must be deferred until the publication of the Bill supplies the material for a detailed study of its provisions. All that can be said at present is that Mr. STANFELD has been well advised in leaving consolidation alone for the present year.

COTERIE GLOBY.

THE pursuit of fame, and, with the pursuit, the art of advertising, are in some form or other as old as our race. The age when all men were content to produce honest wares and let them make their way without advertisement must be placed before the age of which any record is existing. Hence, although many vigorous diatribes have been penned against advertising by Mr. Carlyle, who has treated the puff and the sham as the special vices of our day, we must in some measure dissent from that great writer. Or perhaps we may interpret his meaning thus; that every form of society will bring with it its own special processes for obtaining fame, and as civilization grows more complex, the processes by which the first steps are made upon the ladder of glory will become more complex also. One of these processes, which we shall take the liberty of illustrating by a contemporary example, we here propose to consider.

Putting aside sophistical ingenuities, and treating fame as a thing not only worthy of rational human desire, but also as substantially attainable, we may distinguish at least three forms of it, to none of which we can justly deny the name, although only one is entitled to it in the highest sense. There is the fame widespread, but transitory; the fame within a small circle of believers, and coexistent only with their lives; and the fame which is at once widespread, intimate, and durable. Smaller provinces of fame, it will be seen, may be carved from these; as that to which Mr. M. Arnold has given the happy name of "distinction," and which, though permanent, never goes beyond the few, or the converse case of reputation durable and general, but never reaching the "inner circle." And each division, of course, fades into the next; in many cases by fine though traceable gradations. Yet, on the whole, we think the preceding distinctions will be accepted as answering to the common sense and parlance of mankind. These are "kings of thought," in Shelley's phrase; there are princes who never mount the throne or found a dynasty; there are also those who are of the blood-royal to their own party, but pretenders to the world at large.

It is to the last species of fame, which we may more briefly term coterie glory, that a complex and widely-spread civilization such as our own presents peculiar facilities. When the cultivated portion of a nation is small, there will be a greater general publicity of tastes, and a greater unanimity in forming them. Thus, in Athens, whilst poetical judgment was not sufficiently uniform to prevent the admirers of Aristophanes from coexisting with the admirers of Euripides, yet the position and value of these two poets were facts known to the whole mass of citizens, although weighed by each party in different balances. But amongst the Greeks of the free Hellenic age even these differences in taste were of rare occurrence; the line of sight of the race appears to have generally issued in identical conclusions; nor can we recall any one instance in which a widespread but transient fame came into being. Later on, in the Alexandrian and Roman periods, which more nearly resemble our own, we find poets and artists famous in their day (as Philotas, Callimachus, or Varus), who did not outlive it. The fashion for archaism also appeared in a section of the Latin literature, and was criticised by Horace with his unvarying good sense. Yet neither then, nor when letters and taste once more awoke in earnest after the Norman conquest in Europe, do we trace anything like coterie glory—the reputation only dear to a small set of believers, and held by them with irritable faith or impenetrable fanaticism. The cultivated class of each country was at all these periods too small for such a growth; or, if it came into being, it followed the law of its existence and faded into oblivion.

These twinkling, star-bright lights of the land and in times when periodical criticism and literary travel were not, were soon wholly obliterated. But even these, however, possessing their advantages, have also the compensating quality which progress can never free itself. A few facts—some of them very old and the few, and destined to the permanent fame—have now at least as great a difficulty in establishing themselves as in the Athens of Pericles, or the Rome of Augustus. The age was no longer, as in the Athens of Pericles, one of a few, and no daily criticism, as in the Rome of Augustus, to keep the public in the habit of new impressions. A crowd of new facts, and a crowd of new theories upon them, fill our minds, and we are more or less, even upon the half-cultivated.
Dropped away one by one from the mounting band—

the "large utterance of the early gods," we have lost their large simplicity of receptiveness. Devotion succeeds reaction, and each has but a partial truth, which it takes for the whole. The one true "voice" must be loud and long, to conquer the "many echoes."

The wide extension of cultivated intelligence, increasing the number of schools of taste, has a peculiar effect in adding to the difficulty. Each school has not only its own god, but its own temple and pulpit, its own texts and creeds, almost its own body of dogmatic theology. Is it the proper aim of poetry, let us say, to teach or to please, to amuse or to elevate? Should it move mostly among present thoughts and feelings with Byron, or in the romances of the past with Keats? Is it best when simple or when subtle? These and a hundred similar doctrines rage among the sects, and the strife has at times a singular effect upon general criticism. So much may be said on each side; had or weak taste has such facility in clothing itself in the hundred formulae which are current, that criticism takes what is called an "appreciative" or "genial" attitude, and proclaims a kind of æsthetic toleration. Specious as this change may be, and welcomed by sentimentalists (who also are greatly indebted to such toleration), it has certainly in the end a very lowering effect upon criticism, and thus upon public taste. No landmarks are henceforth recognised; the idea of a standard disappears; the great monuments and efforts of our predecessors are ignored and forgotten; not to bow down before the last thing out is rank Philistinism; and Novelty, that worst enemy to true art in a friend's disguise, tends to become the final, if unacknowledged, source of the pleasure which we seek in painting, or music, or literature.

Some remarks upon this uncritical attitude of criticism occur in a recent paper in the Quarterly Review, forming the close of a survey of our modern "literary poets," as the writer names Messrs. Swinburne, Rossetti, and Morris. These poets are here treated with a grave and well-mannered contempt, which, though distressing to the believer's mind, springs naturally from the reaction produced by unbridled and indiscriminate praise. And, although many may consider that the critic has here and there surveyed his subject from too adverse a point of view, we think his paper well worth study. It is sane, searching, and, if a little wanting in sympathy for aims which the writer holds to be low, factitious, and unmanly, it is undebased by the intrusion of personal laudation or satire. We had it therefore as a return to the legitimate method of criticism, and this the more because the facts bear out what the critic hints—namely, that the fame compassed by the poets in question forms, at the least, an example of that "coterie glory" which the existing phase of civilization and literary criticism engenders. Something similar has been already twice seen within this century in poetry, not to speak here of the other fine arts. Seventy years ago we had the once famous "Della Cruscan" school, surviving now only, if it can be called survival, in Gifford's ponderous but effective satire. In that school "culture" and refinement were the watchwords, and a little circle of mutual admiration contrived, by ingenious devices of criticism, to create in the outer world what for awhile looked like real fame. Afterwards we had the "mystic" school, to which the authors of Fanshawe, the Roman, and other kindred spirits, chronicled in fall by Mr. Gillman, belonged; and here, again, there was the same spectacle of the small band of devotees, unable to secure any permanent place for their favourites—although it is but fair to add that the praise in this case came from disinterested quarters, and that the intrinsic quality of the writers (as evidenced by the numerous editions of Mr. Bailey's poem) was much beyond that of the "Della Cruscan" group.

We do not intend here to express any opinion upon the actual merit of our so-called "Pre-Raphaelites." The pace is tremendous; but what the staying power may be will be decided by Time, that sole judge in the stadium of the Muses. Meanwhile, however, and without prejudice to the belief of these men of taste who pronounce these artists already sure of immortality, some of the elements may be pointed out which justify the phrase of "coterie glory." What are their leading inspirations? Mr. Swinburne's at first were of the literary or artistic order; they seem now (and we mean no criticism in saying it) to be the most advanced ideas of the "International," as magnified and idealized by the rhetorical glamour of M. Hugo. Mr. Rossetti and Mr. Morris work, broadly speaking, within Mr. Swinburne's earlier sphere. Both draw much from certain modern types of art which rarely venture within the coarse climate of public exhibition; both also—and here again we write without meaning to question their originality—are largely inspired by mediæval and Renaissance literature. There is a sense, of course, in which poetry must form itself upon former models and materials. But the poetry of which we are speaking rests also upon certain models in verse and prose, as authorities, without a knowledge of which much in the modern work loses its beauty or its significance. These poets, therefore, cannot be followed or enjoyed as they would wish to be, without a rare and peculiar course of preparation. Like a man at the Turkish bath, the reader must be prepared to undergo several antechambers, and become acclimated to their atmosphere and aroma, before he can recline in the luxury of their conversation within the inner sanctum.

And what are the characteristics of merit in poetry which these poets of this order can appeal only to? It is a question which, if it is to be answered, must be answered in a language of its own. This, however, is a question which, if it is to be answered, must be answered in a language of its own. They who have been at the pains of mastering such special qualifications, by a natural law, soon regard them as the only canons of taste; nothing which does not conform to them has the true ring. Having conquered caviare, they find all that pleases "the general" tasteless. Philistinism itself is not more adverse to discrimination than this Pharisaic isolation. Once in this frame of mind, men rapidly unlearn judging in favour of believing; they feel that they do right to be partisans in such a cause; they taste the keen delights of initiation into a creed hidden from the vulgar; they reject all moderating or hostile criticism from the laity without, as proceeding from men not specially qualified; they tend to pass from faith into fanaticism. Hence also, the general attitude of criticism being of the tolerant or sceptical order already described, the believers at first write all the reviews, and man every bastion of what Goethe somewhere calls the "critical Zion." That it has been so in the case of our later "Pre-Raphaelites" is denied nowhere; indeed, the phenomenon has been welcomed with innocent, though imprudent, sympathy; and natural, or indeed inevitable, as such a process is, crowns thus decreed may certainly and uninvincibly be described as "coterie glory." The artist, whether in poetry or in painting, labours for the initiated; and the initiated, in turn, write their best about the poems and the pictures. In such a process there is nothing abnormal, nothing intentionally unfair, and we can hardly understand the wrath which it has excited in some quarters. The only question is, what is the value of this order of criticism? What promise of fulfilment is contained in its prophecies?

A curious sign, lastly, confirms the position which we have here advanced. It is the very essence of faith to be uncritical; to regard the day for criticism as passed. To the faithful any contradiction of faith inevitably assumes the character, not of fair divergence in judgment, but of heresy. Simple non-acceptance of the creed may provoke a pitying smile at the sceptic's invincible ignorance. But to question it must be malice, envy, and imbecility. There is something in human nature, alas! which makes everybody, except an office-hardened politician, hate criticism; but this feeling, from which even poets are not exempt, may be intensified inordinately when the poet sees nothing but worshippers around him. It seems to be simply impossible for the artist and his circle of believers to regard a criticism on his art as anything but a criticism on himself. Many of our readers who may have watched with amusement the recent squabble between Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Rossetti will recognize a proof of our statement. Into the merits of the case we decline to go; we do not ask whether Mr. Buchanan's attacks were well founded, whether he was entitled to use a pseudonym, or whether his article exhibited that good taste which is nowhere more called for than when a question of taste is the matter in discussion. Our point is, that the "Fleshy School of Poetry" did, in the main, attempt to try Mr. Rossetti's verses, and not Mr. Rossetti himself as distinct from Mr. Rossetti the author, by critical rules. That the poet, rudely roused from the security of fame generated by the too friendly voices of disciples, should have regarded his reviewer as actuated by base personal motives was natural. But it is characteristic that the followers should be under the same impression. One of the latest of them has just published a further reply to Mr. Buchanan, which rivals what we had too fondly believed was the tone of discussion and the form of argument peculiar to the "odium theologicum." Mr. Forman, the writer, is so hurried away by zeal for his faith that, though known only as a critic, he prefixes to his paper a cruel (and in his case, we are sure, an inapplicable) motto, describing critics as the offspring of jealousy and literary failure. To re-state Mr. Buchanan's arguments in his own vocabulary appears to Mr. Forman, and we do not doubt appears in perfect good faith, equivalent to their refutation. To quote in full Mr. Rossetti's sonnet on "Nuptial Sleep" is proof of its maiden modesty of phrase so absolute that a man must be, we cannot venture to say what, who denies it. The gist of the whole is; that every criticism made against the book is in fact levelled against the author. What reads like a remark that a rhyme is weak is really an ungentlemanly libel on the rhymester. It is obvious that this is the canon, not of criticism, but of fanatic faith; nay, that it implicitly treats criticism as sin. For what judgment is possible if critical blame is treated as personal malignity, and if to ascribe affectation to a song is the same as to insult an artist? Yet such is the impassioned spirit of coterie that this appears to be the underlying, though no doubt the wholly unconscious, postulate of the poet and his followers. We altogether disclaim such an inference; and give notice that when we say that Mr. Buchanan's attack is less damaging than Mr. Forman's defence, we do not thereby imply that Mr. Forman has a base or wilful intention to injure Mr. Rossetti. He is only what some writer calls "that worst of enemies, your worshipper." But we have detained the reader long enough over the details of a squabble which assuredly has been hitherto no "battle of the giants."

By the preceding remarks we do not mean to suggest that the glory which begins in a coterie may not ultimately reach the generality and permanence of fame in its only serious sense. Solitary ambulation. And we will anticipate an objection which may possibly be made to our argument, by adding that such fame has in fact often started within a small circle of believing friends. Indeed, glory in general must originate with the acceptance of some two or three, especially when the artist is either much opposed to the fashion of his day or much in advance of it. Very few, like Byron or Scott, can awake and find themselves famous. But it is a truism to add that where coterie glory has been the cradle of true glory, the circle of friends must have consisted of exceptionally gifted and impartial judges. More often (we may quote Keats and Shelley as recent examples), the believers with whom fame begins are not friends with their innocent but almost inevitable bias, but isolated persons of taste within the crowd which they are destined at last to convert to their own conviction. To be welcomed thus, whilst the artist finds among his own friends his first critics and his last believers, is by far the most healthy condition for genius. It is a severe atmosphere no doubt, and one wholly unlike the forcing-house air of the coterie, with its exotic flowers and subtle sickly perfumes. But the fruits produced within this atmosphere, if any, will be mature, and wholesome, and permanent. And it is by these signs, and by these alone, so far as they apply to transient and unstable humanity, that we can recognize the growth of secure and genuine glory.

THE BEAUTIES OF LONDON.

IT is our modern humour to affect a passion for savage scenery. Every Cockney can babble of green fields, and has raptures at command for the first prospect of rocks and glaciers. We are never tired of expressing our contempt for the canopy of fog under which we live so comfortably, and for the gloomy vistas of smoke-dried brick and mortar in which we nevertheless contrive to exist. Johnson's manly preference of Charing Cross to the most romantic scenery excites no sympathy in our bosoms, or at least we are ashamed of openly responding to it. Once we despised a lover of field-sports as a mere country bumpkin or boorish Squire Western. Now many men would rather be held insensible to the charms of the Fine Arts than to those of partridge-shooting. Persons who for ten months of every year are limited to the pavement of Pall Mall affect the airs of country gentlemen, and walk as though they felt rather awkward out of the saddle. Is there not also some spice of snobbishness in decrying the merits of our mother city, and extolling moors and mountains above the honest level flagstones of our native streets? We are always sneering at the Parisian for his fanatical adherence to the asphalté. He may carry his passion to extremes, but after all one would say that he has as good a prima facie case as we. Why should it be right to quarrel with our daily bread and butter; to become too sentimental to endure the necessary surroundings of our daily life, and to admire a place precisely in proportion as it is unsuitable to the wants of our fellow-creatures? That a philosopher should necessarily love retirement is intelligible; we must have intervals of relief from barrel-organs and omnibuses and the shouts of "second editions!" "God Almighty first made a garden," says Bacon; and we accept the implied inference that fragments of wilderness—that is, of wilderness properly dressed and cultivated—contribute an essential element to the harmony of our lives. But we begin to hesitate when Cowley, seduced by a love of antithesis, goes one step further, and declares that God the first garden made, and the first city Cain.

And we protest altogether against the insinuation implied in the often-quoted aphorism about the town and the country. So long as it is only gardens that are in question, there is some recognition of the charm added to raw, uncultivated nature by human agency; but when it is attempted to set up the country pure and simple as superior to the town, and superior for the very reason that it has not been sophisticated by man, we are inclined to invert the argument. It would prove that we should prefer raw meat to cooked, and that a savage who plasters himself with mud is better than a civilized being who puts on a coat. The revolt against the artificial tastes of the last century explains the sentiment of Cowper, which is indeed a mere corollary from the sentimental adoration of uncivilized life inculcated by Rousseau and his disciples; but we have surely advanced a little beyond the stage at which such opinions are plausible. When all men wore wigs it was pardonable to insist upon the advantage of keeping the hair in a state of nature; but it is time to be laying more stress upon the necessity of using brush and comb. The love of the wild and savage, purely because it is wild and savage, has surely reached its extreme limit. The simple absence of any direct relation to humanity cannot be a sufficient reason for admiring any object. In the controversy which arose half a century ago about the merits of Pope's poetry, Bowles maintained, in opposition to Byron, that there was something essentially more poetical in natural than in artificial objects; that the sea, for example, was more poetical than ships, and mountains than towns. Byron retorted by asking whether the ruins of the Parthenon did not go for more in the interest of the view of Athens than the natural features of Hymettus; and whether the Grand Canal did not owe its charm rather to the palaces which look down upon it than to its connexion with the Adriatic. The problem stated in these terms may be considered as insoluble; for it is absurd to lay down as a universal truth that an artificial is superior to a natural product, or the reverse. Most people, however, would probably so far agree with Byron as to admit that Venice and Athens are more impressive to them than any mountains, seas, or rivers; the town touches our sympathies at a far greater number of points, if its aspect is not so overpowering from certain particular points of view.

Now London, to return to the point from which we started, is not intrinsically beautiful; if some half-dozen buildings were removed it might even be described as containing a greater mass of uniform ugliness than any equal area in the world; and we are sometimes inclined to fancy that the absence of beautiful architecture deprives the vast city of any poetical interest. It matters little, however, what may be the means by which associations are suggested. London is impressive, not because of the fine proportions or exquisite details of its buildings, but by force of the thoughts which it dimly prompts in every intelligent mind. Wordsworth, supposed to be the great poet of country life, is fairly overcome by the view from Westminster Bridge at sunrise. "Earth," he declares, with almost exaggerated emphasis—

Earth hath not anything to show more fair.

And, as he afterwards says:—

Never did sun more beautifully steep
In his first splendour valley, rock, or hill.

Yet in 1803, the date of this celebrated sonnet, the banks of the river could boast less of architectural beauty than at present. The genuine poet is impressed by the sentiment, in spite of the external ugliness, just as we may be struck by the moral beauty of one of those faces which we conventionally describe as ugly. Monmouth Street is not precisely the spot to which we should conduct an intelligent foreigner in the hope of impressing him with the majesty of our metropolis; and yet it was in Monmouth Street, if we may believe his biographer, that the idea of his great work first flashed across the brain of Teufelsdröckh. "Often," he says, "while I sojourned in that monstrous tuberosity of civilized life, the capital of England, and meditated and questioned destiny under that ink-sea of vapour, black, thick and multifarious as Spartan broth; and was one lone soul amid those grinding millions—often have I turned into their old clothes-market to worship. With awestruck heart I walk through that Monmouth Street, with its empty suits, as through a Sanhedrim of silent ghosts." Teufelsdröckh, it must be confessed, is a slightly eccentric philosopher; and it was owing to the peculiar turn of his speculations that Monmouth Street impressed him more than any other quarter of the "monstrous tuberosity." But he that has eyes to see, who can be moved by tragedy as it appears in a police-court as well as when it puts on the conventional state robes, can find a sufficient stimulus to the imagination even in the meanest and dirtiest of London alleys. Few people are likely to be much impressed by the "finest site in Europe," as far as its architecture is concerned, by the pepper-boxes of the National Gallery, or the mastheaded admiral, or the lion who watches on Northumberland House; or to feel much jarred by that manufactory of which Mr. Matthew Arnold has so pathetically complained, because, after all, there is no beautiful object to come into contrast with it; yet nobody could look at the ebbing and flowing tide of human beings, dingy, disreputable, and wretched as a large proportion of the tide may be, without acknowledging that there is some force in the Johnsonian maxim. This indeed may be taken to show, not that London is beautiful, but that it is impressive to the moralist or the philosopher. Without disputing about words, or asking whether their power of stimulating sentiment does not amount to beauty of a kind, we may remark that it is the latent sense of this human interest which heightens the effect of what is more strictly speaking beautiful. Compare, for example, a sunset as it is often seen from the Marble Arch, and a sunset as seen from some established show place in the Alps. Undoubtedly there is greater delicacy of colouring, and of course a far greater extent of horizon, visible from the Rigi or the Faulhorn; and there is a suggestion of material massiveness which is entirely absent from its rival. Yet when the sunset in the clear Western sky is contrasted by the vast lurid cloud which owes its sombre dignity to the contributions of thousands of chimney-pots from Park Lane to Bethnal Green, the inferior extent of the London view is made up by the dramatic intensity of the sentiment.

The cloud which overhangs a vast city is not bigger or brighter, probably it is both dimmer and smaller, than that which clings to the flanks of a mountain; but an indistinct recollection of all that is concealed beneath it gives it the same sort of impressiveness which there would be in the commonest deal box which we supposed to be destined for a murdered corpse. The cloud in itself is nothing more than its thousands of uninteresting brethren that are wandering aimlessly over the monotonous fields of an agricultural county; but here it is the curtain which hangs about innumerable tragedies, and has therefore an acquired majesty. Readers of Balzac know what wonderful effects he produces by minute descriptions of the tortuous lanes and queer passages of the old Paris; in his hands the commonest walls become ominous of strange horrors. Even so, any picturesque gleam of light or depth of shadow in London streets is, if rightly interpreted by the help of a careful study of police reports, far more impressive than the wildest jungle where only wild beasts lurk, or the most tremendous chasm of the mountains. The Thames is not perhaps so beautiful in itself as the Rhine, or even as a good many Alpine torrents, though it is full of picturesque bits of scenery to which painters have hardly yet done justice; but tinge it with some of the sentiment belonging to it; think of the celebrated carpet-bag which plunged into it from Waterloo Bridge, of Hood's Bridge of Sighs, or of the admirable descriptions of river life in which Dickens delighted—to say nothing of those legitimate historical associations which never come when they are wanted—and the Thames gains an almost Shakespearean intensity of interest. We hurry through the streets carelessly and thoughtlessly; few of us realize what impressive effects of Rembrandt-like light and shade are produced by the gloomy atmosphere which we abuse; and still less do we give ourselves time to invest a great city with those associations which are its natural due. Some of the associations, it is true, would be as unpleasant that we should scarcely care to dwell upon them; but we should perhaps be inclined to admit, after a time, that if London is not strictly beautiful in an artistic sense, it has a curious fascination of its own which has not yet found a worthy expositor.

THE CLERGYMAN OF THE FUTURE

THERE is an unpleasant story among the old legends of the buccaneers of an evil-minded surgeon attached to one of the pirate ships, who, having got an enemy into his power, gratified at once his thirst for vengeance and his passion for experimental science by cutting his victim gradually in pieces, now dexterously slicing off a finger or two, then a foot, then a leg or an arm, and deferring the final and fatal stab until there was nothing left but a maimed and helpless torso. The wicked leech was anxious, it is said, to see how long life could be preserved under successive amputations, and how small a fragment of body was sufficient to lodge the soul. It might almost be supposed that there is some design to practise in a similar manner upon the English Church. Attempts are constantly made to subject it to a process of protracted vivisection. First one limb, then another is threatened; church-rates are gone, the churchyards are besieged, and it is confessed that the object of seizing upon the churchyards is simply to get more readily at the pulpit and the altar. If this sort of thing goes on, disestablishment may well be welcomed, and even demanded, as a coup de grâce. There are two ways of attacking the Church. One is to try to pull it down at once about the ears of the congregations, the other is to worry people out of it. And it is the latter course which appears at present to be most in favour. These petty and miserable tactics are doubtless dictated by policy. In the first place, the Samson who is capable of dragging down the pillars of the Establishment in a muscular embrace has yet to be discovered. And, even if the summary disestablishment and disendowment of the Church were practicable, it would perhaps hardly suit the interests of the Nonconformist leaders. If the Church fell, the Liberation Society would fall too. There would then be nothing left to agitate about, no pretext for subscriptions, no useful platform at the service of Dissenting politicians; they would have to pay their own election expenses, and to invent another cry. From this point of view, there is a good deal to be said in favour of making the present cry last as long as possible. The Church is to be condemned to a lingering death in order that the Liberation Society may not be cut off in its prime. The Church of England is not an absolutely perfect institution, and it is possible that there are "judicious reforms" in its constitution which deserve consideration; but it should at least be understood that it is idle and foolish to offer concessions in the hope of appeasing sectarian animosity. At the beginning of the present Parliament Mr. Morley, in seconding the Address, formally intimated that the Dissenters would be satisfied with the settlement of the Tests question, and with a reasonable compromise in regard to the Burial Bill. Mr. Morley, however, has failed to produce the amendment he promised in order to carry out his suggestion that some common religious services should be agreed upon for use at the grave; and Mr. Miall has declared that the possession of the burial-grounds is sought with a view to ulterior objects, and that no compromise can be allowed.

It must be confessed that the prospects of the clergy are by no means encouraging. If the Burial Bill, the Ecclesiastical Procedure Bill, and the Occasional Services Bill are to be taken as significant of the spirit of future legislation, the position of the proverbial toad under the harrow will be happy and dignified compared with that of a minister of the Church of England. It is hard to say whether the Church has more to fear from the attacks of open enemies or the blundering attentions of her friends. There is no reason to suppose that Lord Shaftesbury cherishes secret hostility to the communion of which he is ostensibly a member, and it is known that he received encouragement from several occupants of the episcopal bench in the preparation of his Ecclesiastical Procedure Bill. Yet it is difficult to conceive any measure fraught with greater mischief to the peace and harmony of the Church. The Bishop of Peterborough's able and trenchant speech exhausted the arguments against this shortsighted and dangerous Bill, and ensured its immediate rejection. It would have enabled any three persons in a diocese to prosecute, or, in effect, to persecute, a clergyman on any question of ritual that might be trumped up against him. The three prosecutors might be the greatest fools or rogues in the district. Three imbecile old women, half blind or deaf, and wholly stupid; the squire, whose wife was offended by the rector's wife not having promptly returned her visit, or who was himself smarting under a spiritual rebuke, with his bailiff and gardener, a publican, who had been offended by a sermon against drunkenness, with his potboy and barmaid; or even the keeper of a worse place of resort, with a couple of his most frequent visitors, might make up the prosecuting trio. Any three persons in any part of the diocese, no matter how distant from the parish in which the accused clergyman officiated, might club together in the indulgence of personal spite or meddlesome vanity in order to get up a prosecution. The authority of the Bishop was entirely over-ruled in criminal prosecutions grand juries have the right of setting aside unreasonable indictments; there are other processes of law which cannot be commenced without the sanction of the Attorney-General. Even apple-women and contermongers are protected from malicious prosecutions for trading on Sunday at the instance of "sunny, foolish, and misguided people," as Lord Shaftesbury called them not long since, by the interposition of the chief constable, two justices, or a stipendiary magistrate, whose assent must be procured to a prosecution. But, under Lord Shaftesbury's Bill, the clergy would have been left absolutely at the mercy of any three silly or malignant persons who might choose to fancy, or to pretend, that the rubric had been violated, and who were willing to spend a little money in baiting a helpless clergyman, with perhaps a large family and a small purse, to whom a law-suit would be utter ruin. Indeed there was nothing in the Bill to prevent the Liberation Society from devoting its funds to this congenial purpose. Mr. Cowper-Temple's Bill for throwing open the pulpits of the Church to laymen or ministers of other denominations is also, we doubt not, excellent in its intention, but it might, if it became law, be used in a way very different from that contemplated by its author. As Mr. Gladstone pointed out, it would introduce into the Church preachers who were relieved from all discipline and control, and who could proclaim any doctrines they pleased. Lord Shaftesbury threw a good deal of light on his own state of mind when he spoke of doctrine as a "minor matter" compared with ritual. Of course, if doctrine is of no consequence, and ritual is everything, something might be said for Mr. Cowper-Temple's Bill.

Coming events cast their shadows before, and the measures of which we have been speaking indicate perhaps the sort of legislation which is in store for the Church. If so, the clergyman of the future is certainly to be pitied. We can imagine him struggling under the accumulated indignities and perplexities of his unhappy position. As he passes through the churchyard on his way to his church, he is observed by a passionate Shepherd who is celebrating the funeral of one of the pillars of his Little Bethel, and who thereupon redoubles his stentorian denunciations of the pride and vain-glory of a Babylonian Establishment, while the mourners turn to hoot the representative of priestly tyranny as he glides meekly past in the shadow of the wall. Further on a Positivist Professor is taking advantage of the burial of a member of the Commune to glorify assassination and rebellion, but his voice is almost drowned by the clamour of a party of Shakers, who are working themselves into convulsions by manual shrieks and breakdowns. From another part of the enclosure rises the cheerful melody of a Bradlaughite hymn; the Free-thought Republicans and the Fenians have clubbed their funds for an empty coffin which they bury periodically (of course always digging it up again), as a pretext for a demonstration and subscription. Entering the church, the clergyman finds a bevy of dejected wives' sisters, a mother-in-law who has taken compassion on her disconsolate son-in-law, and a pretty niece who is going to console her uncle for the loss of her aunt, ranged before the altar-rails, waiting to be married. An apostle of Strauss is lecturing from the pulpit on the ludicrous aspects of Christianity, and it appears from a time-table programme attached to the clerk's desk that the pulpit is likely to be engaged for the rest of the day, as a Carmelite friar and a Plymouth Brother are both waiting to take their turn. In the evening the church is to be at the disposal of the Recreative Religionists, who have prepared a grand entertainment in aid of Decayed Unbelievers. The clergyman puts his name down for the use of his own pulpit on the only vacant day, and as he is leaving a couple of letters are thrust into his hand. One is from the Secretary of the Church Association, intimating that he will be prosecuted unless he immediately conforms to the ritual prescribed in an accompanying circular, and the other from the Secretary of the Church Union, announcing similar measures if he dares to depute from the established rubric. He has already two or three suits on his hands at the instance of several tribes of malcontents in the diocese; his wife's money has been exhausted in law expenses, he has had to take his boys from school, to let the parsonage, and go into cheap lodgings. The summonses of the rival Vigilance Committees of the Church fill up his cup, and he resolves to throw off his gown and emigrate. It is easy to say that this is an exaggerated and overstrained picture of the state of things which would prevail if the Barons Bill and similar measures were followed out to their practical results; but it is not so easy to show where the line is to be drawn if the principle is once admitted that the churches and churchyards of the Establishment are to be freely at the disposal of all sects alike. The power and authority of the Church have been due in a great measure to the high character of the clergy, to their faith and pride in their work, their learning, independence, and devotion. They have held an honourable place, and they have shown themselves, as a body, worthy of it. But these are not the men to submit tamely to the indignities and humiliation which it is proposed to heap upon their office, nor are men qualified to succeed them likely to be attracted by the kind of legislation which has been recommended. The Church as it is known and honoured has been produced under certain well-known conditions, and if those conditions are altered, it is idle to expect that the Church will remain the same.

JURIES.

THE hardship and partiality of operation of the present system of summoning juries ought to be considered separately from the general question of the utility of juries in civil cases. If this ancient institution is worth preserving it ought to be improved, and we think that its value was well shown by Mr. Denman in a recent debate in the House of Commons. "If," he said, "cases were tried in the superior Courts without juries, it would soon become well known what views were held by certain judges on particular classes of cases, and all sorts of jobbery would be resorted to by suitors to get their causes tried by judges who had shown a leaning to the view they themselves held." This jobbery could only be practised under considerable restrictions, but Mr. Denman's experience correctly informed him that there would be strong inducement to attempt it. Railway Companies complain of the prevailing tendency of juries to find verdicts against them, but the public would probably have greater reason to complain if the decisions in cases of alleged negligence were wholly left to judges. Any lawyer whose experience extends over the last twenty years must know that in a large number of cases which have been tried during that time the decisions of particular judges on the facts might have been predicted with certainty, beforehand. As the law stands, the judge may, and often does, withdraw a case from the consideration of the jury, but if it goes to them they are quite as likely to find against the judge's view of the case as in accordance with it. The influence of the Railway Companies is in various ways so enormous that, in reference to them, the institution of juries has something of the same value which it has been always held to have in cases between the Crown and the subject. It is quite true that juries have frequently gone further in imposing liability on Railway Companies than an impartial Judge would approve; but, speaking generally, it is better for the public that they should go too far in this direction than not far enough.

The difference between juries and judges in this respect may be illustrated by reference to an action which arose out of the fall of an iron girder upon a train of the Metropolitan Railway Company during the construction of the new Meat Market at Smithfield. The girder was suspended preparatory to being fixed in position to support the structure of the market which has been raised above the railway. The suspending chains slipped, and the girder fell upon a train which happened to be passing at the moment. Several passengers were killed or wounded, and one of them brought this action against the Railway Company. The works were being carried on by the Corporation of London under Parliamentary powers. The question in the case was whether the Railway Company were liable to compensate the injured passenger as having negligently omitted any reasonable precaution for the safety of their train. The case came on for trial at the assizes, and by an arrangement between the parties it was reserved for consideration by the Court, without calling on the jury to give their verdict. But it was assumed by judge and counsel at the trial that the verdict, if given, would have been against the Company. When the case came before the Court of Common Pleas, that Court considered itself to be placed by the terms of the reservation in the position of a jury, and, looking at the case as a jury, it decided that the Company was liable. There was then an appeal to the Exchequer Chamber, where the decision was that the Company was not liable, and on further appeal to the House of Lords this decision was upheld. Thus the plaintiff ultimately failed, although he had the Court of Common Pleas in his favour, and he almost certainly would have had the jury also in his favour if the case had gone to them. The case, having reached the exalted tribunal of the House of Lords, enjoyed the advantage of being irradiated by those bright beams of equity which, as Lord Westbury might say, do not descend to that lower level upon which common lawyers generally, and particularly certain Judges of the Common Pleas, are content to form what they think are legal judgments in what they are pleased to call their minds. It is not our present purpose to discuss the reasons for the ultimate decision in this case, but merely to use it as an illustration of the probable consequences of depriving juries of the share which they now possess in the decision of this class of cases. The plaintiff was an ordinary passenger who had of course no conception of the risk which he incurred when he took a ticket by the train. It was a risk which no rational person would have incurred for the sake of the convenience of travelling by that train. The Railway Company knew that the hoisting of girders was part of the work which was being done above their line, and they had both the power and opportunity to place the contractors for the work under obligation to arrange for its performance with proper regard to the safety of their trains. Even if this were not so, they had power to arrange their trains so that they should not pass along that portion of the line while a girder was suspended by chains above it. Any ordinary person, with a mind unenlightened by that effulgence of wisdom which guides the decisions of the House of Lords, would have thought that the Railway Company was bound to do as much as this. It is convenient, and perhaps our habits have made it almost necessary, that this Railway Company should run its trains every five or ten minutes; but still, if we were told that we were to pass under a suspended girder, we should prefer to be late for our appointment, or to take a cab. The Company by their method of proceeding reversed a well-known quotation. They seem to have thought that it was worth while propter causas vicendi perdere ritum, or, in other words, for the sake of the business or pleasures of life to lose life itself. We assume that the tackle was strong, and managed with ordinary care, but still it might slip, and it did. The decision of the Exchequer Chamber and the House of Lords might perhaps be reckoned among many proofs of the truth of the remark of a legal luminary, that the wisdom of the Law is not like the wisdom of ordinary mankind. At any rate we think that ninety-nine juries out of a hundred would have found a verdict in this case against the Railway Company, and we venture to regard the tendency of juries to find such verdicts as wholesome, although liable to be carried to excess, and requiring to be watched and controlled, as it now is, by judges.

Supposing the existing system of summoning juries to be reformed, so that the duty may be fairly distributed, we do not see any hardship on individuals which is not more than counterbalanced by the advantages of the system to society. The varied practical experience of twelve men of different pursuits is highly valuable. Without ascribing any sanctity to the number twelve, we should say that there is no good reason for altering this number, unless it be determined to try the questionable experiment of substituting the verdict of a majority for that of the whole number. The complaints which one commonly hears proceed, not from juriesmen who have been employed, but from those who have been kept waiting without employment. If serving on juries is, as we hold it to be, a valuable part of the education of a citizen, it appears undesirable to minimize the opportunities by which that education may be obtained. It deserves consideration, too, that the abolition of juries would necessarily produce a vast increase in the already formidable bulk of law reports. Taking again for illustration the case of an action against a Railway Company for alleged negligence, it is to be observed that the question which most usually produces a report is whether there was evidence in support of the plaintiff's case which ought to have been submitted to the jury. If the judge thought there was not, he would nonsuit the plaintiff, and the propriety of his ruling might afterwards be brought before the Court in banc. But although there are many such cases, there are infinitely many more which are tried by a jury under direction of a judge and nothing more is heard of them, nor do any reports appear of the trials except in newspapers. If, however, the judge decided all questions both of law and fact, it is difficult to see how to avoid the necessity of reporting at considerable length many cases which are now consigned to convenient oblivion. This necessity already prevails to a great extent in the Court of Chancery, and although something has been done of late years to diminish the number of bulky volumes which are indispensable in a lawyer's practice, the shelves of legal libraries still groan under an almost unmanageable mass. The Attorney-General said that it was an advantage of the present system that a judge who tries a case is compelled to state his view of it in a manner that may be intelligible to twelve ordinary men. We may add that it is a further advantage that the judge's statement of his view is not usually reported, except perhaps in newspapers.

We do not greatly favour a proposal which has been made for the employment on special juries of persons "who have very little indeed to do, who are very intelligent, and who would be glad to be so employed." A special jury in London or Middlesex as now constituted includes a considerable variety of experience and practical knowledge and ability which men of leisure would not necessarily possess. It has been stated that it depends upon a man himself whether his name appears in the list of special or of common jurors, but in fact there is a great difference in the class of men who usually serve on special as compared with common juries. Certain varieties of actions almost always succeed if tried by common juries, but very often fail if the defendant goes to the expense of a special jury. If it be said that this is a confession of weakness which goes far to condemn the entire system, we answer that judges as well as juries have their prejudices, and by combining the two in a trial one is made a check upon the other. It must be remembered that, from relationship or other causes, there is always danger that particular counsel may acquire predominating influence over a judge, whereas this can hardly happen with juries which are changed from day to day. We may admit that judges devote many perplexing questions upon juries, who settle them by methods scarcely to be approved by a refined judicial intellect. The amount of damages is supposed to be often fixed by taking the aggregate of the sums named by all the jurymen and dividing it by twelve. But perhaps this rough justice is as good as any other. Let the lists of jurymen be carefully prepared, and the persons whose names appear in them be fairly summoned, and if possible employed, and we believe that the jury-box will continue to be a popular institution.

THE LORD CHAMBERLAIN AND THE REPRESENTATIVE WORKING-MEN.

THE Lord Chamberlain must have passed an anxious and exhausting week. The thanksgiving in St. Paul's is a State ceremonial, and the ordering of it consequently falls to his charge. He has had to distribute a limited number of seats among an unlimited number of applicants, to weigh the relative dignity of all kinds of public functionaries and representative persons, to settle a great many minute questions of etiquette and precedence, and to submit to be teased and badgered by a multitude of people who think themselves slighted and ill used. Somebody has been writing to the papers to complain that the entry in front of the Lord Chamberlain's door at St. James's Palace is too large, and that as he passes to and fro along the narrow strip of pavement there is no room for anybody else to share it, and no alternative for the public but to walk in the mud. We are afraid this correspondent is a disappointed ticket-seeker. Surely this is not the time to grudge Lord Sydney the protection of the largest entry in the service. Indeed, it is satisfactory to have this visible proof that there are still large entries to be had, and that the army is not wholly composed of the lathy undersized striplings who are supposed to be identified with Mr. Cardwell's economic economies. The Lord Chamberlain appears to have got on very smoothly with the Peers, but the Commons were more troublesome. It has been arranged that each member is to have a ticket for his wife, if he has one, and a free passage on board the penny steamer from St. Stephen's to St. Paul's. A Scotch member, however, seemed to be rather nervous lest marriage certificates, about which his countrymen are understood not to be always very particular, would have to be produced; while Mr. Montague Guest was very persistent and eloquent in pleading the claims of unmarried members to the additional ticket for the benefit of any lady whom they might choose as their companion for the day. It was officially explained that the ticket for a wife was a great concession, and quite without precedent, and that woman's rights could not be recognized any further. There appears to be a strong popular desire that the Cabinet should emulate the heroic policy of the Aldermen, and join the procession on horseback, or at least in carriages; but the Ministry are not disposed to make themselves conspicuous. It is on record that when Lord Bute visited the City he used to be attended by a bodyguard of prison-keepers specially retained for the occasion; and even Pitt in 1789 was "very grossly insulted on his way to the Cathedral, in consequence of which he did not return in his own carriage, but stopped to dine with the Speaker and some other gentlemen in Doctors' Commons; he was escorted home in the evening by a party of the London Light Horse." The People's William, however, can hardly be apprehensive of similar treatment from his own flesh and blood. It is a pity the procession cannot be made more of a pageant, but the mere addition of a great many carriages to its length would make it only more tedious, not more picturesque or impressive.

Perhaps the most startling and puzzling circumstance connected with the arrangements for Tuesday is the announcement that "the Lord Chamberlain has very gracefully reserved a considerable number of seats in St. Paul's for those representative members of the working classes in the metropolis who may desire to participate in the ceremony." Of course it is highly desirable that as many people as possible should be provided with seats in the Cathedral, and that all classes should be represented. The invitation to "the representative members of the working classes" would seem, however, to require some explanation. If they are to be present in their representative capacity, it is important that it should be distinctly understood whom they are supposed to represent, and on what authority their representation is based. How, we should like to know, does the Lord Chamberlain take cognizance of the representatives of the working classes? Hullam has remarked that the common law of England has "never recognized gentlemen," and we imagine that it has also overlooked or ignored the distinction of caste or class which has just been brought into notice by the Lord Chamberlain. It has hitherto been assumed that there are only two orders of Englishmen, the peer and the commoner. Is it now to be understood that there are three orders instead of two—peers, commoners, and working-men—and that the working classes are to be regarded as an estate distinct from, and independent of, the rest of the community. This would seem to be the natural inference to be drawn from Lord Sydney's "gracious" act. The House of Commons is to represent the general community, but not the working-men, who are to be specially represented by members of their own order. Before the last Reform Act, when a large proportion of the working classes had no votes, it might perhaps have been plausibly argued that they were not represented by the House of Commons. But they have votes now, if they choose to use them, and their representation in the popular Assembly must therefore be held to be complete; indeed it is on this very ground that the adoption of the Ballot has been justified by the Government. Since the extension of the suffrage the working classes have played an important part in various constituencies, and have thrown their influence now on one side now on another. But there is one thing which they have carefully, persistently, and invariably refrained from doing, in spite of much pressure and solicitation, and that is from electing what are called working-class candidates to represent them in Parliament. No list has been published of "the representative members of the working classes" who have been chosen for exhibition in St. Paul's, but if, as is possible, and perhaps too probable, they belong to the set of men who go about calling themselves working-men and professing to speak with authority on behalf of that class, it is necessary that it should be pointed out that the working classes themselves have never endorsed these pretensions. Whether the working-men of Chelsea showed good taste and sound judgment in preferring a brace of baronets to representatives of the Odger type is a question we have no desire to argue. We are speaking only of facts, and it is an indisputable fact that not only were the baronets preferred on this occasion, but that Mr. Odger has been repeatedly rejected by democratic constituencies, and that not a single working-man candidate has been elected in any part of the kingdom. And, if the working classes so emphatically repudiate representation by people of this sort in Parliament, why should it be supposed that they will be flattered by being so represented in St. Paul's? Again, if the invitation has been addressed to the officials and delegates of the Trade Unions, it must be observed that the Unionists compose only a fraction of the whole labouring population, and that the non-Unionist majority have at least an equal right to be taken into account.

The Lord Chamberlain is not only an officer of the Royal Household, but a subordinate member of the political administration of the day, and it may perhaps have been thought a good stroke of policy to bid for a little popularity among the democrats of the metropolis. It would appear that neither Mr. Odger nor Mr. Bradlaugh has been conciliated by Mr. Beales having been made a Judge, and it may be doubted whether Republican agitators, who have been and are still busily engaged in vilifying and denouncing the monarchy, will receive the invitation to be present at St. Paul's in the spirit in which it is offered. The sans-culottes of Monaco could not forgive Rabagas for going to Court in knee-breeches, and the Freethought Republicans whom Mr. Bradlaugh is supposed to lead would naturally resent the double treason which would be involved in his countenancing a ceremony based on a recognition of the Deity and loyalty to the Crown. It is unfortunate that "the representative members of the working classes" whose names are most familiar should have chiefly distinguished themselves by their seditious violence and insolent defiance of authority. Between a Government which is charged with the enforcement of the law and an impudent brawler who collects a mob in a public place merely, as he intimates, because the Government has forbidden it, there can be no decent or honest interchange of civilities. If anybody is anxious to know the kind of language which the agitators to whom the Lord Chamberlain is said to have "graciously" addressed himself are now using in regard to the approaching ceremony, they should refer to the organs of the party. The shameless print which rejoiced with infamous glee over the death of the Prince of Wales's infant son has not failed to improve the present occasion in a similar spirit. The Socialist quacks or fanatics who lately offered their services, through the appropriate medium of Mr. Scott Russell, to the Conservative party, and some of whom have since hired themselves out as the peripatetic agents of the Liberation Society, will probably not be persuaded to surrender their project of sunny gardens at the public expense by the offer of back seats in a dark cathedral. It will have been observed that whenever one set of these so-called working-men come to the front, they are immediately denounced by rival speculators in the same imposture. It is notorious that these agitators are not working-men at all, and that they trade on the fiction just as the sham soldiers and sailors who beg in the streets trade on their borrowed uniforms and pretended amputations. The Lord Chamberlain will have some difficulty in distributing his favours impartially between the "Hole-in-the-Wall," the Hall of Science, the International Association, and the "Cockspur Street lot" who are accused of "devilling for the Treasury Whip." If Mr. Finlen and Mr. Bradlaugh can be persuaded to join Mr. Gladstone in a solemn thanksgiving for the recovery of the Prince of Wales, we can only hope that it will do them good; but as a trick of political canvassing we are afraid that it will lead to disappointment. If any value is attached to it, it will be only as a pledge of personal sympathy and more substantial concessions. There is no desire to inquire too curiously as to the private persons on whom the Lord Chamberlain may have bestowed tickets, but it is obvious that the public recognition by a high officer of State of the politicians of the pavement as a representative body entitled to a place beside the Lords and Commons is a circumstance which calls for some explanation. If there is to be class representation, it may be asked why any one class is selected for this distinction, and also why the working classes are to be represented without their consent, and against their will, by a set of men whom they have by their votes on all occasions consistently and steadfastly repudiated? In itself this may appear to be a small matter, but unfortunately it is only another indication of that false and fawning flattery of a particular class which is at once immoral and demoralizing.

EMIGRATION.

THE largest part of the emigration from our shores goes to the United States. It is not wonderful that emigrants should prefer a short voyage to a long one; and, as compared with the cold of Canada or the heat of the West Indies, the temperate region which lies between them is as attractive now as it was three hundred years ago. The idea of white immigration into the West Indies has been almost abandoned, although, as Mr. Kingsley has pointed out, there were a hundred or more years ago flourishing communities of English origin in islands which are now almost exclusively occupied by coloured people, who are able to live in a rude way with very little labour. There is probably no subject on which hastily formed opinions are more likely to prove erroneous than this of colonization. We look at the crowded population of a great town, and we read of countless millions of acres of waste land existing in our colonies, and we can only understand by experience the difficulty of moving ten families from England to Australia. It is obvious indeed, on a slight consideration of the subject, that the class of men whom we at home should be most willing to deport are exactly those whom the colonies would be least willing to receive. But as regards women, it is wonderful that emigration has not been carried further than it has. It is stated in the last Report of the Emigration Commissioners that they lately received from the Government of New South Wales a request that they would undertake the expenditure of a sum of money voted by the Colonial Legislature for immigration in sending out to the colony "female domestic servants." We shall take the liberty of assuming that the emigrants sent out under this name would rapidly pass into the condition of wives of the humbler class of settlers, and that this change would be neither unexpected nor undesired by some at least of the emigrants. There was some difficulty in sending them out, and if an attempt were made to promote emigration of women of a higher class it would probably be a lamentable failure. It is perhaps surprising that the agitators for woman's rights have not taken this matter of emigration in hand more effectively than they have done. They would immediately obtain—although perhaps they would not greatly value it—the sympathy and co-operation of many men who are now disposed to laugh at them. They surely might induce people of the middle-class to look more than they now do to emigration in educating their daughters. There are many parents who cannot hope to leave fortunes to their girls, nor even to find husbands for them at home, but who might, if they set about it in good time, give them such training and opportunities as would enable them to marry comfortably in the colonies. Society owes at least thus much to Miss Faithfull and her allies, that it has been taught by them to put aside false delicacy in discussing the position and prospects of women. We think that the time has almost come when the Government of New South Wales might venture to say what it doubtless means, and might request the Emigration Commissioners to send out to the colony an assortment of young women suitable to become wives of artisans and farmers. If a young man in a colony can keep himself, he can usually keep a wife; and the more children he has the better, since they are all likely to be able to live, and some of them to prosper, in a country in which they have been born and bred. As a possible preparation for colonial life, the efforts which are being made to procure more useful education for girls deserve to be heartily supported. We do not object to women practising as doctors in England if they can get patients, but, as a qualification for the wife of a settler in a new country, a knowledge of medicine, as of cookery or laundry work, must be highly valuable. Perhaps by the time that a crop of girls educated in useful things have grown up, a method will have been invented of exporting them to colonies desiring to receive them as what they would really be—namely, intending wives of settlers. Of course, if any propriety is thereby supposed to be maintained, they can be described in official correspondence as "female domestic servants"; and the male inhabitants of the colony to which they go will not perhaps object to marrying housemaids or cooks if they find that the wives they so obtain are amiable, sensible, and well-instructed. We are told by the Emigration Commissioners that the arrangement proposed by the authorities of New South Wales was that they should despatch one ship in every second month carrying about two hundred "females," with a few selected families for their protection. We pause here to remark that the only limit to the number of "females" whom the Colonial Government was prepared to receive appears to have been the amount of money which they had in their hands to pay passage-money and expenses. Here, then, is an opening for charity which can hardly be misplaced. If benevolent people in England will subscribe a fund, it may be applied without visible limit to the exportation of "female domestic servants" to New South Wales.

It is strange, however, that the proposed arrangement which seems so advantageous was found impracticable. "The impossibility of collecting so many as two hundred eligible female emigrants in a short time, and the difficulty of retaining those we might collect unless passages could be found for them without unreasonable delay," are stated by the Commissioners as sufficient reasons for only partially fulfilling the request of the Government of New South Wales. They do not say that "eligible" female emigrants could not be found at all, but only that they could not be collected in batches of two hundred at intervals of two months. If we asked for a further definition of an "eligible" female emigrant, it would probably be explained to mean at least this—that no lady need apply. But if we are right in this assumption, it suggests rather melancholy reflections. It comes to this—that a girl born of middle-class parents, and brought up in the usual course, must accept the position in which birth and education have placed her, and cannot hope to improve it by any enterprise or energy of her own. There is a story that the brothers Lord Hood and Lord Bridport ran away from school and went to sea, and, beginning active life as ship boys, they ended it as admirals. But for women hitherto there has been no possibility of breaking the dull, and often joyless, monotony of home life except by the sacrifice of character. It surely is permissible to wish that the daughter of a bank clerk might be allowed, and indeed encouraged, to emigrate as a "female domestic servant" to a thriving colony. Hard work and plenty in Australia is preferable to listless gentility and semi-pauperism in Pentonville. The Commissioners state that they have been compelled to send out the young women as they could collect them in small bodies in private ships, surrounding them with all the protection and taking every precaution for their wellbeing that was practicable. At the date of their Report they had despatched three parties, "comprising 197 females," on this plan. They had received a report of the arrival of the first of these parties in New South Wales. There was no death and hardly any sickness on the voyage, and the emigrants on their arrival obtained "immediate and satisfactory engagements"—it is not stated of what kind. We wish that the ladies who are so busy with Woman's Rights and the Contagious Diseases Act would devote a little of their time and energy to arranging for the supply to New South Wales of as many "eligible female emigrants" as that colony is willing to receive. It is evident that the more women are sent out of this country the higher will be the value which men will place upon those who remain; but that is a simple and practical view of the subject which these high-flying philosophers may be expected to disdain.

It does not appear in way that our Government can do anything to divert the stream of emigration from the United States to our own colonies; but it is possible that the exertions of individuals and Societies can do much. There was a considerable increase in the number of emigrants to Canada in 1870 as compared with the previous year, and much of it is attributed by the Commissioners to the benevolent exertions of associations which have undertaken to assist the emigration of deserving persons of the labouring class. These associations are worthy of general support, and they can be assisted by the diffusion of knowledge as to the condition of the colonies, and the manner of reaching them, almost as effectually as by subscribing money. Information for intending emigrants to the United States is fully and regularly provided; and, we believe, that a Guide to the diamond-fields of South Africa is periodically published by Messrs. Silver and Co., the well-known outfitters. The same thing ought to be done as regards all the colonies; and perhaps, if people in the middle class in England could resolve to bring up their children in the expectation of having to struggle for existence in a colony, both England and the colonies would in the next half-century be thereby profited. It is not perhaps going too far to say that in England at present there is rather a superabundance of a false kind of gentility, and even in some of the colonies we believe that the same useless article is not uncommon. People expect, in some way, to live upon one another, and they do not recognize the truth that the wealth of a community can only be the aggregate of the productions of individual industry. If you bring up children, whether girls or boys, to work, and send them to a country which has a fair soil and climate, they are not likely to starve, and they may expect to share in the prosperity of a growing colony. It is to be feared, however, that the growth of some of the colonies depends rather on loans obtained from England than on the industry and frugality of the colonists. Such prosperity is transitory and delusive.

It may be useful to remember that migration of labourers is possible within the United Kingdom, and also that waste lands capable of cultivation may be found in England. But it is probably easier to induce an artisan or labourer to cross the ocean than to travel over two hundred miles of land. Even the most ignorant and sluggish nature can be moved by a description of a "new and happy land" beyond the Western waves, nor is it desirable that the wandering propensity should become extinct in the modern race of Englishmen. But without any jealousy of the United States, it may be declared to be undesirable that the whole of the New World should be constructed after one fashion; and therefore we think that individuals and societies should do their utmost to promote emigration to the English colonies. It appears from the Report to which we have referred that a great deal may be done in this direction without calling upon Government to undertake work which does not properly belong to it.

THE WOMAN'S DRESS ASSOCIATION.

IT is curious to watch the constantly recurring efforts made by certain women to check the follies and extravagances of fashion. Their action is not always wise, and sometimes their inventions are as objectionable as the monstrosities they would displace; but they are so far to be respected as showing that they have an uneasy sense of the absurdities to which they are subjected by milliners and dressmakers, and that they would, if they could, reform an abuse which stands in very patent need of reformation. Bloomerism was the most famous of the modern innovations on the side of simplicity and usefulness; but Bloomerism was condemned beforehand because of its unnecessary ugliness. It wilfully violated the whole ethics of costume; it set women in a kind of travestied antagonism to men, the ladies' coats and pants being only the outward and visible signs of the inward unnatural rivalry that animated the fair reformers; it made the exercise of woman's natural religion, beauty, impossible; and it ended in collapse, as it was sure to do. Since then we have had no organized resistance to the follies of fashion until now, when a new guild, "The Woman's Dress Association," has started into life, with what result remains to be seen. Individual women have protested in their own persons against the monstrous chignons and high-heeled boots, the overloaded ornamentation of every article of attire, the preposterously long skirts of the house, and the no less preposterously scanty pillow-cases of the street, in which it has pleased fashion to clothe the female world of late. But a modest head here and a rational petticoat there cannot do much to check a great national outbreak of hairy pumpkins on the cranium and of peacock trains about the feet; and all that the protesters get by their dissent is undisguised scorn for their dowdiness in fashionable caricatures, and either commendation or disdain from the public at large, according as their protest is made in good taste and simple grace, or meagrely, baldly, without beauty in detail or harmony in its central idea. For dress, like every other expression of art, can never be right unless it has a good central idea on which it is constructed.

To judge by the published declarations of the "Women's Dress Association," nothing like a sweeping or radical reform in fashions is contemplated by its promoters. So far as we can see, the real aim of the Association is to oppose extravagance in the cost of dress, and exaggeration of forms, while leaving the general direction of fashion untouched. But the rules are vague, and their interpretation is necessarily elastic. "To dress moderately, neatly, and becomingly; the dress to be consistent with the occupation and position in life," reads well; but how about the application? May a servant wear artificial flowers—that crux of the soverer kind of mistress? and if not, why not? "Because they are not consistent with her occupation and position" is no answer. The poorest peasant girl of Genoa and the Riviera wears her pomegranate blossom or her spray of jessamine just peeping out from the folds of her white veil; and why may not our unmoneyed classes wear that which is the recognized British substitute for nature—a few fragments of cambric, cut, painted, and wired to look as much like the real thing as possible? It saves expense, too, in the end, they will tell you; and, sumptuary laws being abolished, it may be thought hard that a woman, because she is poor, should be cut off from such a simple and universal taste as the use of flowers for personal decoration. But if they object to an artificial rose in her bonnet as unbecoming in a servant, our ladies would object a great deal more were they to meet Mary Jane decked out in natural flowers, though they may have been charmed with the fashion in Italy, and envied the Genoese women their style. So that, taking this flower question as an example, it would almost seem that the code of unbecomingness to station is founded on jealousy rather than on critical judgment, and means, broadly stated, that ladies do not like their maids to be too pretty.

Another rule of this Association which the fair members undertake to obey is, "To avoid all waste of time in frequent changes or alterations of dress, and not to allow dress or dressing in any respect to infringe upon other and higher duties." By the by, the Association might improve its English. How many changes of dress in the day would be considered allowable under this rule? May a lady dress for dinner only? or may she go through her five changes, as she does now if she rides on horseback and goes to a ball the same day? May she wear a morning gown of a comfortable kind, such as she cannot pay visits in of an afternoon? Then, must she dine in the same dress in which she has been paying her visits? If her hair is tumbled, must she rearrange it without taking off her gown? And if she goes to a ball late in the evening, must she go in her dinner dress, or dine in her ball dress? These are momentous questions needing deep and patient study, and the Woman's Dress Association does not give the answer to them. Perhaps, as we have now indicated the want, it will apply its collective mind to the solution of the difficulty, and lay down a strict rule as to the number of times its members may change their dress during the day, and also tell us of what patterns and materials ball dresses and dinner dresses, dresses for out-of-doors and dresses for indoors, are to be, and how they are to be made transferable. "To avoid all exaggerations (especially in head-dresses)" is a prohibition which we cordially go along with. It would really be a boon to see the English feminine head once more in its natural condition, and not as a monstrous brown pumpkin. It is not pleasant to remember that nearly every woman one meets carries a living lie on her shoulders; that shape and size always, material almost always, and colour very generally, are alike false; and that in proportion to the wretchedness and poverty of the truth are the assumed magnificence and wealth of the pretence, the biggest "heads" betokening the smallest brains, and the most luxuriant chevelure being a certain sign of barber's tresses bought at no much the ounce. We cannot think that the systematic practice of deception, even in a matter so apparently trivial as the fashion of hair-dressing, can be without its ill effects on the national character. Pretence and deception are pretence and deception, look at them how one will; and as everything comes by small and slow degrees, the habit of practical lying begun in a chignon may end in something far worse, by the mere force of use and natural progression. Further, no member of the new Association is to wear any "unsightly articles of dress which interfere with the natural figure, or anything which might attract improper attention." Here again we have one of those elastic utterances which may mean anything, and can be dissolved away to nothing. What is meant by not interfering with the natural figure? Following the lines too closely, we should come at last to the style adopted by those two famous belles who got themselves well damped before they went to a ball, so that their scanty garments should cling to their limbs as tightly as possible, and show their shapes to the greatest advantage; which is scarcely what the Association would endorse. That was in the days when close, narrow, clinging dresses, and short waists under the arms were the mode; and a woman had to be careful of her movements and take heed that she was graceful and well posed at all times, no friendly crinolines or flowing folds hiding her awkwardness and substituting drapery for personality. "Attracting improper attention" is evidently a blow aimed at those unduly low dresses which let the daylight through; and we suppose also at the famous "shoulder strap," which does not leave much to the imagination. But this, like all the rest, is too vague and elastic; for there are prudes in the world to whom everything is improper. We once knew a clergyman who objected to his wife's wearing a large cameo brooch in the front of her dress, on the rather gross plea that it attracted men's eyes to a part of her person which he desired they should ignore. There are people to whose prurient imagination improper thoughts are suggested by quite innocent and allowable fashions.

To say the truth, glad as we should be to see the question of women's dress rationally handled, we do not expect much from the new movement. The general education of the public taste, reacting on that of the purveyors and the arbiters of fashion, is the only thing that can do good. If women of good social position would take up the matter, and set a fashion that should be at once lovely to the eye and suitable to our climate and manners, the thing would be done. But as long as they submit to be mere dolls draped by their dress-makers and stuck about with bows and feathers and flowers by their milliners, blocks bewigged and bofizzed by the hair-dresser, clothes-horses meandering in stripes or breaking out in spots as the manufacturers may determine, they will never be well dressed. Fashion has become now a matter of trade; it is no longer a question of taste; and until the two can be united, we shall have to endure the many eyecsores which now afflict us. It cannot be said that we have no beautiful models to fall back upon. There is no earthly reason why such modifications of the old Greek costume as would render it practicable in our modern life should not be adopted. We have never gone beyond it in its exquisite grace and grave simplicity; and yet classic drapery did not render active work impossible. Indeed, Greek and Roman women did more manual domestic labour than our modern ladies dream of; and antique costumes clothed as active limbs as are to be found under crinolines and panniers. At all events modifications are possible, as we see every now and then among our more artistically draped women. Medieval fashions, too, give some very lovely forms, if perpetually disturbed by quaintnesses and uglinesses. The simple draperies of surcote and mantle were at least true in line and beautiful in flow, though too long and cumbersome for modern use; but whenever a good form was found it was sure to be overlaid by some adjunct which gradually changed its character till it became another thing altogether; or the effect of one article of attire was ruined by the extravagance of another, till absurdity culminated in the double horns, the knotted sleeves, the hard-pointed stomachers that seemed to cut the body in two, the unsightly farthingales and monstrous ruffs, with which women disguised the beauty of their drapery and rendered themselves hideous. But, in spite of all their eccentricities and aberrations, there are fine models of dress in olden times; and the worst of them are scarcely more absurd than the worst of our own fashions. The very "horns" themselves are but a shade more absurd than the modern head of false hair, with the odd little hat or bonnet perched on the top of a fuzzy laycock; and medieval mantles did not trail in the dust with more grace or less cleanliness than do our ladies' modern trains. The short walking skirt is about the only thing of which we can boast; and this, according to our sagacious contemporary the Queen, is getting longer, so as to trail an inch or so on the ground. Thus here again, as so often before, women have proved themselves utterly foolish in the matter of fashion, and incapable of appreciating a good or useful thing when they have got it. Seriously, it is a pity that they blunder so egregiously in their dress; but so long as fashion reigns art is nowhere, and beauty is a mere matter of chance, lost almost as soon as found, abandoned for an ugly caprice, for the mere sake of novelty, and on the absurd plea of change being good for trade.

GOthic ARCHITECTURE IN ITALY.

WE have been tarrying for a long while among the cities of Italy and the noble buildings of the early middle age which they contain. But we trust that no one who feels the charm of tracing the impress which the history of stirring times has left behind it on brick and marble will deem that we have tarried too long in a land of such surpassing interest. One sketch more will bring the subject, from the point of view from which we have looked at it, to an end. In all our studies of Italian buildings we have made the Romanesque architecture of the country our main object. We have done so advisedly. No style of architecture has higher claims on the attention of the historical inquirer than the Romanesque of Italy. Its actual merits as a form of art may, of course, like those of all other forms of art, be variously judged by various minds and eyes. Yet we can hardly understand, certainly we should not envy, the taste which should see other than some of man's noblest works in such piles as the Cathedral of Pisa and the Council-house of Padua. But, leaving alone questions of taste, the Romanesque of Italy, looked at in its historical aspect, must rank among the highest and purest forms of the art which the world has seen. The style is thoroughly national in its origin; it is thoroughly consistent in point of construction. The style of classical Rome was, after all, an awkward attempt to combine a system of construction of genuine Italian birth with a system of decoration which was simply borrowed from Greece. It has been said over and over again, but it cannot be too often said, that the true architecture of ancient Italy was an architecture of the pier and arch, while the architecture of ancient Greece was an architecture of the column and entablature. The style of classical Rome was an attempt to blend the two, an attempt to give to a building raised according to the Italian system of construction a superficial likeness to a building raised according to the Greek system of construction. The pier and its arch, the real construction which ought to be boldly brought forward and ornamented, as it were, into the background, and ornament is sought in the Greek features, which are thrust in without any constructive purpose. The most truly satisfactory buildings of the classical Roman time are those which are the least enriched, those where the Greek features are quite secondary or are absent altogether—the amphitheatres, bridges, and aqueducts. But a style which allows of more enrichment than is fitting for buildings of this class is needed for buildings of other classes, for temples, palaces, or senate-houses. Now classical Rome never worked out for itself a thoroughly consistent style, a style in which the round arch, the real constructive feature, should receive its proper place as such, and should stand boldly out as the life and soul of the building, the centre of an appropriate and consistent style of ornament. This great problem was first solved by the Italian Romanesque. The Northern Romanesque, in Germany above all, was largely influenced by the more massive and unadorned Roman works. Such an interior as that of the church of Mainz has really more in common with an amphitheatre or an aqueduct than it has with a basilica. The Italian architects, on the other hand, could not bring themselves to give up features of such exquisite grace as the columns which Rome had borrowed from Greece. They worked out a style in which the Italian arch and the Grecian column should each have its place, a style in which they should not simply stand unconnectedly side by side, but should be fused together into one harmonious whole. They found a use for the column, in which it played as honest and consistent a part as it had played in its native land of Greece. There the column had, rightly and naturally, supported the entablature; now that the construction of the entablature was exchanged for the construction of the arch, the column was, no less rightly and naturally, set to support the arch. Our first certain example of this great change—a change which was the groundwork of every later development of Romanesque and Gothic art—is indeed to be found beyond the bounds of Italy, on the other side of the Adriatic. The palace of Diocletian at Spalato forms, as we have already hinted more than once, one of the great landmarks in the history of architecture. It is not of the slightest consequence that Spalato is not geographically in Italy. It would have been of as little consequence if the change, instead of being made by Diocletian at Spalato, had been made by Constantius at York. The arts of Rome were common to at least the whole Western half of the Empire, and Italy was the part of the Empire in which this great change took the firmest root and bore the richest crops. We have seen an intermediate stage of Ravenna, where the architect still did not venture to make his arches spring direct from his columns without the interposition of a last lingering trace of the entablature. But the general effect is really but little modified, even at Ravenna, and the arrangement of Spalato comes out again in its purity at Lucca, and reaches its fullest development in the crowning glories of Pisa. A pure and consistent round-arched style was now in being; a style which really united the grace of the Greek column with the constructive advantages of the Roman pier and arch, and which gradually worked out for itself a pure and consistent form of decoration. The style as we see it at Pisa and in the better examples at Lucca answers every reasonable requirement for an architectural style. It is consistent and harmonious, capable of the highest degree either of majesty or of grace. And it is a truly national style, a genuine product of the Italian mind. It is the unborrowed growth of the soil, suggested by the circumstances, and answering the needs, of the land in which it arose.

We will not attempt any invidious comparison between the Northern and the Southern forms of Romanesque. It is enough that one is Northern and the other is Southern. The forms of Durham would be out of place on the banks of the Arno, and the forms of Pisa would be out of place in the peninsula which overhangs the Wear. What we now wish to dwell upon is the fate of the two styles respectively, the nature of the later forms of art to which they severally gave way. To the architects of Northern Europe a more excellent way was shown, and the Romanesque of Speyer and Caen and Norwich vanished before a style yet nobler than itself. Pilgrims and warriors returning from the Holy Land brought with them a new architectural form, a system of construction worthy to rank side by side with the entablature of Greece and the round arch of Italy. The Mahometan architects had long used the pointed arch, not only as an accidental or incidental shape, but as a prominent feature of their buildings. But they had used it without knowing its full capacities; in their hands it remained lifeless, never gathering round itself an appropriate and consistent system of ornament. In Sicily the Norman Kings still reared their churches and palaces in the same style as their Mahometan predecessors. Buildings, both basilical and domical, were, differring from those of Ravenna mainly in the pointed arches of their still columnar arcades. In more Northern lands the pointed arch was first placed on the more massive piers of the German or Norman Romanesque, and was employed as a purely constructive feature in the main arches of the building. Gradually the new constructive feature, as by a kind of attraction, gathered round itself a whole system of appropriate ornament. The smaller decorative arches followed the shape of the main constructive features. A system of mouldings and other enrichments, appropriate to the new construction, but which would have been incongruous with the old, was developed step by step, and the mere grouping of single-light windows side by side gradually grew into the great invention of tracery. As for the place or nation to which the new style is due it is idle to enter into controversies. In Germany, in France, and in England, Gothic architecture is equally at home; in all alike it is thoroughly native; in all it speaks essentially the same language, though that language branches off into various dialects in every kingdom, almost in every province. It is idle to ask which of the three great nations was in advance of the other two; each national variety of the style has its own distinguishing characteristics, and it is a mere matter of taste which is to be preferred to another. Amiens and Salisbury have been compared and contrasted over and over again, and the same answer must always be given, that the French church shows the more speedy and perfect development in some points, as in the windows, while the English church has a no less undoubted advantage in other points, as in the sections and mouldings of the pier-arcades. The great artistic creation of the middle ages belongs in short to no particular nation; it is the common property of all Western Christendom North of the Alps.

Let us now once more cross to the lands South of the mountains, and we shall there find the case exactly opposite. The true Gothic of the North is not there to be found. There are doubtless in Italy crowds of buildings with pointed arches, but to produce a Gothic building something more is needed than simply to give the arch a pointed form. The building is not true Gothic unless the pointed arch is accompanied by an appropriate system of decoration—by those appropriate forms of moulding, of capitals, of windows, which the instinct of the Northern architects gradually worked out as the fitting enrichment of the constructive form which they had learned from the Saracen. No buildings are historically more interesting than those in which the pointed arch appears without having as yet won for itself this appropriate system of decoration. Such are alike the original Saracenic buildings, the Saracenic churches of Sicily, and the various transitional buildings of Northern lands, the various forms intermediate between Romanesque and Gothic, the various strivings, as yet not wholly successful, after the full development of the new principle. But their historic interest is so high mainly because they are artistically imperfect, because they show us the various steps by which men felt their way after a new style, the way in which old ideas fell off one by one as the new ideas found freer play. The more inconsistent such transitional examples are, the more clearly they set before us the mixture of two discordant principles, the more do they teach us of the way in which styles of architecture were developed, and the higher is their interest as stages in the history of art. But their value of this kind depends wholly on their being genuine and natural stages of a healthy development, strivings after something more perfect which is not yet reached, but to which every fresh attempt brings us nearer. They are essentially struggles after something which has not yet been seen, not imperfect copies of something which has been seen. Now what place shall we assign to the pointed architecture of Italy? Assuming the Northern Gothic, with its deep-cut mouldings, its elaborate tracery, with the principle of vertical extension carried out alike in the main lines of the building and in its minutest details, to be the ideal of a style which has the pointed arch for its main constructive feature, it is not too much to say that in Italy such a style is unknown. Particular buildings, particular cities, come nearer to it than others, but it would be impossible to find an Italian building in which the principles of the style are so completely and consistently carried out as they are in the best churches of England, France, and Germany. Here and there we find a church in which the arches are pointed, but in which the whole feeling is Romanesque. Were such a church a Sicilian mosque, conquered and baptized by King Roger, its historic interest would be of the highest order. But when we find that it is a building of the thirteenth or fourteenth or fifteenth century, a building later than Salisbury and Amiens and Köln, we see in it, not a striving after something more perfect, but a falling back upon something less perfect. We feel inclined to bid it be either beast or bird, and to cast off its bat-like nature; we could be well pleased either to develop its details into the forms of the perfect Gothic, or to turn back its constructive features into the forms of the perfect Romanesque. Take a normal Italian pointed church, one for instance of those huge piles which, in most of the cities of Italy, the Friars began to build, but which in so many cases they found themselves unable to finish. The arches are pointed, but broad and sprawling, as they are, they miss the Gothic idea of vertical extension. In the pillars there is no bold clustering, in the arches there are no deep-cut mouldings, the windows are few and small, the tracery is commonly of the most rudimentary kind, more like holes punched in a flat surface than like the bold self-asserting lines of either the earlier or the later form of Northern tracery. Nowhere do we see in its fulness the pier-arch, tri-forum, clerestory, and vault, all the members closely fitted into one another, and all seeming to rise upwards by one common effort. The genuine Gothic in its highest developments hardly tolerates the existence of a mere wall; tracery, panelling, string-courses, vaulting-shafts, so completely cover the whole as to leave hardly such a thing as a plain surface. In the Italian pointed style the wall is as prominent as it is in Romanesque. In short, all that really constitutes the life and character of the true Gothic is lacking in the Italian imitation of it. There are Italian buildings with pointed arches which have, in the interior at least, a grand and striking effect. But they cannot endure the test of the same minute study as the great churches of the North. Milan, largely the work of German architects, comes nearer to a Northern church than perhaps any other, and no one will deny that its internal effect is magnificent in the extreme. But Milan itself will not bear picking to pieces as we can pick to pieces any great Northern building. No doubt the best Northern buildings have their faults, but they are incidental and individual faults, which do not affect the purity of the style. At Milan, magnificent as it is, the style itself is not the pure Gothic. So again, among the pointed work of Italy there is to be found a rich store of detail of exquisite beauty; more largely among the palaces of Verona and Venice than in the churches. But it is almost always detail which would show to far greater advantage in a Romanesque than in a Gothic building.

The explanation of course is that the true Gothic style was impossible in Italy. It did not suit the needs of the climate, neither did it express the historical feelings of the people. The native and natural style of Italy was its own glorious Romanesque. No event in the history of art is more to be regretted than that the Italians ever took to copying pointed forms at all. The style which they copied they could not reproduce in its perfection, and they threw aside the opportunity of working out still nobler developments of the national style than even Pisa and Lucca had produced. To an imitative Gothic succeeded an imitative classical style, whose chief element of true life came from the fact that Romanesque, after all, was not quite dead. It lived on, as we have already seen, in the towers through the whole mediæval period, and its forms were far from being without influence on the earlier and better work of the Renaissance. But in the end the living development from the principles of Roman architecture gave way to the dead imitation of its details. The two sides of the great Piazza at Venice show the difference. The northern side, Renaissance in date, might almost be called Romanesque in feeling. From that turn to the southern side; it is the change from a living offspring to a dead copy.

What is the moral for ourselves? The style of Italy for Italy, the style of England for England. The revived Italian, the style of Tyrants, Popes, and Jesuits, is as utterly unnatural, as utterly out of place, on the soil of England as the helpless attempts to reproduce the Northern Gothic were on the soil of Italy. The purest forms of Ely and Lincoln would be out of place in Tuscany; the purest forms of Pisa and Lucca would be out of place in England. But if the living reality would be inappropriate anywhere but in its own land, what shall we say to its dead counterfeit?

REVIEWS.

THE WORKS OF HOOKHAM FRERE.*

THE most important of Mr. Hookham Frere's works are his brilliant versions of some of the plays of Aristophanes; and both his principles of translation and his practical illustrations of his theories deserve separate notice. The biographical Memoir which occupies a part of the first volume records the comparatively uneventful life of one of the most accomplished men of the world, and one of the most finished and graceful scholars of a former generation. In a letter which has already been more than once quoted, Mr. Frere relates how Canning, in his mature life, learned from him for the first time that tadpoles grow into frogs. Many statesmen of the present day are capable of explaining how themselves and their equals have been developed from jelly-fish or from yet more primitive protoplasmata. One of their number, who has proved with scientific cogency that the wings of birds are adapted to the purpose of flying, could have satisfied Canning that the tails of tadpoles are inevitably destined to bifurcate in due season. In both instances liberal studies of widely different kinds have served as a training for the conduct of affairs. The composition of Latin verses, and the investigation of the physiology of frogs, are perhaps almost equally well calculated to make the intellectual muscles strong and supple. For any other object it may be conceded that natural science and classical learning are in ordinary cases equally useless. The advocates of the older form of education which is now becoming unpopular still contend that the liberal arts are more effective than the study of nature in promoting refinement of taste and manners; and if they seek for evidence of the soundness of their judgment, they can find no more favourable example of scholarly polish than that of Mr. Frere. He had the good fortune to live at a time when his gifts and acquisitions, and the station which he inherited, readily opened the path to distinction. The early success of Fox and of Pitt had given youth an advantage in general estimation which has since entirely disappeared. Grenville, Ryder, and Addington were advanced to high office because they were contemporaries of Pitt; and before Canning had left Oxford both the rival parties were already calculating on his future alliance. The eldest son of a country gentleman of good family, Mr. Frere, on leaving Cambridge, where he had become a Fellow of Caius College, entered Parliament at the age of twenty-seven as member for a nomination borough, and immediately became Under-Secretary of the Foreign Office under Lord Grenville. An Eton intimacy with Canning probably accounted for his introduction into office, and he formed a strong personal and political attachment to Pitt. In 1797, a year after his entrance into the House of Commons, he became a principal contributor to the Anti-Jacobin. The best parts of the celebrated collection, including the "Progress of Man," the "Loves of the Triangles," the "Inscription for Mrs. Brownrigg's Cell," the "Elegy on the [imaginary] Death of Jean Bon St. André," and the "Rovers," were jointly composed by Canning, Ellis, and Frere. The speeches at the meeting of the Friends of Freedom, including an excellent caricature of Erskine's style, were written by Frere. Even at this distance of time it is evident that the great advocate's autobiographical fragments are faithfully copied from the original:—

* The Works of John Hookham Frere, in Verse and Prose. Now first collected; with a Prefatory Memoir by his Nephews, W. E. and Sir Basil Frere. 2 vols. London: Pickering. 1871.

He had been a soldier and a sailor, and had a son at Winchester school; he had been called by special retainers during the summer into many different and distant parts of the country, travelling chiefly in postchaises. He felt himself called upon to declare that his poor faculties were at the service of the country, of the free and enlightened part of it at least. He stood here as a man. He stood in the eye, indeed in the hand, of God, to whom (in the presence of the company and the waiters) he solemnly appealed. He was of noble, perhaps of royal, blood; he had a house at Hampstead; was convinced of the necessity of a thorough and radical reform; his pamphlets had gone through thirty editions, skipping alternately the odd and even numbers; he loved the Constitution, to which he would cling and grapple; and he was clothed with the infirmities of man's nature.

Parody and even satire are not the highest achievements of the human intellect; but the little knot of young men who wrote the parts of the Anti Jacobin which after seventy years are not yet forgotten possessed no common ability. Between Frere and Canning a remarkable similarity of tastes and accomplishments cemented a warm and lifelong friendship. They were both faithful followers of Pitt, not only in his later task of opposing revolution and democracy, but in his antagonism to religious bigotry and to economic restriction. In his later years Mr. Frere often complained that the Whigs had appropriated to themselves many doctrines which had long before been professed by his own early leaders and associates; and he stated from personal knowledge that Pitt regarded Catholic Emancipation as more important than the Irish Union. Of three epitaphs which he wrote on Canning, it may be worth while to quote the tersest and the best. With the personal distrust which accounted for the hostility of Canning's chief opponents his nearest friend could have no sympathy:—

I was destroyed by Wellington and Grey.
They both succeeded. Each has had his day.
Both tried to govern; each in his own way;
And both repent of it—as well they may.

It appears from a statement made by Mr. Frere, many years after the event, that when Addington became Prime Minister, Pitt in vain urged Canning to remain in office. He wished on his return to find Canning in office, where he might have retained him (without difficulty from his aristocratic supporters), but Canning would not let him.

In 1800 Frere was sent as Envoy Extraordinary to Lisbon, and two years afterwards he was transferred to Madrid. After the rupture of the Peace of Amiens he remonstrated with Godoy, better known as Prince of the Peace, in language so strong that Pitt's Government, anxious if possible to preserve the neutrality of Spain, thought it prudent to recall him. His services were rewarded by promotion to the Privy Council, and by a pension for life conferred on him, after the pleasant fashion of those days, at the age of thirty-five. Three months after his return Spain declared war in consequence of the ill-advised attack of the English squadron on the treasure-ships and their convoy. During his residence in Madrid Frere had mastered the language, and he had also formed friendships with some of the principal persons in the capital. Lord Malmesbury has recorded an opinion which Frere expressed soon after his return, that a revolution against the degraded Court and the French supremacy was impending. When the Spanish nation rose against Napoleon's usurpation in 1808, Frere was naturally selected as the English Envoy accredited to the Central Junta. He had previously, by a curious accident, been enabled to supply a credential to the agent who was employed to communicate with the Marquis Romana, then commander of the Spanish contingent with the French army in Denmark. Mr. Robertson, a Catholic priest who undertook to carry the message, was instructed, in the absence of any written document, to repeat to Romana an emendation of a passage in the Gests of the Cid which Frere had suggested in conversation some years before. Romana at once determined to effect his escape with his whole force; and, as is well known, the English fleet conveyed 9,000 Spaniards and their commander in safety to their native country. No English representative could have been more agreeable to the leaders of the insurgents; but the mission was clouded by the great disaster of Corunna. When Napoleon was marching on Madrid, Frere urged Sir John Moore to advance into the heart of Spain; and in any case, to retreat by way of Galicia to the coast, instead of making his way into Portugal. He even gave great and just offence to Moore by proposing that, rather than retreat on Portugal, he should allow a French emigrant officer who brought the latest news from Madrid to be examined before a Council of War. The subsequent death of Moore and the embarkation of his army directed popular irritation against the English Minister; and he was soon afterwards superseded by Lord Wellesley. He was still more unfortunate in incurring the disapproval and dislike of the great historian of the war. The Napoleons had been trained to arms under Sir John Moore, and Sir William Napier was at all times incapable of justice or consideration to any one who had come into collision with his own family or friends. His bitter and contemptuous invective against Frere has determined the judgment of the majority of those who have studied the history of the time; but the temperate version of the transaction in the present volume deserves the fuller attention because Sir Bartle Frere has, although in a different region, had large experience of public affairs. Sir John Moore entered on the campaign in the spirit in which Nicias sailed to Syracuse; and from first to last his despondency never intermitted. His offensive movement and the choice of his line of retreat were on his own responsibility determined by the advice of the civilian whose interference he resented. Frere had at least the qualification of a sanguine faith in the possibility of the enterprise which it was his duty to further. He from the first reposed a just confidence in Sir Arthur Wellesley, who truly said of himself that he was the first general throughout the revolutionary wars who had not been afraid of the French.

After his return to England Mr. Frere never re-entered public life, though he refused an embassy, and on two occasions a peerage. During his absence Canning had, in consequence of his quarrel with Lord Castlereagh, retired from office; and many years elapsed before he resumed a leading position. About the same time Mr. Frere succeeded, on the death of his father, to the family estates at Roydon, in Norfolk, and for some years he divided his time between the occupations of a country gentleman and the enjoyment of general society in London. In 1816 he married the Dowager Countess of Erroll, and her delicate health afterwards casually determined the course of his future life. In 1821 he settled in Malta for the sake of the climate; and although Lady Erroll died in 1831, he never returned permanently to England. Sir Bartle Frere, after visiting him on his way to India in 1834, was satisfied that he judged wisely in preferring "a life of singular dignity and ease" in Malta to a residence in a country which had become strange, among the fragments of a society which had been dispersed and thinned by time. The loss of Canning alone would have for him deprived England of much of its former attraction. "If it had happened twenty years earlier," he said with a pardonable exaggeration, "I believe it would have killed me." Grief seldom kills, but the friendship which is even in imagination so profound is one of the rarest of human relations. Among the Maltese of all classes, as well as among the English residents and visitors, Mr. Frere was universally beloved and admired. His courtly bearing, his wit, and his scholarship were fully appreciated by competent judges; and his thoughtful liberality endeared him to the poorer classes of the community. With his friends, and especially with his brothers, who were all remarkable for ability and cultivation, he maintained an affectionate correspondence. Although he began at a comparatively early age to speak and think of himself as an old man, he lived to be seventy-six, dying in 1846. He was buried not far from the house which he had long occupied in the Floriana outworks above the Quarantine Harbour. As Mr. Norton, an American critic, happily remarks in a passage quoted by Sir Bartle Frere:—

Mr. Frere was too indolent to push his way in the long procession of aspirants to the Temple of Fame, and far too fastidious to like the company he would have been forced to meet at the door. . . . He was one of those men of whom there are always too few, with ample and self-sufficing power, who can do so easily what others find it hard to accomplish that they are deprived of the sting of ambition, and are content to enjoy while others are compelled to labour. His temperament, his taste, his culture, his position, united to make him the type of the man of literary genius, as distinguished from the professional author.

He was cordially admired by Scott, by Byron, by Moore, and by Brougham; and Coleridge, whom he had sought out in a social sphere far removed from his own, left in his will a tribute to Mr. Frere as the most perfect man and gentleman he had ever known. His chief literary performance, with the exception of his Aristophanic translations, was the poem of the Monks and the Giants, which first introduced into England the octosyllabic stanza, and the semi-serious style of Pulci and Berni. The versification is easy, but occasionally flat and prosaic, and the story is barely interesting enough to sustain to the end the attention of a careless reader. Mr. Frere was amused by the disappointment of Mackintosh when he failed, after careful study, to discover the non-existent political meaning of the light and fluent story; but he rightly judged that it was not worth while to follow further a vein of nonsense which had nothing serious beneath it. The most important result of Mr. Frere's experiment was the adoption by Byron of the same style and metre. Few competent judges will agree with Coleridge that the versification of Beppo was less skilful than that of the Monks and the Giants. That both Beppo and Don Juan were liable to moral objections, and that in Don Juan there was sometimes an approximation to doggerel, could not be disputed; but Byron showed a sounder poetical instinct than his graceful predecessors, when he weighted and strengthened the slight fabric of narrative verse with satirical humour. Both the giants and the monks are too shadowy to laugh at, while Don Juan's adventures, though the personages of the story are thin and unreal, are as amusing as they are, in many instances, improper. The fragment of the Whistlercraft Poems has nevertheless a definite literary value. The republication of Mr. Frere's writings, and the interesting account of his life, will preserve the memory of a genius which was inadequately represented by its visible products.

CALENDAR OF THE CAREW MANUSCRIPTS.*

WE have from time to time taken occasion to notice the valuable volumes which Mr. Brewer and Mr. Bullen have been now for some years engaged in editing from the Carew Manuscripts at Lambeth. The volume now before us is of a somewhat exceptional character. It does not continue the notices of the History of Ireland, which left off at the end of the last volume, published more than a year ago, with the death of Elizabeth in 1603. We observe from their advertisement that the editors intend resuming the chronological order in their sixth volume. Meanwhile they have interrupted their work by issuing a fifth volume of an entirely distinct class. The latter half of it consists of epitomes of documents found among the Carew Manuscripts, much in the usual style. The earlier portion is divided into two parts, each of which is a complete whole in itself. One of these is entitled the "Book of Howth," and the other the "Conquest of Ireland." Both of them have been, we think, judiciously printed at full length, and in the latter the original orthography, as Mr. Brewer calls it, has been preserved; the only alterations made consisting in an improved method of placing the stops and the use of capital letters, according to modern fashion. It is, no doubt, what Mr. Brewer calls it, an interesting and curious specimen of English as spoken in the Pale; but readers, with all the advantages of the new style of punctuation, will, before they have read many pages, demur to the villanous spelling being classed under the designation of orthography. However, we have first to speak of the "Book of Howth." Probably scarcely any of our readers will know what the title means. Neither has Mr. Brewer been able to throw much light upon the time of its compilation, or on the author of the Chronicle. It is a small folio in vellum, written in different hands, all of the sixteenth century, and was apparently formerly preserved among the archives of Dublin Castle, and therefore, we should suppose, ought still to be there. It is useless to conjecture how it fell into Carew's hands, or what right the Lambeth Library has to its possession. Possession is said to be nine-tenths of the law, and assuredly in this particular instance it is not likely to be disturbed. As to the authorship, there are only two pieces of internal evidence which bear upon that point. On the last leaf appear the words "Crystofer Howthe hys Bouke," which of course means possession, not authorship. And the preceding leaf ends with the words:—

There was one Walter Howe, clerk or chief engrosser of the Queen's Majesty's exchequer, foster father to my brother Richard L. of Howthe, lived five score years, and died the 9 of March, 1554.

Accompanying this is a marginal note in Carew's hand, stating that he lived to the age of 107 years, and giving a reference to folio 120 of the book. The reference is very obscure, but it appears to imply that part at least of the Chronicle was taken from a book of Walter Housse's, who "was servant to William Howthe when he slew James Earl of Worman's brother and seven of his men at the bridge of Kilmainham."

Whoever was the writer, the compilation is most curious and interesting, and we are glad that the editors have departed from the usual practice adopted in this series, and have printed the Chronicle in extenso. The historical information is of course derived from earlier sources, for it goes back beyond the times of St. Patrick. Sometimes these sources are pointed out in the book itself, sometimes they may be detected by those who are conversant with early chronicles; but Mr. Brewer rests the claims of the "Book of Howth" on the traditional anecdotes and personal notices contained in it; and in illustration of this he quotes in his preface some interesting remarks on Surrey, Gray, and Sidney, whilst the following little anecdote of Northumberland shows that the writer's observations sometimes extended beyond Irish affairs:—

The Duke of Northumberland, in Edward VI.'s days, asked a spirit in close, whether any man should overcome him by violence, and the spirit answered that no man should have the upperhand of him. And after, Queen Mary had him taken and put to execution, for she was but a woman. Such is the guile of the false spirit.

After giving a few extracts as a specimen of the volume, the editor observes that it would be easy to multiply passages equally expressive of Irish life, feeling, and manners. But before we go on to say anything more of the contents of the volume in question, we think it quite necessary to ask of our readers the same indulgent construction which Mr. Brewer is careful to impress upon his readers as being absolutely necessary in reading and interpreting such a curious farrago of facts and falsehoods, probabilities and improbabilities:—

It is the strong impress of their nationality which makes these early histories of Ireland the most amusing, and in some respects the most explicit, of any, if the reader will only remember that he is reading Irish history, and will not insist upon testing it by the stern rule of right and literal accuracy which he is accustomed to apply to history and its growth on this side the Channel.

Let us hope that the following story of St. Bride or St. Bridget, which immediately follows the life of St. Patrick, may be true. It is at least more credible than some of the miraculous legends connected with her name:—

One fact of her being yet a child made her famous. The King of Leinster had given to Dubtachus (her father), in token of singular affection for his good service, a rich sword. Now it befell that the maiden visiting the sick neighbours diversely distressed with hunger, her father being a stern man, his lady a shrew, she saw none other help to relieve those wretched people but to part the jewels of that idle sword among them. This matter was heinously taken and came to the King's ears, who coming shortly after to a banquet in her father's house, demanded the girl, not yet nine years old, how she durst presume to deface the gift of a King. She answered that it was bestowed upon a better King than he, "whom (quoth she) finding in such extremity, I would have given all my father's and all that thou hast, yea, yourselves and all, were ye in my power to give, rather than Christ should starve."

The most remarkable thing in the volume is the miscellaneous nature of its contents and its entire want of arrangement. From fol. 61 down to fol. 100a there is a series of Annals extending from a few years before the landing of Henry II. down to 1378 A.D., the forty-fourth year of the reign of the King—i.e. Edward III.—after which follow eight leaves which Carew has certainly described with good reason as "a confused collection." We can discover no kind of law pervading this collection. It relates to the affairs of different nations. No sort of chronological sequence has been observed. The Chronicle runs backwards and forwards for more than a thousand years, between the fifth and the fifteenth centuries. In the middle of it occurs a description of the siege of Rhodes, which appears to have been mostly taken from Hall's Chronicle; then comes "a discourse of the variance between the Earls of Kildare and Ormond." In this discourse occurs a passage to which Mr. Brewer has called attention in his preface as throwing a new light on the character of Henry VII. It represents the King as laughing with Kildare when the latter made coarse jokes against the Bishop of Meath. But the story seems to us to prove the skill of the Irishman in coming over the dull, saturnine English King, rather than any unbending of the King's usual gravity.

Sometimes a passage is inserted which has nothing whatever to do with the subject of the preceding paragraph. No explanation of these dislocations can be given by the supposition that the leaves of the book have been wrongly put together. For instance, on the second page of folio 137, after a notice which belongs to the year 1579, we have an account of the size of different giants and portions of their bodies which have been discovered, and feats which they had accomplished, ending with a broken sentence which shows that it was not a collection made from various authors relating to a particular subject, but an extract from a single work. The passage ends, "This much of the giants I find written in a credible—," after which three pages are left blank. If all the figures are magnified in proportion to those of Goliath, whose height is represented as being nine cubits and his breadth four cubits, we shall have no difficulty in reducing the account into more credible dimensions. This is followed by a fragment of the early history of Ireland, and this again by an enumeration of the "Rebellions that hath been in England from the time of William the Conqueror." And here we trace a laudable purpose on the part of the writer. After stating quite enough to prove his point, he says that he omitted thousands of other instances to avoid tediousness, and adds:—

The occasion of this remembrance is, for that when any of England birth come to Ireland, they report and brag that all that therein is are traitors, as who would say and affirm that there was nor is any treason ever in England committed. The truth is that no country that is known ever more rebelled against their Prince than England; so hereby you do understand the cause of this rehearsal.

On the back of the same leaf on which this enumeration concludes begins an argument in favour of the title of the King of England to reign over the whole of Ireland, resting upon the charters and confirmations of different Popes, and the submissions which native princes had from time to time offered. Whatever may be thought of the validity of these claims, the writer, whoever he may have been, does not strengthen them by the following allegation:—

That the Irish were subjects to the Crown of Britain before they set foot in Ireland, thus it appeareth. They dwelt in that side of Spain whereof Bayon was the chief Imperial city, and the same then in possession and obedience to Borgandyne three hundred seventy-five years ere Christ was born, as it was to his successors many a day after—namely, to Henry the 5, as I find noted in certain precepts of government, dedicated by James the 5, to James Bottler, Earl of Ormond, then Lieutenant of Ireland, A.D. 1416. From this coast and city, now Earl of Burgundy, came the fleet of those Iberians who in 60 ships met Bourguntius on the sea, returning from the conquest of Denmark, to whom they yielded oath and service, and for a dwelling-place where, by him [sic], he conducted and planted them in Ireland, and became his liege people.

On the back of the same leaf appear the following three lines, which have no connexion with anything that precedes or follows:—

Apparent in Fabian the 8th part, f. 139, A.D. 665, that Saint Denis' church beside Parvay was covered with plates of silver.

* Calendar of the Carew Manuscripts preserved in the Archbishop's Library at Lambeth. Edited by J. S. Brewer, M.A., and William Bullen, Esq. Published by the Authority of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, under the sanction of the Master of the Rolls. London: Longmans & Co. 1871.

† Saturday Review, September 19, 1868, and July 31, 1869.

There is one set of verses in the "Book of Howth" of which we will give a specimen. It contains an account of the origin and the untimely end of the Order of Templars, all whose possessions the writer says were given unto the religion of Knights of St. John the Baptist, after they had been convicted of 10 articles of heresy, not fruitful to be put in memory A.D. 1311. In Ireland their houses were Clonetaff, Donabrowe, Gormanstown, Kilmaynam-by-Kelles, Palmerstown, and divers other, &c.

The account of their rise is as follows:—

Pope Honoré gave the authority,
Of holy Church being that time head.
A white habit they bare for chastity;
Eugenius after gave them a cross of red;
And to defend pilgrims out of dread,
Gan Sarazins through their high renown;
This was chief point of their profession.
While they lived in wilful poverty
These crossed knights, in mantles clad of white,
Their names spread in many far country;
For in perfection was set all their delight.
Folk of devotion caught an appetite;
Therefore to increase gave them great almes,
By which they gan increase in great riches.
By process within a few years,
The number great of their religion
And the fame of the said Templars
Gan spread wide in many region.
With towers, castles, they gave them to delices, Appelled in virtue which brought in many vices.

Towards the end the book becomes more and more heterogeneous in its contents. In a single page we have the following entries in the order which we give:—

There is a place in England called Barame Houth, between Dover and Canterbury, whereat H. 6 was received after his coronation at Paris, being then but 10 years of age.

Paul's steeple was set a-fire by lightning in a tempest—and also in Queen Elizabeth's time—21 H. 6.

37 H. 6 the Duke of York fled to Ireland.

The third of H. 2 was seen two suns, and in the moon was seen a red cross; and in Italy was seen three suns and three moons, and in the middle moon a red cross.

33 H. 2 appeared at Dunstabull in the air a crucifix, and Christ nailed thereon.

8 H. 1, he caused a resumption of all his former gifts. There was hail stones as big as eggs, which did much harm in England; and spouts was seen in the air in likeness of fowls bearing fire in their bills, 4 J.

5 J. wheat was sold in England for 15s. sterling the quarter.

We scarcely know how, by any amount of extracts, to convey to our readers an adequate idea of the singular nature of this volume. No class of subject seems to have come amiss to its compiler. Unquestionably none but a native Irishman could have put together such a funny combination of incidents. How much or how little he believed of what he wrote, we will not pretend to determine. We may at least say that no one could read the volume attentively without increasing his knowledge of Irish history, and improving his insight into Irish character. We have confined our attention to the "Book of Howth," which does not occupy much more than a fourth part of the volume. But the history of the "Conquest of Ireland," which is also transcribed in full, is well worth reading. And the last half of the work contains epitomes in the usual fashion of the contents of some volumes of miscellaneous papers collected by Crew. Amongst them are some notices of Lambert Simnel and Perkin Warbeck. Two of these are of great importance. They are only copies, but their originals are probably not in existence, and being State Papers of the reign of Henry VII., of which so few documents have been preserved, they should have been printed at length, instead of being given in a mere analysis. The first is Henry's letter to the Mayor and Citizens of Waterford "touching Parkyn Warbeck." The other is from the same to the same, and on the same subject. In the first, which is dated August 6 [1497], he offers them a reward of 1,000 marks if they can take him, and advises them to send out ships for the purpose. In the next, which is of October 17, written from Exeter, the King informs them of the submission of Perkin at Taunton, "openly showing his name to be Piers Osbeck, and that he was never Englishman born, but born of Torney and son to John—some time while he lived comptroller of the said Torney." He adds how he had pardoned the people of Devonshire, with the exception of the chief stirrers and misdoers, who are to abide their correction. Historians say that the King refused to see him, but this letter certainly implies that he came into the King's presence at Taunton.

We may perhaps on a future occasion have more to say on the second portion of this volume, which concerns the conquest of Ireland.

AN AUSTRALIAN PARSONAGE.*

MRS. MILLETT, the author of the little book before us, passed five years as the wife of a chaplain in Western Australia. She gives a pleasant and unaffected account of her experiences, and, if she does not show any remarkable literary power, exhibits at any rate a sense of humour and an eye for the peculiarities of a new country. Though she very sensibly avoids the form of a journal, we can fancy that the book is in substance the reproduction of a pleasant series of home letters, and by its help we may gain some notion of the general aspect which one of our most neglected colonies presents to an English lady of refinement. One peculiarity of the country is not likely to affect such an observer pleasantly. From 1851 to 1868 a steady stream of convict labour was directed upon it; and as the whole population only amounts to 25,000, a very large majority of the labouring class either is or has been convict. Mrs. Millett tells us how she heard the approach of what she took to be a string of horses with jingling chains, and how, on looking round, she discovered a file of heavily-fettered convicts approaching under the care of guardians duly armed with loaded revolvers. There is something attractive to the imagination in the picture of a new country where manners are simple, hospitality flourishes, and a certain sense of fellowship in a common enterprise unites all the members of the little community. It must be confessed, however, that the case is a good deal altered when most of your fellow-citizens have been London pickpockets, burglars, forgers, and bigamists—when it is a delicate matter to make the most distant allusion to a rope in the hearing of any accidental companion, and when there is a general understanding that the fewer questions you ask about the career of any of your acquaintances the less need there will be for drawing upon their powers of fiction. Indeed it would seem by Mrs. Millett's account that, if the colonists themselves are to be believed, Western Australia has been for some time an abode of injured innocence. The stories she tells are enough to shake one's faith in the time-honoured judicial institutions of our native land. One poor fellow, for example, had been banished from his home simply because he kept a cart. Some anonymous persons borrowed it one evening, and drove to the house of a neighbouring gentleman, and when it returned, the cart was found by some strange mischance to contain the whole of the gentleman's plate. Another person had borrowed money from a bank, and having from unforeseen circumstances failed to return it in time, found that his innocent transaction was harshly described as a theft. A third victim of fate declared that, owing to some innate peculiarity of mind, he "had been always much addicted to the sharpening of a knife." Unluckily for him, he had happened on one occasion to quarrel with his wife at a time when he was absorbed in this favourite, but surely innocent, pursuit. She basely called in the police, and swore that he had tried to cut her throat; and upon this preposterous version of the affair this interesting monomaniac had been sentenced to take part in laying the foundations of a civilized community in the antipodes. These misunderstood persons suffer from a grievance to which we confess that we should not have suspected them to be specially sensitive. A great many of them, it appears, are Protestants, so far as a very pronounced aversion to Roman Catholics may justify the name. Now, as many of the immigrant women are Irish Roman Catholics, a great number of mixed marriages take place, and are apt to be followed by quarrels embittered by an odium theologicum worthy of more intelligent Christians. Mrs. Millett, for example, describes a bitter dispute between a certain Mr. McDougall and his wife in regard to their deceased infant, which Mrs. McDougall had clandestinely carried off to be baptized by the Roman Catholic priest, whilst Mr. McDougall retorted by insisting on its burial according to the rites of the English Church. There seems indeed to be little enough reason for such superfluous causes of quarrel. We are told of a match where the bride's father had been transported for cutting off his wife's head, and where the bridegroom was arrested three weeks after on suspicion of murder; whilst the bride came to ask for assistance with a baby of a fortnight old in her arms.

In short, so far as a large part of the whole population is concerned, the Western Australians of the future will scarcely look back to their ancestors with that kind of pride with which a New Englander speaks of the Pilgrim fathers. We suspect that their family trees will generally spring rather abruptly from a mist judiciously drawn over the early days of the colony. Possibly the Herald's College of remote centuries will adopt a device for which a precedent may also be found in America. As in Massachusetts everybody's ancestor came over in the Mayflower, so in Virginia all the first families trace their descent from Pocahontas. Some "black fellow"—if Mrs. Millett's account of the aborigines be true—may serve very well as the assumed forefather of innumerable Australian families. It does not, indeed, appear that there is any romantic legend as to the early relations of the two races, nor does the native Australian rival the dignified bearing of the Red Indian of poetry and fiction. Yet Mrs. Millett gives a far more favourable account of the intelligence and moral qualities of the natives than we have generally been accustomed to hear. She supports her case by some touching instances of their fidelity, and of the kindness which they show to the race before which they are so rapidly vanishing. They have indeed one or two drawbacks. They do not appear, for example, to have any sort of religious belief beyond a vague superstition about an evil power, known as Jingy. Jingy is in the habit of going about at night doing more or less mischief, and it is said that he occasionally requires to be propitiated, though the ceremonies performed in his honour are so obscure that even their existence is doubted. Moreover, the views of marriage entertained by the race are of a very simple character; and it is thought to be highly creditable to acquire a new wife by the summary means of knocking her down and carrying her off by force when a favourable opportunity occurs. Mrs. Millett expresses her dislike that any woman can under any circumstances really welcome a partner in her husband's affections; but she is forced to confess that the native women whom she had the opportunity of observing did not protest by any means so feebly as they ought to have done. One of the natives of whom she speaks most warmly is a certain Khourabene, who was a kind of hanger-on to her establishment, and who in earlier times had been in trouble with the English Government for killing a previous wife. This little fact, however, seems to have been forgotten, and at one period of Mrs. Millett's story he had again set up a double family, and was, as she thought, rather henpecked by both his partners. It seems, however, that there is a summary remedy provided by native customs for cases of excessive domestic tyranny over the husband; and accordingly one fine day Mr. Khourabene speared another wife, and again found himself at variance with the English Government. Mrs. Millett appears to have felt sincere pity for his misfortunes, and is glad to tell us that up to the time of her leaving the colony he had not been brought to what we are pleased to call justice for his vigorous assertion of his matrimonial rights. The poor savages are in all probability doomed; but Mrs. Millett speaks with enthusiasm of the efforts made by a small body of Roman Catholic missionaries for their civilization. The mission of Noreia, in which the Benedictine monks have secluded a small body of natives from the contamination of the convict settlers, is, we are assured, much respected by men of all opinions, and a village of native Christians has really sprung into existence, and labours very successfully at small agricultural operations. It cannot be on a very large scale, as we are told that, according to the census of 1870, there were eighteen men and sixteen women, besides twenty-six children. However, it deserves credit as being an intelligent, and to some extent a successful, attempt to solve the apparently hopeless problem of raising a despised race to some degree of civilization.

* An Australian Parsonage; or, the Settler and the Savage in Western Australia. By Mrs. F. Millett. London: E. Stanford. 1872.

If the lower social strata of Western Australia are not altogether of the most attractive kind, there may be some consolation in the climate. It has the advantage over the neighbouring colonies of being completely free from dust-storms and hot winds, and it is thought that this may be in some degree the cause of its singular suitability to consumptive patients. Mrs. Millett tells us that she was acquainted with two cases of pulmonary disease, which she expected to terminate fatally within a few weeks, or even days, and in both of which the disease was arrested, and the sufferers were enabled in some degree to return to the ordinary duties of life. It is a trifling set-off to this advantage that the dryness of the climate causes people's teeth to drop out even before they are decayed, and that diseases of the eye of various kinds are exceedingly common and distressing. The colonists regard Holloway's pills as a panacea for all diseases, and it is observed that those who take them do not die faster than those who leave them alone. The question, therefore, to be considered by persons about to emigrate is whether immunity from consumption is worth purchasing at the price of teeth and eyes, a separation from most of the luxuries of civilized life, and an association with a population chiefly derived from the criminal classes.

We have not, indeed, given a complete account of the advantages which may be discovered by people of an optimistic turn of mind. Mrs. Millett, if we may judge from the tone of her book, seems to have derived the keenest satisfaction from a variety of pets, whose manners and customs she describes with a good deal of humour and with evident affection. The first and most singular of these was a lizard, called the "mountain-devil." As he was covered with prickly spines, it was easy to tether him by the tail to a post in the garden. There he led a placid life, protected by a wire dike from the attacks of a cat, and living upon ants. Ultimately he lost an eye in a misdirected attempt to recover his independence, and sank under the blow. A beast of more generally intelligible merits was a kangaroo, which led a tolerably happy existence, and acquired a taste for beer. Unluckily he took to feeding on the corn of the neighbours, and was sentenced to exile, where, being deprived of his beer, he pined away, and came to a premature end. The most attractive of Mrs. Millett's pets was an opossum, which avoided the fate of its companions. Opossums, it appears, are generally disliked from their habits of destroying everything of a breakable nature about the house. Mrs. Millett saved her crockery by allowing her pet to spend the night in solitary rambles, and after three years' companionship it chose to retire into the woods altogether. The description of these creatures and of the various small interests of house-keeping in a newly settled country is pleasantly written, and perhaps some clergymen's wives may be apt to fancy after reading it that in the society of opossums, kangaroos, and mountain-devils they could surmount the hardships of life amongst convict congregations, and in a climate where the temperature rises to a point which in England would mean suffocation. If so, we may advise them to consider whether the good temper with which Mrs. Millett encountered the inconveniences of life in Barladong is not a rather rare endowment, and whether most people of equal culture would not have been likely to bring back a more depressing account of the country. Scientists and oculists in search of practice, and persons of consumptive tendency, may be safely recommended to consider the advantages of Western Australia, but most other people will probably find its attractions small until the process of opening up its resources and connecting it with other parts of Australia has been carried out a little further.

LEVY ON BLINDNESS AND THE BLIND.*

FROM none but one of themselves could we hope to gain anything like a thorough and adequate expression of the thoughts, the emotions, and the cravings which we instinctively associate with the sad lot of the blind. It is to his personal experience of this privation, as enhancing the powers of an otherwise observant collector of facts, fairly adept at the processes of generalization, that much of the value as well as of the pathetic interest which belongs to Mr. Levy's little volume is justly due. In Blindness and the Blind we have not only a practical treatise upon the causes, the treatment, and the cure of loss of sight, with such alleviations of this terrible physical evil as it is the object of the new science or art of typhology to introduce and to develop, but we have the advantage of being taken, so to say, into companionship with a mind capable of analysing and giving form to its own existence, workings, and impressions, and, by the enforced concentration of its powers upon a limited range of the objects of perception, throwing an exceptionally strong and vivid light upon many of the central problems of psychology. A large portion of Mr. Levy's book, interesting as it is throughout, might have been compiled by any one whose sympathies, either of a philanthropic or a philosophical kind, or whose professional calling by itself might have led him to accumulate facts and figures relative to the blind, their proportion to the population at large, the causes of blindness, whether congenital or assignable to accident or disease, the methods of training and educating the blind, with the respective merits of rival systems of reading, tangible maps, globes, and other adjuncts to imparting knowledge, together with what we may call the literature of blindness—the long list of those who from the earliest times have shown themselves great, wise, and admirable under one of the direst of natural calamities or privations. There would be, we need hardly say, a definite superiority on the side of one who approached this wider province of his task in the full fruition of the bodily senses. We are indeed reminded of the drawback from literary excellence which must needs be imposed where one special faculty is lacking, by the occurrence in the book before us of lapses which the glance of an eye would surely have obviated, a word, or even a line or two, having dropped out here and there, with other failings in the text which lie beyond the pale of ordinary misprints. What, however, on the other hand, we should have looked for in vain from the highest habits of industry and intelligence on the part of "sighted persons," as they are termed by their less privileged fellows, is the statement of such primary facts as spring from the personal consciousness of the blind, and come to us consequently with an authority which is all their own. No part of Mr. Levy's work is of more value or interest than that which treats of the influence of the loss of one sense upon those which remain. It has been doubted, even by those more immediately occupied with matters relating to the blind, how far such a loss is made up by increased power in the remaining senses. From Mr. Levy's mode of approaching the question we infer that he is conscious of a distinction between the total or absolute fund of nervous power possessed by the brain or seat of nerve force, and the relative amount expended in the way of sensitive action. It is evident, he remarks, that a certain amount of nervous power is excited by every action of the mind or body. This being so, it is clear that a sighted man expends more nervous power through the medium of the eye than he does in connexion with the organs of any other sense. "When, however, the sense of sight is wanting, the nervous power usually exerted by it is employed by the other senses." Thus the powers of perception by hearing, touch, &c. enjoyed by a blind man in common with his sighted brethren are more acute than they would be but for this partial privation. This concentration of energy, though it mitigates, cannot indeed wholly compensate for the loss of sight. The special impressions formed by one sense-organ cannot of course be acquired by the use of any other organ. Yet the power or keenness of the remaining organ is actually enhanced by the extra amount of nervous energy thrown upon it. The sense of touch, for instance, can never be cultivated so highly in a man who can see as in one who is blind, for the simple reason that, whereas the nervous power of the man who sees is diffused through five senses, in the sightless it is more concentrated, being diffused only through four senses. This conclusion, we need hardly repeat, is altogether apart from the question whether the total energy possessed or exerted by those who are defective in any sense is on a par with that of those who enjoy the full complement of senses. How much gain of force, to say no more, may there not be of a reflex kind in the impressions formed or the stimulus excited by the contact, through the medium of sense, of the various ranges of external objects corresponding to the different sensitive organs? The relative amount of nervous power, moreover, latent in, or exerted by, the different senses is no doubt far from equal in all. If, then, it is conceded that the highest amount of relative strength or energy belongs to sight, the greater must be the residual degree of force thrown into the action of the other senses when the action of sight is suspended:—

The senses are like five wires radiating from an electric battery, commonly called the brain. These wires, or senses, differ in their capacity for conducting nervous power,—the largest wire, i.e. the sense of sight, carrying and applying perhaps more nervous power than the other four wires or senses combined. If the largest wire be disconnected from the battery, the whole power of the battery is thrown into the four wires; and so when sight is wanting, the whole nervous power of the human system is thrown into the remaining four senses, which gives to them an increased power of development.

* Blindness and the Blind; or, a Treatise on the Science of Typhology. By W. Hanks Levy, F.R.G.S. London: Chapman & Hall. 1872.

The senses of hearing, smell, and sight have been properly called the distant senses; touch and taste the near senses. The former only perceive through the medium of air and light, while the latter act through immediate contact with the objects perceived. Distinct, however, as they are, each in its special sphere, psychology has done much to trace the laws whereby they are fitted to render mutual service to each other, so that, for instance, the perceptions of the eye may be corrected by the touch and other senses. The perception of distance has been shown to result from the correlation of the impressions made by more than that single organ of sense. A wide class of phenomena full of importance to the science of mind is that which has been called the "unrecognized senses." Besides the five senses universally recognized, it is beyond doubt that man possesses certain powers which are neither to be classified among the senses nor among the faculties. Such, for instance, is the power which enables a man to perceive the quality of weight, a power to which has been assigned the name of the muscular sense, or sense of weight. There are, however, further phenomena to which the admission of this sixth sense supplies no explanation. And to some of these facts the peculiar sensitiveness of the blind has enabled our author to refer with a degree of authority which we unreservedly recognize, without feeling bound by his conclusion that they are only to be explained by admitting the existence of "as many senses as there are independent powers of perception in man," seven or eight senses at the least having to be thus recognized. Whether in the house or in the open air, whether walking or standing still, Mr. Levy can tell when he is opposite a solid object, and can discriminate whether it is tall or short, slender or bulky. He can also detect whether it is a solitary object or a continuous fence; whether it is a close fence or composed of open rails, and often whether it is a wooden fence, a brick or stone wall, or a quickset hedge. He cannot usually perceive objects if much lower than his shoulder, but sometimes very low objects can be detected. This, he thinks, may depend upon the nature of the objects or some abnormal state of the atmosphere. The currents of air can have nothing to do with this power, since the state of the wind does not directly affect it. Nor has the sense of hearing anything to do with it, since, when the snow lies thickly on the ground, objects are felt to be more distinct, although the footfall cannot be heard. It seems to him that he perceives objects "through the skin of his face," and has the impression immediately transmitted to the brain. The only part of his body which possesses this power is his face, as he has ascertained by a series of experiments. Stopping his ears does not interfere with it; but covering his face with a thick veil destroys it altogether. None of the five senses having anything to do with the existence of this power, the circumstances he has named induce him to call this unrecognized sense by the name of "Facial Perception." Dr. Saunderson, equally blind, could tell when a cloud obscured the horizon. At one time Mr. Levy could himself do this with great accuracy, but he cannot now trust himself in this respect. Whether long residence in London, "where clouds may be said to be the rule," may account for this he cannot say. He has known many persons totally blind, Mr. Farrow amongst others, who had this power. The presence of fog interferes greatly with facial perception, the impressions of objects being then faint and untrustworthy. The drier the atmosphere the more perfect does experiment show the exercise of this sense to be. Day or night makes no difference to the faculty. When passing along a street Mr. Levy can distinguish shops from private houses, and can even point out the doors and windows, and this whether the doors be shut or open. On one occasion, walking in a lane, this perception enabled him to judge more correctly than the sight of a companion as to the height of a fence between the road and a field. He believes himself to have here a succession of proofs sufficient to establish the existence of a special sense possessed indeed by all, but unrecognized in all but the blind, on account of the all-absorbing claims of the eye. It is likewise, he thinks, of a more secret and subtle nature than any of the other senses.

Now, keen and correct as Mr. Levy has shown himself in the observation of facts, he has obviously fallen into the common fallacy of those who would take for granted the existence of a new cause, while there is nothing all the while in the phenomena observed but what well-known causes are amply adequate to explain. The various impressions of which he is so acutely sensible resolve themselves into nothing more than so many conditions of atmospheric pressure, the delicate surfaces and avenues of sense, abnormally sensitive in the blind, appreciating changes exceedingly slight and transient in the fluid medium in contact with them. In free and open air the impression upon these highly organized and nervous surfaces will be a corresponding feeling of openness and freedom on all sides. Let them now be brought near to a solid and inert body like a wall or paling, and the substitution on one side of so much hard and inelastic matter for the elastic and yielding atmosphere will make itself readily felt. Degrees of hardness, or breaks of continuity in the barriers thus opposed to free circulation, will even become appreciable to an extent sufficient to explain the phenomena which so struck Mr. Levy whenever he took his walks abroad. Everybody must have felt at times the effect produced by an open door even in the stillest room. Similar in kind, however more subtle in degree, must be the effect of a cloud closing in upon and weighing down the atmosphere; the pressure of which, extending in all directions, penetrates to and influences all the tactual organs of the body. The hearing, as such, would not be sensitive to this change of pressure, but the tympanum of the ear would be mechanically affected by it, whilst the general sensation would be most effectively described as distributed over the skin of the face. This exactly corresponds with what Mr. Levy describes as his experience. Hence, too, the importance of a dry and elastic state of the atmosphere. There is not the slightest need for invoking the agency of electricity, as Mr. Levy is inclined to do. He is quite right, we believe, in his conviction that various substances, such as iron, wood, stone, &c., will be found to convey different impressions to the face, and that in close relation to their various degrees of elasticity, just as they are known to differ in their effects upon sound. By the simple suggestion of an intense perception of the interference of solid bodies with the normal elasticity of the air, we may hope to explain the adroit way in which creatures blind as bats in their flight keep clear of walls, trees, and other obstacles. The cultivation of the like faculty has no little to do with the power of the blind to walk alone, though the stick must be in general, and to the less gifted or trained order of sightless walkers, the guide and safeguard of their steps. We note it, by the way, as a subject for national complacency, indicative of superior physical or mental fibre, that the practice of their English compeers in traversing the streets of London without a guide was the cause of much surprise to the blind of Paris, to whom the author mentioned that fact during a visit some years ago. It disappoints us to find Mr. Levy dismissing so summarily as he does, in his remarks upon the sense of touch, all question about the power of the blind to discriminate colours, even the most strongly marked. All that touch can do, he declares, is to distinguish between surfaces; it cannot feel rays of light. And he quotes Sir Charles Bell as equally restricting the capacity of touch in his treatise upon the Hand. As colour makes no alteration in the surface of an object, touch, it is argued, cannot deal with it. Widely spread as the opposite belief has been and is, we are told to look upon it as a fallacy due to impostors or "interested persons." We are sorry that Mr. Levy should have passed without notice the suggestion that latent heat may possibly cause objects the same in material or stuff to differ perceptibly in warmth to a delicate touch according to their difference of hue. It has been held by some within our own knowledge, by seeing persons even, that they could by this test distinguish, at all events, broad differences like those of black and white, or red, yellow, and blue, in substances like silk, cotton, or cloth. The problem is, at all events, one which calls for further experiment and verification, and we should rejoice to see it made the subject of thorough and careful study by one with Mr. Levy's special powers and opportunities both of observation and analysis.

THE HAUNTED HOUSE.*

THE great mine of comic humour to be found in the plays of Plautus has been so little worked by playwrights of modern date that it might repay our dramatists to become more intimately conversant with those masterpieces of plot, dialogue, and lively repartee. And as English scholarship has grown subtler, as well as more general, than it was in the days of Addison and Fielding, there would be this advantage in cultivating such an acquaintance—that the poet's life and spirit might be more thoroughly distilled, if imitators either possessed a competent knowledge of Latin comedy themselves, or had access to as good a translation of Plautus as Hookham Frere has left us of four plays of Aristophanes. Unfortunately Thornton and Warner's Plautus is not equal even to Colman's Terence, and, though generally literal, is seldom as lively a representative of the flavour of the original as is desirable when a translation is the chief medium of knowledge of a given author. Its notes are useful, and its analyses of the plots would be equally so were they not oddly placed at the head instead of the tail of each scene or act. It is liberal in parallels for the aphoristic expressions which play so large and opportune a part in the dialogues of Plautus, as they do indeed in the writings of all great dramatists who have courted the ear of the people. But it is far from coming up to the ideal of a translation, and betrays the handiwork of matter-of-fact workmen in imperfectly reflecting the sparkles of the original wit. No doubt the task is difficult. A more cautious plan is to attempt a single play, as Mr. Strong has done with the Mostellaria, of which the Haunted House is a translation. Engaged in professorial duties in the Scotch University where the late Professor Ramsay brought to bear upon Plautus all the acumen, research, and stores of illustrative information of which his posthumously published Mostellaria is an imperfect memorial, he has put forth the Haunted House as a feeler, and proposes, if it meets encouragement, to follow it up with the Captivi and Miles Gloriosus. One would not willingly discourage so laudable an aim; yet we cannot award unreserved praise to an experimental version which, with many proofs of aptness for the task, combines almost as many drawbacks and errors of taste and judgment. And as the arrangement, introduction, and general getting-up of the book are eminently satisfactory, we have the less hesitation in noting points for avoidance in those which may possibly succeed it.

In the first place, however, we must testify to the clearness with which Mr. Strong has analysed the play in his introduction, and the tact he has shown in noticing, not at too great length, its Danish and English imitations. Fielding's Intriguing Chambermaid will be pulled down from the top shelf and the region of cobwebs to which her free and easy ways have exiled her, and will be re-perused, or perused for the first time, with no detriment to the reputation of our great English humorist. Whereas in Plautus it is a rascally male slave who weaves the web of tricks and lies which it is the business of the dénouement to unravel, in Fielding's farce the rogue is an equally versatile Mrs. Lettice. In the original, the spendthrift Philolaches is a serious character, spoilt by extravagant associates, a reckless mistress, and the absence of parental influence; in the imitation, young Valentine Goodall is a very Charles Surface, though with this great point in his favour, that, in spite of his irregular habits, he has a virtuous attachment for the somewhat yielding and susceptible Charlotte. Each of the spendthrifts, unexpectedly cut short in their mad folly by the return of thrifty merchant fathers from abroad, deputes a "fallax servus" to act as a sort of "buffer" to meet and parry, as best he or she may, their bursts of indignation. Tranio, the Plautine slave, "lies like an angel," and Fielding's female counterpart is no discredit to the representatives of her class on the English stage. The former says of one of his own inventions:—

* The Haunted House. Translated from Plautus. By H. A. Strong, M.A., Oxon, Assistant Professor of Humanity in the University of Glasgow. London: Bentley & Son. 1872.

Calidum hercle audiivi esse optimum mendacium:
Calidum hoc est: etsi procul abest, urit male:

Or, as Mr. Strong translates it, not amiss:—

A lie, like pudding, should be fresh and hot;
I'm burnt by this before it left the pot.

And any reader who does not know how attractive to an audience are the shifts and complications of a lying servant on the stage might realize the fact by seeing a piece, enacted at the end of last year at the Gaiety, called Night and Morning, though in Mr. Dion Boucicault's play the tissue of lies is doubtless a pious fraud. Not so in the Latin play, the plot of which turns on the cheat put upon the perplexed father by his slave's information that his house is shut up because it had been discovered to be haunted by the ghost of a man murdered in it by the last owner. Scarcely is he withdrawn from the doors, which, had they opened to him, would have betrayed his son in mid debauch, when up comes a uaurer, clamorous for payment of the profligate's debt to him. Tranio's ready invention persuades the father that the debt was incurred in order to purchase a new house at a great bargain. But no sooner is the money-lender satisfied than the old man, gulled and delighted by what he deems his son's eye to a profitable investment, wishes to inspect the purchase. The slave contrives on some false pretext to get leave for this from the owner, who is just gone off to the Forum for gossip; and the visit is repeated afterwards in the owner's company, the latter thinking that its object is to get a wrinkle or two for the building of a new mansion, and the father being under the delusion that the owner has sold it to his son against his wishes, and that silence is good taste on a sore subject. Of course "murder will out," and the tissue of lies gets discovered at length by the inopportune appearance and candour of an honest slave coming to fetch home his master, a boon companion of Philolaches. A very comic scene winds up the Latin play, and a scene, too, which could have no exact parallel in a modern piece; for Francis, the rascally slave, takes sanctuary at the horns of the stage altar, and there maintains his effrontery and his principles of self-preservation towards a master who is so sharp as to call forth all the slave's characteristic acuteness. Here is a fair sample, from Mr. Strong's translation, of the word-fence betwixt the two. Theopropides, the father, begins:—

TRA. I want to ask your counsel: do pray rise!
I feel when I am seated far more wise.
Bethink you, too, men hold for most divine
The counsel given from a holy shrine.
THEO. Rise, look me in the face: don't trifle so.
TRA. I'm looking.
THEO. Do you see?
TRA. Indeed I do.
THEO. There's no room for a third when we're together:
He'd starve outright: we're just birds of one feather.

There are very few faults to be found with the Roman play, which would have been undesirably augmented could Dunlop's criticism have been adopted, and the character of Philolaches, the spendthrift with chronic prickings of conscience, "better brought out." As to Fielding's imitation, Mr. Strong is quite right in thinking that he might have made more use of the scene between Sino and Theopropides going over the house at cross purposes, each thinking he is humouring a whim or weakness of the other. The Intriguing Chambermaid, however, carries upon its face the marks of hasty workmanship, and it is hard to conceive so fertile a genius as its author troubling himself to borrow with much precision or formality what he wanted for the nonce from Plautus.

But to recur to Mr. Strong's translation. The first fault to be found with it is the ill-advised use of rhyme throughout the play, the dialogues and soliloquies, as well as the "cantica," being, contrary to the usage of the English drama, all done into rhyming couplets. It is difficult to conceive why the translator has chosen thus to hamper himself, thereby at once abridging his freedom and enhancing the necessity for inexactness, of which there would have been no need had he resorted to the normal dramatic blank verse. In that case it might have been a pleasant relief to find the trochaic tetrameters converted, when they occur, into fifteen-syllable English ballad rhymes, whilst as to the cantica, touching the metrical arrangement of which there is considerable obscurity, great latitude would have been obviously admissible. But it is both tedious and unnatural to have nothing but rhymes, instead of the iambs, trochaics, and other metres of the original; besides which, the translator is by his choice not seldom betrayed into laxity of rendering where there is nothing to be gained by it, and into expletive additions not warranted by the Latin. To take an instance of this last fault. In the sixth scene, where Tranio is palming off his ghost story on the father, the latter asks—

What made you first suspect this horrid deed?

And Tranio's answer—

Your son was dining out, and, as agreed,
At his return we turn'd in for the night—

bears on its face the sign of added words to satisfy the necessities of rhyme. The Latin words, "Abimus omnes cubitum condormivimus" (475), and their context, are utterly destitute of any justification for the inserted words signifying concert or agreement. Not to waste time in more instances of this, we must further take exception to the singularly ill choice of a metre for the representation of the Bacchic tetrameters in which Philolaches, in the second scene, delivers his half-penitent soliloquy. It is all very well so long as Mr. Strong confines himself to octosyllabics, with an occasional variety of decasyllabic and hendecasyllabic lines; but we can only marvel at the taste which can reconcile itself to recasting the mock didactic lines which contain the scapegrace's maudlin confessions and prosings on the errors of youthful inexperience, in the metre of In Memoriam, now for the first time subjected to such an indignity. Indeed, to accommodate himself to the trammels of this metre, he falls into the trap of vagueness and slack translation, as may be seen in the following stanza, where the third line is a very loose rendering of the words "Eatenus abest una fabria," the sense of which is given fairly enough in the French translation, "Dès ce moment l'ouvrier échappe à l'ouvrier":—

The son adopts the man's career
Under some kind relation's eye,
The workman leaves him with a sigh,
He serves his first campaign a year.

Very unsatisfactory, too, is the license which Mr. Strong occasionally takes to leave out, not merely a line or two here and there, but even whole passages—as, for example, from v. 200 to 218 in Bothe's edition, where Philonotium argues with her graceless maid Scapha in favour of confining herself to one lover, Philolaches, who, unperceived, is a listener to the conversation. This scene is so amusing that we may well grudge any retrenchment of it.

We have also to complain of the misconception or slurring of passages which have a fun in them not expressed in this rendering. Thus, in v. 345 (Bothe), at the opening of the scene where Tranio learns that the old merchant has unexpectedly arrived in port, the fun consists in the slave's addressing to the audience the words "Equis homo est, qui facere argenti cupiat aliquantum lucri," and creating a laugh by thus offering a handsome price for a substitute. But this does not at all come out in Mr. Strong's vague line—which we are sure he cannot intend for a literal translation, because he has rendered with considerable neatness the lines immediately following:—

What gains can e'er recoup thee for thy sorrow?

Ubi sunt isti plagiarii, ferritribaces viri,
Vel isti qui trium numerum causa subeunt sub falsis, Ubi aliqui quindenis hastis corpus transdigi solent?
Where are those gallow-birds whose total gains
Ne'er pay their masters for their cost in chains?
Or those who for three coppers scale a breach,
And sell their lives for just three spear-wounds each?

Mr. Strong needs to be reminded that his renderings of Plautus ought to be as clear and palpable as he can make them, and that for example, it is begging the question of the meaning of the poet's adage, Tam facile vincer, quam pium vulpes comest (543), to render it "You'll win the day that Reynard eats a pear." Of course he may mean to take the proverb as expressing an impossibility, although if, as in Theocr. i. 49, foxes can take an interest in ripe grapes, so can they in pears. For our part we cannot see how the proverb can refer to aught but the facility of the process of arbitration proposed in the context by Tranio. Something might be said of positive blunders which occur here and there—e.g., vv. 879-885, where Phnicus, a well-disposed slave, complains of his worthless fellow-servants that—is their reply. Now Mr. Strong ought to know from Terence and Plautus the technical meaning of "advorsum ire" (see v. 913, "ei advorsum venimus") far too well to render those words—

Ubi adeorum ut cant
Vocantur hero—non eo: molestus ne sis

Say they're bid to go an errand; be the message from their lord;
"I am busy," you may hear them say, or else, "I can't be bored."

It is impossible to avoid the conclusion that he mistakes the sense of "advorsum ire hero"—i.e., "fetching home a master"—and that he takes "hero" for an ablative, if he thinks at all about the Latin. It is equally surprising that in scene xv. he should translate "orator" "a suppliant," in the words "sum orator datus," when obviously the meaning is an "ambassador," which we know from Virgil to be its frequent sense. That Mr. Strong is capable of better and more sustained work is evident from his management of many of the best passages in this play. He has done very well Sino's contradiction of Tranio's statement that his house is a cool one (vv. 743-8):—

Nay, the reverse is true: though shade abound
In every corner else, here Sol is found From morning until eve—sure never than
Was so perennial as my friend the sun;
My well's the only shady corner here,
But e'en that this is cool I wouldn't swear.

The line "quasi flagitator adstat usque ad ostium" is capitally turned in the words we have italicized; and, in default of a better rendering of Tranio's immediate rejoinder, a topographical pun which needed an Italian audience to appreciate it—Mr. Strong's attempt,

Quid Sarcinatis equa est, si Umbram non habes—

Well, if you have a well you can't want better, is kept in countenance by similar hits in our pantomimes and burlesques. Had we space, we should like to extract a page or so of the toilet scene, at which Philoaches is an cavesdropper. It is a locus classicus touching ancient unguents and cosmetics, and is represented with considerable life and spirit, as well as truth to the original. Failing that, we must conclude with a passage from the scene from which our last extract was taken, as a specimen of the translator's lively presentation of the impudence of Tranio, who avails himself of his self-chosen office of showman of Sino's house to impose upon his old master's failing sight:—

THU. The more I'm pleased. The more I look
TRA. See yonder, how one rook
Is plucking, turn by turn, yon vulture pair.
Look straight at me; you'll find the rook is there.
Say, do you see it?
THU. I can't say I do,
TRA. Then can you see the vultures nearer you?
THU. To cut it short, I see no bird at all;
There are no paintings all along the wall.
TRA. Your sight is fading as your years increase:
So, never mind! Alas! no excuses, please.

If he will but correct and amend a few shortcomings, we shall be glad to see Mr. Strong again representing the "durus pater" and "fallax servus" to English readers.

ROMAN CATHOLIC TESTIMONIES ON THE PAPACY.*

THREE little volumes, issued within the last few months, are before us, differing considerably in their tone, their purpose, and the details of their subject-matter, but all by Roman Catholic writers, and all bearing on the claims and action of the Papacy. The first is by an Italian monk, who wishes to prove that the sole guarantee for the freedom and security of the Church and the rights of the Episcopate lies in the supreme and infallible jurisdiction of the Pope; the second is by a French Abbé, who declares that the Episcopate is annihilated and the whole constitution of the Church revolutionized by the modern pretensions of Rome; while, in the third, Mr. Lowry Whittle, an Irish Roman Catholic already favourably known by his contributions to the literature of the Irish education question, pointedly contrasts "Catholicism" with "the Vatican." The external observer is irresistibly tempted to exclaim under such circumstances, "Who shall decide when doctors disagree?" Our present aim is not so much to pronounce a decision as to indicate the force and extent of the divergence. Had such criticisms on the first of these three works as are incidentally supplied by the other two been made by a Protestant writer, they would have been at once set down to ignorance or malice, and cited as a fresh evidence of the utter incompetence of those without the fold to comprehend the simplest elements of Catholic truth. But such a verdict can hardly be hazarded on the strictures of a French priest and doctor of divinity and of an Irish Catholic layman. France is the eldest daughter of the Church, and Ireland has always prided herself on the immaculate purity of her faith. Let us hear then what our three witnesses have to tell us, and how far their testimony agrees.

Father Tondini, to do him justice, writes with calmness and precision, and is commendably free from the abusive rhetoric so common with controversialists. He is anxious to establish the immense superiority of the Roman system to that of the Russian Orthodox Communion, which is "undeniably as much enslaved as a Church possibly can be," the legislative and administrative functions being concentrated in the hands of the Czar, who is "Supreme Judge," and even "Head of the Church." He broadly hints that the Russian is as completely subjected to the civil power as the English Church, except that the Czar has hitherto disclaimed any right of interference with doctrine; and he dwells especially on the subjection of the Russian as contrasted with the independence of the Catholic bishops, and on the instability of faith and discipline in a Church liable at any moment to revolutions as much as any secular State. The sole and sufficient preservative against these dangers and abuses is intimated in the title of his work, the Pope of Rome and the Eastern Popes. There is no alternative, he assures us, but "Catholicism or revolution"; or, in other words, "the Pope is the only authority able to preserve the Church from enslavement and revolutions"—by him alone "can the jurisdiction of the bishops be effectually supported"; and, strangely enough, he refers, in evidence of this, to the decree of the Vatican Council, which has been generally represented, not as supporting, but supplanting, episcopal rights. The Council, he observes, merely expressed "an elementary truth and a patent fact" when it declared that the authority of bishops is strengthened by the assertion of the Pope's prerogative of ordinary and immediate jurisdiction in every diocese of Christendom. We are not going to enter here on any discussion of the condition of the Russian Church. Many systems present a very different appearance on paper from what is exhibited in their practice, and probably an advocate of "orthodoxy" would have a good deal to urge at least in arrest of judgment. Our present concern, however, is not with the Russian Church, but the Roman, in whose constitution and actual working Father Tondini sees a perfect example of the freedom, independence, and immutable security of faith and discipline, wherein the Oriental Churches are so fatally deficient. There at least the bishops are not nominal but real chiefs and heads of the Church, ruling in all the fulness of apostolic authority; there no lay power dares to interfere with ecclesiastical independence, and no revolution is possible. Be it so. We offer no comment of our own, but we propose to call attention to the fact that there is certainly some conflict of testimony on the subject.

Let us now turn to Dr. Michaud's Guignol et la Révolution dans l'Eglise romaine, where, curiously enough, the very title flatly contradicts one main item of Father Tondini's contention, and the very first section as emphatically contradicts the rest of it. The Pope alone secures the authority of the Episcopate, and excludes the intrusion of laymen into the government of the Church. So says Tondini. But Dr. Michaud begins by telling us how Lamennais, in his work of 1814 on the Institution of Bishops, bitterly attacked those "despots who thought to stifle truth by their decrees and their dungeons," while he soon afterwards welcomed with enthusiasm De Maistre's work on the absolute monarchy of the Pope. To Lamennais has succeeded Veillot, a layman like De Maistre, who seems to have effected all, and more than all, that the Russian Czars are accused of in the way of degrading the Episcopate and revolutionizing the Church. So at least we infer from the following trenchant passage:—

Autant Veillot a varié en politique, autant tous les rois, que détestait Lamennais, autant il lui est resté fidèle dans sa haine contre l'épiscopat et dans sa théorie de la suprématie absolue du pape. Complètement dépourvu de théologie, simple prophète gouailleux, Veillot avait sur Lamennais et sur Dom Guéranger l'avantage de n'être point embarrassé dans ses contremarches et ses promesses par le poids du savoir: aussi mena-t-il à bonne fin l'œuvre que Lamennais seul n'eût pas réussi, malgré tout son génie paradoxal, à accomplir. C'est lui qui fut vraiment le tueur d'évêques; les autres ne furent que des maîtres de chasse et des sonneurs de cor. Sa méthode est de ne pas raisonner, d'injurier, de faire peur à son adversaire, et de faire rire la galerie. La est tout son art et tout son secret. . . . Il faut lire certains articles de 1840, et voir la façon mystérieuse et dégradée dont Messieurs de l'Unives traitaient déjà les évêques de France, d'Allemagne et d'Angleterre. Autant ils ont été circonspects à l'égard du parti qui voulait réduire l'autorité épiscopale au bénéfice du clergé du second ordre, autant ils étaient animés, excessifs, violents, envers ceux qui, comme Lamennais, voulaient imposer cette même autorité à l'autorité suprême de la papauté. A la fin, les évêques, qui n'étaient pas précisément des héros malgré le caractère qui leur avait été conféré, sentirent leur croquer trembler dans leurs mains. Déjà en mai 1852, Mgr. Dupanloup ne craignait pas de se plaindre hautement en ces termes: "Tous les évêques ont pu entrevoir par là, comment serait traité désormais quiconque, parmi eux, se permettrait, dans les questions les plus graves et les plus importantes pour la religion, de penser autrement que les redoutables de l'Unives." Et depuis 1852, quo n'est-il pas passé! La terreur blanche exercée par Veillot et son parti a fait de lui et de ses hommes de véritables puissances. Après avoir tremblé devant eux, évêques et fidèles les ont invoqués, leur ont demandé la lumière, et surtout se sont soumis à leur décision.

Puis, les évêques une fois anéantis, Veillot et ses hommes ont anéanti l'épiscopat. Ce dernier coup a été l'œuvre du concile du Vatican, qui lui-même a été l'œuvre de Veillot et de ses hommes, à l'exclusion totale de l'Esprit-Saint.

And this, adds the author, "was only the beginning of the revolution." In several successive chapters he gives us extracts from synodical and episcopal decrees, severely condemning Veillot and his doctrines, among which a pastoral of Mgr. Guibert, the present Archbishop of Paris, stands first. The bishops, however, could not hold their own against their lay censor, and another chapter under the startling title, "Le maudit devenu pape; l'épiscopat aux pieds de M. Veillot et de son parti," explains how, while Pius IX. is titular Pope, "the true Pope, who holds the threads of Jesuit and Cardinalial administration and of the Roman Congregations in his hands, is Master Veillot," who observed during the Council, with characteristic modesty, "Pour moi, je ne m'en irai qu'avec mon dogme dans ma poche." The poor dogma, observes Michaud, was badly lodged, but on the principle of cuique suum it was the right place for it. It is a fact, we believe, that Veillot exercises a terrorism over the French clergy infinitely greater than the Pope and all the bishops put together. In a concluding chapter the author describes the Ultramontanism as "revolutionaries in the Church," and again quotes Mgr. Guibert's condemnation of Veillot for conducting society to an "abyss," preparing "a great apostasy," and labouring to substitute for legitimate obedience servility to superiors and revolt against the laws, while Dupanloup characterized his Ultramontanism as "an outrage on authority." And, finally, we are informed, in words which could hardly have been more explicit if they were aimed directly against Tondini's rose-coloured representation, "In the Roman Catholicism of 1872 the former Catholicism no longer exists. The revolution is actually in the Roman Catholic Church. Such is the simple fact."

* The Pope of Rome and the Popes of the Oriental Orthodox Church. By the Rev. C. Tondini, Barnabite. London: Longmans. 1871.

Guignol et la Révolution dans l'Eglise romaine. Par M. l'Abbé E. Michaud. Paris. 1872.

Catholicism and the Vatican. By J. Lowry Whittle, A.M. London: King & Co. 1872.

No two writers could well be more unlike in style and in their intellectual build than the fervid French ecclesiastic and the calm but incisive author of Catholicism and the Vatican. Yet there is a singular unanimity in their conclusions. Mr. Whittle thus defines the practical gravity of the crisis:—

An eminent Irish member delighted his Catholic supporters some time since by bidding men who talked about Ultramontanism talk about Mesopotamia; one term was as much to the purpose as the other, the fluent orator contended. This sort of language only echoed the general sentiment of Catholic society. Now, however, it is very plain that, for those who care about Catholic truth, Ultramontanism is a very pressing matter. If that is the true form of Catholicity which Ireland has hitherto been without, our boast that we have always maintained the faith is unfounded, and the claims of Ireland to Catholicity have to be reconsidered. If Ultramontanism is not true, then every Catholic must feel it is his duty to lift his voice against it, to do what in him lies to testify to the truth, and to protect the faith of our people.

And then, after giving in English the text of the two Vatican decrees on the infallibility of the Pope and his "full and supreme, ordinary and immediate, jurisdiction over the universal Church, and over all and every Church, and every pastor and every believer," he subjoins the following very pertinent comment, in which we have italicized the few crucial words which contain a direct, though of course unconscious, challenge to Father Tondini:—

The first of these dogmas destroys at once the whole theory of the episcopacy. Each bishop becomes only the local agent of the Pope. Greatly as the Pope's authority over the bishops had grown in the latter times of the Church, the bishop still took the oath of fidelity to the Pope, with the clause salvo meo ordine. He had distinct rights in the Church as a member of the episcopacy claiming to represent the apostles; and his obedience to the Pope was regulated by the canon law. The ordinarius potestas, or power of the bishop, was the authority to which each priest or layman was immediately subject in religious matters. Now every priest and layman is subject to the Pope directly; the Pope's power extends over pastor and believer.

The practical effect of this first part of the Vatican decree is greater than that of the following section. The sweeping away with the consent of the episcopacy of the whole constitution of the Latin Church, is one of the most remarkable facts the modern historian could record. All the rights and privileges of separate orders in the Church are abolished. All the customs of local or national churches, the relations of the parish priest to his flock, to his bishop, of the bishops to each other, of the various national Churches to the Papacy; the whole canon law which elaborately regulated all these relations; all these institutions of the Church have only a significance so far as the Pope may permit in each particular case. According to this dogma, those who for so many centuries relied on the canon law as a limitation of the power of the Pope, as a guarantee of special rights of bishops and of priests, and of local churches, were violating the ordinances of God.

Tondini, it may be remembered, allowed that the Czar held himself bound by the dogmatic, though not the disciplinary, Canons of the ancient Councils. Mr. Whittle shows that henceforth neither can bind the Pope. And as to tradition and episcopal authority, he points out that the new dogmas have been carried in the very teeth of the unanimous teaching of the Irish bishops and the belief of their flocks for centuries. The doctrine of Papal infallibility, he says, was never thought of as an article of faith in Ireland before the meeting of the Vatican Assembly, never hinted at in catechisms or devotional manuals, and was known to the Catholic people only as a calumny, put forward by Protestant misapprehension or prejudice to prevent their attaining their civil rights. The greatest ornament of the Irish Episcopate in this century, Bishop Doyle, always regarded the Church as "an organization constituted by law," and expressly stated to the Parliamentary Committee who examined him in 1825 that the Papal power was "limited by decrees of Councils and by usage," and that "if the Pope directs any decree respecting local usage to any nation beyond the limits of the Papal territory, the assent of the bishops of such country is necessary in order that the decree should have effect;" which flatly contradicts the new dogma on the Pope's universal episcopate. Archbishop Kelly of Tuam affirmed still more explicitly before the same Committee that "if Bulls or Rescripts emanating from the Pope contained doctrines or matters not compatible with the discipline of the particular Church to which they may be addressed," the bishops were bound to reject them; which implies also a denial of Papal infallibility. These and similar statements of Irish and English bishops were quoted in the Vatican Synod by Bishop Clifford, with the obvious comment that Catholics would be held to have violated honour and good faith if they now proclaimed doctrines which they had obtained their civil rights by expressly and formally repudiating. Mr. Whittle adds that his Catholic fellow-countrymen laughed at the notion of Papal infallibility, which they had always been taught to disbelieve, being made an article of faith, till "by degrees a faint echo of the Letters of Quirinus made its way to Ireland," and, "when at length the course of affairs at the Vatican became clear beyond all doubt, they gave way to a feeling very like dismay."

We cannot follow the author through his graphic and laud sketch of the Catholic movement in Germany and of the Munich Congress, at which he was present; but we may cordially recommend his book to all who wish to follow the course of the movement. It has a special interest on another ground also. With the exception of a striking article on the movement by "a Liberal Catholic," in the current number of the Theological Review, it is the first public protest against the Vatican decrees we have seen emanating from a British Roman Catholic, and certainly the first appearing under the author's name. That he has given expression to a sentiment very general among his countrymen seems evident, and we shall be curious to observe whether Cardinal Cullen succeeds in crushing out the traditional faith of Irish Catholics, and achieving for Pius IX. that conquest over their spiritual rights which Adrian IV. effected over their civil independence. Mr. Whittle prints in his appendix the remarkable Bull of Adrian assigning Ireland to Henry II., on condition of an annual payment of one penny from every house, by virtue of the undoubted "dominion of St. Peter and the Holy Roman Church over all islands on which the Sun of Justice hath shone."

THE ROSE AND THE KEY.*

THE sunset of the opening chapter of a novel often gives as much mystical lore as the sunset of life, and quite as much favours coming events in casting their shadows before. If the sun as it sinks casts a faint yellow light over tower and tree, if the wind is rising and soon begins to "sough" in a melancholy way, if the rain comes down and brings down the dead leaves with it, then, even if the heroine is not yet born, still we know that she will be consumptive, and towards the end of the third volume will leave the hero disconsolate. If, on the contrary, the evening is fair and the sun goes down in glory, if the wind has fallen and the summer leaves scarcely rustle, we know that, even if troubles and dangers have to be surmounted, nevertheless the story will close with a marriage, and only the wicked people will be killed. We must confess, however, that we found our skill at fault when we tried to draw from Mr. Le Fanu's opening chapter any augury of the probable course of his story. The sun behaved in a most inconsiderate manner, and was almost as confusing as the plot of The Rose and the Key. What could we make of a "summer sunset with a melancholy flush," "a sea-green sky flecked with faint crimson," "mists of sunset," "golden light which catches the tip of the nose and chin" of an old lady, "piles of flaming cloud," "solen purple shadow," "faint green and yellow sky," "streaks of purple vapour, and the fading crimson and scarlet fires of sunset," and "ominous piles of cloud, black against the now fast-fading sky"? The "melancholy flush" was certainly portentous of evil, but "the golden light on the tip of nose and chin," gazed upon as it was by the heroine, seemed to bring hope with it. In the "ominous piles of cloud" we saw, however, that mischief portended, and we inferred, and rightly, that the heroine would have a dreadful time of it, even if she were destined to reach happiness and the "hymeneal altar" in the end. In the thunderstorm that followed close upon the sunset, the lightning, or rather its "wild reflection," behaved in a most irregular and uneloquent manner, for it actually "flickered on trees and fields." Does Mr. Le Fanu know what is the meaning of the word "flicker," or does he happen never to have seen a thunderstorm? While the lightning was flickering, the rain was "whacking the pavement below all over," "while a sleek, lean man, lantern-jawed," with one eye, was dogging the heroine's footsteps. Men are not often sleek and lean at the same time, but no doubt the combination of contradictory peculiarities only rendered this one-eyed monster more odious still. No wonder the heroine exclaims, as she gazes upon him, "I tell you, cousin, I have a presentiment that some misfortune impends. I suppose there is a crisis in every one's life; the astrologers used to say so. God send me safely through mine." By the time the misfortune is ready to come upon her, and the crisis is reached, the sunset speaks in an unmistakable way, and gives her the plainest of warnings; and though there was neither flickering lightning, nor whacking rain, nor the sleek, lean, one-eyed man to increase the horrors of the scene, yet the boldest of heroines might well have had misgivings. But Mr. Le Fanu shall make the sun set in his own words:—

It is a strange, wild, ominous sunset. Long floods of clear saffron flush into faint flame, and deep purple masses, like piles of battle-smoke, load the pale sea of green above. The sun dives into its abyss of fire. Black clouds, like girdling rocks, with jagged edges dazzling as flame, encircle its descent with the yawn of a crater, and, high in air, watered flecks of cloud, like the fragments of an explosion, hang splendouring the fading sky with tongues of fire. The sun is now quite down; all is gradually darkening. The smoke is slowly rolling and subsiding, and the crater stretches up its enormous mouth, and breathes out a blood-red vapour that overpreads the amber sky, and mists the sinking masses; and so the vaporous scenery fades and blackens, leaving on Maud's mind a vague sense of the melancholy and portentous.

The sun, no doubt, made a great effort on this occasion; for it does not happen every day that it sets upon a heroine who is heir to "one hundred and fifty thousand pounds a year in land, and a great deal of money besides," and yet, in the full possession of her senses, is being hurried off to a lunatic asylum. After all, if in our descriptions of scenery we are to use words, we do not know why we should not use as long words as our dictionaries supply, and if we are to give our heroines fortunes, we do not know why we should not go as far in our numbers as our knowledge of

* The Rose and the Key. By J. Sheridan Le Fanu. 3 vols. London: Chapman & Hall.

Cocker allows. We feel grateful to Mr. Le Fanu for the excellent and noble company in which he keeps us. We delight in their titles, in their aristocratic names, and their vast estates. We rejoice in having Lord Warhampton's only son, the Honourable Charles Marston, for our hero, and Miss Maud Guendoline Vernon, Sir Amyrald Vernon's heiress, for our heroine. We delight in "the grand Elizabethan structure—broad, florid, built of white stone, yellowed and many-tinted by time," in which so many of the scenes pass, and we delight also in the good county families of ancient name which visit there. Many of us in actual life suffer so cruelly from the vulgar names which we inherit from our sires, that in our fictions at least we may fairly expect to be allowed to forget our vexations. Which of us after all would not far more enjoy the History of a Foundling if the hero of the story had been christened, not Tom Jones, but Amyrald Vernon? We see in every suburb of London the eagerness with which we all try to throw a halo of gentility round our very homes, and though we are spoiling everywhere our country lanes by turning them into roads or streets, yet we find some compensation by giving them a high-sounding name. We remember a village where once there long raged a furious contest over a Hanger Lane. It was all in vain for a time that the more respectable portion of the inhabitants showed how painful it was to their feelings and how injurious to their position to live in a lane whose name seemed in some remote manner associated with the extreme penalty of the law. At length vulgarity was defeated, and the respectable inhabitants no longer now with faltering accents give their address, but with confidence proclaim themselves as dwelling in St. Ann's Road.

But we must return from the digression into which our admiration for Mr. Le Fanu's big people and big names has led us. The plot of this story, as we have already said, is most confusing. There are two mysterious marriages, and a mysterious will, and a mysterious deed, and a mysterious monument, and a mysterious son, and a mysterious one-eyed man, and a mysterious two-eyed man, "a swarthy little gentleman, with wooden features and black wig," and a mysterious mad doctor, whose yet more mysterious eyes had "a power of indescribable coercion," and a mysterious phantom, and lastly there is a great deal of the most mysterious talk. Lady Vernon, the heroine's mother, is wrapped up in mystery. Just as the doctor exercises a mesmeric effect on every one by his "baleful eyes," so she by her "clouded dark eyes," or her "sturdy grey eyes," or her "dark cold eyes," scarcely allows her own daughter to breathe. This poor young lady has a sad time of it, and what with the doctor, what with her mother, and what with the one-eyed man, goes as nearly mad as a heroine may. Happily the little gentleman with the black wig proves more than a match for the baronet's widow, the mad doctor, and the one-eyed man; and altogether, unlike the reader, knowing what the story is all about, and what particular crime every one has committed, he is able to defeat this combination of people with remarkable eyes, and to rescue the heroine. We notice, by the way, that Mr. Le Fanu never allows this little gentleman to enter upon the scene without drawing attention to the fact that he brings "his wooden features and his black wig" with him. Apparently he can so far trust his readers' imagination as to leave it to them to supply the other parts of his body and the other articles of his wardrobe. In his love of assigning to each person an epithet, he is, indeed, somewhat Homeric. Even his very footmen are never footmen simply, but are "tall footmen in their blue and gold liveries." We like this, however; we begin to feel, as the story goes on, and as the heroine gets into a more and more desperate position, that if the devotion of old family retainers, in spite of their "blue and gold liveries," cannot avail her, yet in those wooden features and under that black wig lies a secret power which will in due time defeat the machinations of all the eyes in the world. We are not disappointed. The Commissioners in Lunacy had given in their report that the heroine was undoubtedly mad, the wicked mad doctor felt sure of his five thousand a year for her maintenance, the remorseless mother seemed to have gained her mysterious end, and the end of the third volume was alarmingly near, when, in a moment, by the little gentleman, with the help no doubt of his wooden features and his black wig, the doors of the asylum are thrown open, the doctor is exposed and ruined, and the mother is killed off by heart disease. At the same time, with convenient promptitude, the Honourable Charles Marston's noble father goes to join his ancestors, and allows Maud Guendoline Vernon to become Lady Warhampton. The one-eyed man had been previously tried for perjury, and a wicked distant cousin of Maud's, who as a county magistrate had signed the certificate for her reception in the asylum, is not only disappointed of getting a share of the great Vernon property, but is reduced to what, in Mr. Le Fanu's novels, is absolute destitution. Of all his estates he has nothing left him "except the Grange and a rental of seven hundred a year." No wonder he retires to France, refuses to see his own daughter, and has "a slight paralytic attack." We are glad that Mr. Le Fanu is content with merely giving him a slight attack, and does not at great length kill him off. We have before noticed in reviewing his novels the bad taste he always shows in deathbed scenes, and the pleasure he has in dwelling on that which to any but the most vulgar of medical students is so repulsive. All other writers, however much they dwell on the dying hours, yet have decency enough to leave the corpse alone. Mr. Le Fanu, on the contrary, like those women who perform the saddest and most revolting of all offices, thinks that when the breath is out it is then that his special duties begin. Why, when he has used his finest and silliest of writing in killing off Lady Vernon, must he go on to say?—

The great and faultless Lady Vernon is by this time cooling and stiffening; rapidly, on the sofa, a shawl over her feet, her head propped with the pillow, and something under her chin to close her mouth.

Surely he might have stopped where he tells us how the "awful Lady Vernon" dropped down dead, and how the gold-mounted ink-bottle lies on its side on the rich table-cover, as it were in a swoon, and bleeding ink profusely, quite neglected.

If anything can be said to bleed ink profusely, it must surely be Mr. Le Fanu's pen, and we can only wish that some means could be found to stop the hæmorrhage. In former days cauterization was found to be a rough but not an ineffectual means. Against this, however, we fear both it and he would be proof. So long as there are vulgar readers there will be vulgar writers, and, in spite of School Boards and compulsory education, many a day must pass away before there will be any cessation in the demand and the supply of foolish and offensive stories. It will not perhaps be too much to ask that for the future, if Mr. Le Fanu wishes to display his classical learning, he will first refresh his memory of Henry's First Latin Book. He will there find that, if in nothing else, he is original at all events in assigning tondere to the third conjugation. Dr. Automarchi may have been "a brilliant rogue," but he showed himself scarcely worthy of his mesmeric eye when he selected as his motto Tondit oves.

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

UPS and Downs on Land and Water* is the title of a series of rough, but very clever, sketches of European travel, after the pattern of "Brown, Jones, and Robinson" and some other "Tours" with which our readers are sufficiently familiar, but on a larger scale, with more at once of truth and humour, and with less extravagance of caricature. Most of the scenes, and many of the faces, are evidently and avowedly real, and have names attached to them—a liberty which in some instances amounts to wanton and offensive impertinence. Not only are the names of inns and so forth correctly given at the foot of several caricatures, but at Ober-Ammergau the hospitality of Joseph Mair is repaid by a caricature of the bedroom in which he accommodated the travellers, and by rude, but characteristic, portraits of Mair himself (who filled the part of Christ in the Passion Play) and of the John, Judas, and Peter, as well as several other incidental sketches. The artist's touch is bold, and his drawings are full of life and character; and, if names had been omitted, while his book would have lost nothing of its realistic interest, we should have been able to enjoy it without any sense of self-reproach or displeasure.

Our readers have already heard of Mr. Stephen Pearl Andrews and his new science of "Universology" (see Saturday Review, October 14, 1871), and therefore it may be enough to say of the Basic Outline of Universology† that it is such a work as its title suggests. It is a heavy treatise on a general scheme of so-called science devised by the author, chokeful of novel terminology and of old words with new technical senses assigned to them. As we cannot pretend to the slightest acquaintance with the language in which the book is written—it is not, we presume, the Alwato tongue mentioned in the title-page, inasmuch as the words which connect the different technical terms are English—we may be utterly wrong in fancying that the author has adopted some modern form of Pythagorean mysticism; but the stress which he lays on the relations and importance of numbers, on the antagonism and mutual exclusion of "unism" and "dualism," &c., suggests some such interpretation of what may, on the other hand, for aught we know, be wholly original and simply absolute nonsense.

Mr. Ben. E. Green‡ translates for the benefit of American readers a work published by M. A. Granier de Cassagnac in 1838 respecting the history of the working and burgher classes; upon which we shall only observe that neither author nor translator appears to have the slightest suspicion that Platarch is not a trustworthy authority for the earliest history of Greece, or that the Lycurgian legislation is not as distinctly and certainly historical as that of Justinian or Napoleon. The only part of the work with which we are here concerned is the preface, in which the translator claims an intimate knowledge of the secret counsels of President Lincoln, and declares that the latter was induced to issue the Emancipation Proclamation much against his own will, and actually offered that, if the South would resume her old position in the Union, she might appeal to the Supreme Court to set it aside as unconstitutional (which it unquestionably was), and that the several States should be at liberty to reject the * Ups and Downs on Land and Water. By Augustus Hopkin. Boston: Osgood & Co. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1871.

† The Basic Outline of Universology: An Introduction to the newly discovered Science of the Universe; its Elementary Principles, and the First Stages of their Development in the Special Sciences, together with Preliminary Notices of Alwato (ahl-wah-to), the newly discovered Scientific Universal Language, resulting from the Principles of Universology. By Stephen Pearl Andrews, Member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, the American Ethnological Society, the New York Liberal Club, &c., Author of the "Science of Society," &c. &c. New York: Dion Thomas. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

‡ History of the Working and Burgher Classes. By M. Adolphe Granier de Cassagnac. Paris, France, A.D. 1838. Translated by Ben. E. Green, of Dalton, Whitfield Co., Georgia. Philadelphia: Claxton, Remondet, & Haffelfinger. London: Trübner & Co.

Constitutional Amendment by which the North had sought to give validity to it. Whether Mr. Lincoln did really play fast and loose in this way with the rights of the States, with his own word and his public duty, and with the hopes and safety of the negro race, we cannot pretend to judge. But there can scarcely be a doubt that his death was the crowning misfortune of the South; that, had he lived, he would have offered terms at least as favourable as those proposed by Mr. Johnson, and would have had the power which his successor had not to enforce the fulfilment of those terms by Congress. It has seldom, if ever, happened that a political assassination has in the end profited the party in whose interest it was committed; and assuredly the murder of Mr. Lincoln—in which no Southerner was concerned—was one of those crimes which rank among the worst and most fatal of blunders.

The Transactions of the American Philological Association* for 1869-70 contain little that belongs to the higher regions of philological science (except a paper by Professor Whitney on the Origin of Language, setting forth the present condition of the question among scientific inquirers), and very little of special interest. Three papers—"On the best Mode of Studying the North American Languages," on Algonkin and on Creole Grammar, alone possess a certain local character and speciality.

The first number of the Journal of the American Anthropological Institute† deserves mention as an indication of a growing interest in the science, as well as for the information it contains regarding the sculptured rocks of Ohio, and other traces of a very ancient human occupation of the Mississippi Valley, perhaps at a time when much of the present North American continent was under water.

The interest that belongs to the New York Insurance Reports‡ depends chiefly upon the evidence they afford of the substantial value of the protection afforded to insurers by the legislation of the Empire State. We have in these volumes a very full and detailed statement of the accounts of every one of the Insurance Companies of the State; accounts which it is, no doubt, possible to falsify to some extent, but which nevertheless cannot but afford considerable assistance to a prudent and observant insurer, and the necessity of publishing which must be a powerful check on deliberate fraud. Nor is this the only benefit which the public derives from the stricter laws of America. These accounts pass through the hands of an officer whose special business is to keep a watch upon the proceedings of the Companies, and in the present Report there is a narrative of the measures by which he detected the insolvent condition of one Company, and compelled it to close its offices and wind up its business. In England it might have received premiums and robbed widows and orphans for many a long year to come.

The Report of the Board of State Charities §, Massachusetts, also contains a good deal of curious and useful information. The peculiar relation of the American States to charities of every description, from hospitals and almshouses to reformatories and penitentiaries—some of which are mainly supported by public funds, others receiving either a fixed subscription or an allowance proportioned to services rendered—gives the State a right of supervision and control which it can only obtain in this country by a forcible interference with private property. The Board through which its powers are exercised reports upon the condition of a great variety of institutions, and recommends the legislative changes which appear necessary to render their working satisfactory. In the present instance the Secretary takes occasion to defend the public lunatic asylums of the State from charges somewhat similar to those preferred against private asylums in a book that we lately noticed; but his argument only goes to show that the State asylums have no motive for detaining persons unduly or treating them harshly—no one ever said they had—and does not touch the strongest and most probable of the complaints made by the author of Behind the Bars. In another portion of his Report he comments with a vigour and frankness characteristic of American officials on the abuse of the power of pardon entrusted to the Governor of the State. We can easily conceive how a similar system would work in England, if, for example, the prerogative of mercy were exercised, not by the Sovereign on the advice of a Minister responsible to Parliament, but by the Lord-Lieutenant of Counties, subject at most to the necessity of laying their reasons before a Council elected by the ratepayers. The State is so small a community, the Governor is so little raised above the rest of the community, often so near to the criminal and to his friends, that it is scarcely possible for him to exert an independent judgment, to shake himself free from personal sympathies and local influences, or to withstand the pressure that may be put upon him by a numerous body of petitioners. We have seen too much of the weakness and want of intelligible principle which characterize the decisions of a Home Secretary, who is for the most part raised above all possibility of the most indirect personal interest in the fate of a prisoner or the feelings of his friends, and too remote to be influenced by local feelings, to have any difficulty in believing that the exercise of a similar power by a gentleman living as it were in the county town, holding office for a short period, unprotected by any high social dignity, and dependent on party for his future position, must be capricious, lax, and dangerous in the extreme. Our only surprise in reading the Report is that the mischief has been confined within such moderate limits, and has not wholly nullified the deterrent effect of the penal code.

Two volumes of a small series published by Messrs. Putnam of New York contain a good deal of interesting information in a condensed form and in popular language respecting ordinary food* and the different stimulants† in use in different parts of the world. Dr. Beard takes, in both cases, the conservative or common-sense view, and condemns the vegetarians and similar theorists on the one hand, and the prohibitionists on the other. Concerning food, his little volume gives us all the familiar facts as to the consumption of different kinds of nutriment, the various functions performed by them in nourishing and supporting the animal frame, the manner of their digestion and assimilation, their chemical constituents, and their relations to the vital powers; and notes here and there some facts not so generally recognized—as, for example, the consumption of butter, oil, and other fatty substances in tropical as well as in Arctic climates. If his book has a fault requiring notice, it is that he now and then lays down a rule of somewhat questionable authority without sufficiently warning his readers that it is not universally acknowledged. The little treatise on stimulants and narcotics will probably draw on its author a storm of invective from the prohibitionists of every sect; for, without exaggerating the value or underrating the abuse of alcohol, it brings out those facts which tend most conclusively to show that both stimulants and narcotics answer to a real want of human life. It describes the immense variety of such substances independently discovered and used by nations the most remote in local habitation and the most diverse in race, usages, and civilization; the wines of Southern Europe, the spirits prepared from corn in the North, the barley beer of England, and the maize beer of North America; the coffee of Arabia, the tea of China, the opium and hashish of Turkey, the coca of South America, the various kinds of liquor prepared from vegetable juices in every quarter of the globe. It relates instances in which life has been sustained for long periods by these stimulants alone; and cases in which they are habitually used to enable men to endure severe and protracted exertion, sometimes under circumstances of extreme privation. Such facts can scarcely fail to convince reasonable persons that there is something either in the constitution of man, or in the circumstances of human life, that demands a kind of support which is neither necessary nor suitable to brutes, and which may therefore be fatal to them without being on that account less useful to us. On this branch of the question Dr. Beard has some interesting observations, showing, among other things, that alcohol is not the only stimulant which, taken in a raw state, is poisonous to cats, dogs, and rabbits, but that the essential principles of beverages so harmless as tea and coffee may be equally destructive. Altogether, the work is well calculated to diffuse sound knowledge and clear ideas among the unlearned readers for whom it is intended.

There are several philosophical or metaphysical works on our list, none of them of very high pretensions, or likely to be popular with the general reader on the one hand or valuable to the critical student on the other. The most important is an abridgment of Dr. Noah Porter's larger work on the Human Intellect‡, a treatise intended for students, which begins with a discussion of the fundamental issue of psychology—the existence of an immaterial soul—and thence proceeds to treat the general character and working of the mind of man, and the ordinary problems of metaphysical science. As a manual for students, the work would be much more suitable if, instead of discussing questions and laying down the law from his own point of view, Dr. Porter had confined himself to defining the terminology of metaphysics, and explaining the different theories and systems of the recognized masters of the science. The Science of Nature Versus the Science of Man §, by the same author, is a sort of enlarged essay read before a Debating Society at Harvard, on the relations of metaphysical and natural science, and on the claim of the former to preference—a claim as generally acknowledged from the time of Socrates to that of Bacon, as it has been generally repudiated since the latter period. A Positivist Primer|| is written in the clumsy form of question and answer, the inquirer having really nothing to do but supply headings for the language of the respondent. Its purport is to afford an elementary explanation

* Putnam's Handy-book Series. Eating and Drinking: a Popular Manual of Food and Diet in Health and Disease. By George M. Beard, M.D. New York: Putnam & Sons. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1871.

† Putnam's Handy-book Series. Stimulants and Narcotics, Metacally, Philosophically, and Morally Considered. By George M. Beard, M.D. New York: Putnam & Sons. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1871.

‡ The Elements of Intellectual Science; a Manual for Schools and Colleges. Abridged from the "Human Intellect," by Noah Porter, D.D., LL.D., President of Yale College. New York: Scribner & Co. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1871.

§ The Science of Nature Versus the Science of Man. By Noah Porter. New York: Dodd & Mead. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1871.

|| A Positivist Primer; being a Series of Familiar Conversations on the Religion of Humanity. By C. G. David. New York: Wesley & Co. London: Trübner & Co. 1871.

* Transactions of the American Philological Association, 1869-70. Published by the Association. Printed by Case & Co. London: Trübner & Co.

† Journal of the Anthropological Institute of New York. New York: Westermann & Co. London: Trübner & Co. 1871-72.

‡ Twelfth Annual Report of the Superintendent of the Insurance Department, State of New York. Part I. Fire and Marine Insurance. Part II. Life and Casualty Insurance. Albany: Printing House of the Argus Company. London: Trübner & Co. 1871.

§ Seventh Annual Report of the Board of State Charities of Massachusetts, to which are added the Reports of its several Officers, January, 1872. Boston: Wright & Potter, State Printers. London: Trübner & Co. 1871.

and vindication of the system of which M. Comte was the founder and arch-priest, in language as well adapted to popular comprehension as the nature of the case admits.

A thick and closely printed volume on the living female writers of the South*, scarcely one of whom is known outside her own country, and the immense majority of whom are hardly known even there, could only be filled by what Englishmen would consider an invasion of private life and a violation of personal confidence; but in America both the writers and the victims of journalistic criticisms and biographical notices are comparatively indifferent to these things. Very few of the ladies whose names are here recorded have done anything to provoke this intrusion upon their privacy, the majority having been guilty of nothing more serious than a few graceful verses, harmless tales, or literary criticisms. There is, however, a certain interest attaching to the work in consequence of the situation of those whose names it commemorates. Many of the ladies here mentioned have been made widows or orphans by the war; many have lost sons or brothers; many have been reduced from wealth to poverty; some were first induced to write by the circumstances in which they were left when emancipation and conquest had completed the ruin which the devastations of Butler, Sheridan, Stoneman, and Sherman had commenced. For reasons which may easily be imagined, the editor has avoided as far as possible selections directly relating to the war, or expressive of strong party feeling; but those which are given are effective and touching, and the whole work is pervaded by a tone of sadness and subdued regret such as might be expected in a collection of memorials of the wives and daughters of Confederate heroes, the women of a desolate and conquered land.

Of novels we have several. More than She could Bear† is a story of adventure and of horror in the early days of Texas; of a war the very name of which is, as the writer admits, scarcely remembered by Americans, and is a fortiori likely to be quite unknown to English readers. It is full of sensational incident and extravagant sentiment, and deformed by a style sadly too common among all but the very best American writers—a style of high-flown expression, incongruous metaphor, and sesquipedalian epithet, such as might be expected from an underbred girl put through a course of Esfield's Speaker at a "genteel academy." Next comes Women, or Chronicles of the Late War‡, by Mary Tucker Magill, an authoress estranged, as some of our readers may remember, in Bret Harte's Sensation Novelists, with more animosity and less point than was shown in the rest of those clever caricatures, or than the present volume can at all explain. It is true that, as is shown in the incident related in the preface of an application to Stonewall Jackson to detail a shoemaker to make shoes for the ladies attending the hospitals, Miss Magill is somewhat deficient in the sense of humour, and is apt to transgress the boundary between the ludicrous and the pathetic; but there is little in her present work either of the self-conceit or of the frantic virulence which the caricaturist imputes to her. Of course a Southern lady writing of the war in which her country was conquered and her kinsmen slain can hardly write with the impartiality of a philosophic historian; and some license of invective might be allowed to a writer of fiction who witnessed the cruel and repeated devastation of Northern Virginia, and the wanton destruction of the home of the chivalrous and generous leader of the Virginian armies. But the sharpest expressions put into the mouths of Miss Magill's heroines are courtesy itself when compared with the language of grave Northern historians and responsible statesmen; and no act ascribed to any Federal soldier is worse than those actually committed by Butler, Milroy, and others, and condoned, if not formally sanctioned, by Mr. Lincoln. My Rose§ is a story of life among the French Creoles of Louisiana. The Funny Philosophers|| is a quasi-comic novel, by an author whose powers are hardly adequate to the effort to be wise and witty through two hundred and fifty pages.

Our list includes the names of five poetic aspirants, of whom the most ambitious will surely prove the most utterly unsuccessful. We cannot pretend to the courage required by the critic who should undertake conscientiously to read through a poem in twelve cantos—some 8,000 lines of very blank verse—under the title of Man¶, so that there may be meritorious passages in Mr. Franz Ganter's volume that have escaped our ken; but we hardly think that many English readers will be adventurous enough to seek for them. Mr. J. Watson's Beautiful Snow** gives a title to a volume which contains several readable and some graceful pieces, but none, we think, that will remain on a reader's memory. Mr. W. A. Butler's * Two Millions and Nothing to Wear are already known and deserve to be known more widely. There is power, humour, vivacity, and earnest thought in his satire; and if he would take more pains with structure and expression, condense, correct, and polish, so that his poems should be as easy reading as those of other American humorists who certainly do not surpass him in intellectual vigour or poetic talent, he might achieve a more permanent, if not a wider, popularity than theirs. The present collection of his verses is worth looking through, for the sake of the few pieces that are worth a careful perusal. Mr. Brincklé† is not to be compared with him, but Mr. Brincklé, too, has power, if he would not waste it on impossible lours de force. English hexameters are, save in the most skilful hands, all but intolerable; but English elegiacs—"longs and shorts," as they were called in our school-days—are simply impracticable, and we can only regret that Mr. Brincklé has wasted so much effort in showing that he can write better than we should have thought possible what neither he nor any one else can write well. Mr. Stockton Bates‡ makes the same attempt, and certainly with no better success. Neither volume can be said to be mere rubbish; neither contains much that is in any way remarkable.

* Poems. By William Allen Butler. Boston: Osgood & Co. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

† Poems. By T. G. Brincklé. Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen, & Haffelfinger. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

‡ Dream Life; and other Poems. By Stockton Bates. Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen, & Haffelfinger. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

MR. SMALLEY, in a letter to the Times, after asserting that certain charges against himself are "simply untrue," proceeds to say:—"I am tempted to apply an even stronger word to the astounding assertion that I 'imputed to the English Commissioners a 'fraudulent complicity with the understanding they have publicly repudiated.' That is a pure invention. I have never thought 'nor said anything of the kind, nor made an imputation of any 'kind on the honour or good faith of the English Commissioners.' It is not desirable to enter into a controversy with a writer who uses language which can neither be tolerated nor imitated. The statement to which Mr. SMALLEY would apply a stronger word than that it is simply untrue is founded on the following passage in his first letter to the Times:—"As to what your Commissioners understood, I 'have no direct testimony to offer, and I do not care to repeat 'hearsay evidence. I did not reach America till after they had 'sailed for home, but I was told that the consultations and conversations in which they had borne part had been of the freest nature. 'No one hinted that they had been overreached or deceived, and 'no one supposed that between them and the American Commissioners there could be a misunderstanding. Any explanation 'of their state of mind at that time must be purely conjectural, 'and I suggest none; but you will have anticipated no in wonder-'ing by what complication of unlucky chances it was possible for 'them to quit America in ignorance of the American view of the 'Treaty, which they were perhaps the only persons in the country 'who did not perfectly comprehend. You cannot suspect forty 'millions of people of a conspiracy of silence." Mr. SMALLEY implies that he could produce hearsay evidence of the English Commissioners' knowledge that the indirect claims were understood by the Americans to be included in the Treaty; that such knowledge had been conveyed to them in consultations and conversations "of 'the freest nature"; that there had probably been no misunderstanding; and that it was impossible for them to quit America in ignorance of that which Mr. SMALLEY now represents as the American view of the Treaty. Yet Mr. SMALLEY "never thought nor said anything of the kind." The question whether the alleged concurrence of the English Commissioners in the interpretation now affirmed by the American Government to the Treaty would be properly described as fraudulent complicity is one for their countrymen, and not for any foreign despotism.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we decline to return rejected communications; and to this rule we can make no exception.

The publication of the SATURDAY REVIEW takes place on Saturday mornings, in time for the early trains, and copies may be obtained in the Country, through any Newsgate, on the day of publication.

Now ready, VOLUME XXXII, bound in cloth, price 10s. Cloth Cases for Binding all the Volumes, price 2s. each. Also, Reading Cases, price 2s. 6d. each. May be had at the Office, or through any Bookseller.

* The Living Female Writers of the South. Edited by the Author of "Southern Writers." Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen, & Haffelfinger. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

† More than She could Bear: a Story of the Gachupin War in Texas, A.D. 1818-19. By Hepler Bendbow. Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen, & Haffelfinger. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

‡ Women, or, Chronicles of the Late War. By Mary Tucker Magill. Baltimore: Turnbull Brothers. London: Trübner & Co. 1871.

§ My Rose: the Romance of a June Day. By L. Virginia French. Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen, & Haffelfinger. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

|| The Funny Philosophers; or, Wags and Sweethearts. A novel. By George Yellott. Philadelphia: Lippincott & Co. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

¶ Man: a Poem in Twelve Cantos. By Franz F. Ganter. Author's Edition. New Orleans: Printed by the New Orleans Commercial Bulletin Printing Co. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1871.

** Beautiful Snow; and other Poems. By J. M. Watson. New and Enlarged Edition. Philadelphia: Peterson & Brethman. London: Sampson Low & Co.

THE

SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 853, Vol. 33.

March 2, 1872.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

THE QUEEN AND THE NATIONAL THANKSGIVING.

A WEEK which seemed destined to be marked by nothing but the expression of the loyalty of the English people to the QUEEN and her family has been chequered by the intelligence that a foolish and wicked attempt has been made to frighten, annoy, and possibly hurt the QUEEN. A young Irishman thought proper on Thursday to try to earn a contemptible notoriety by presenting at the QUEEN an unloaded pistol, in order to secure her assent to a petition for the release of the Fenian prisoners. No harm was done, the QUEEN behaved with her usual courage, and the miscreant was immediately secured to await the punishment which ought to be unsparingly dealt out to him. But although the only effect of the occurrence will be to make the affection with which the QUEEN is regarded still more lively, Englishmen may be reasonably grieved that anything should have occurred to mar the effect of Tuesday's solemnity. The ceremony of the Thanksgiving Day was a great success. The day was fine, the crowds were immense, the demonstrations of loyalty sincere and overwhelming. The Prince of Wales was able to attend, and the sympathy which his presence evoked came evidently from the hearts of those who saw and cheered him. The decorations were at least abundant, if not always very remarkable for taste or originality. Inside St. Paul's there was a gathering such as even England has seldom or never seen; and, without any ostentation of religion, there was a genuine display of religious emotion. The occasion was such as to touch the feelings of all who could feel. The contrast between the gloom of the dark days when the life of the PRINCE hung on a thread and the brightness of the day of early spring when he showed himself in renewed health to thousands of delighted spectators, afforded not only an obvious theme for the address of the ARCHBISHOP, but a point that actually suggested itself to the most ordinary mind. The Royal Family did its best to deserve the welcome it received, and the presence of the QUEEN in London is sufficiently novel to be highly appreciated. Among minor incidents of the day that deserve notice is the attendance of the Emperor NAPOLEON, with the EMPRESS and PRINCE IMPERIAL, at Buckingham Palace. Englishmen, if they once take it into their heads that any person of high rank has deserved well of them, are exceedingly slow to change their opinions; and the meditated spoliation of Belgium is forgotten by those who remember the alliance of the Crimean war, the Treaty of Commerce, and the constant kindnesses which during his time of prosperity the EMPEROR showed to Englishmen of all ranks. That the EMPEROR should have had his mild share of the pleasures that were going on last Tuesday was an extra gratification to those who knew of it. Loyalty is not only paid to the Sovereign of the country. The atmosphere which it creates extends beyond the central point to which it is directed; and Englishmen are pleased on all public occasions to show that they have a personal liking for those whose names and history they know and who are making their annals famous. Mr. DISRAELI has never taken any pains to be popular, and he has pursued a course in politics which might have been thought likely to have alienated from him the sympathies of the multitude. But he was cheered heartily on Tuesday, as he always is cheered when he shows himself in public. The people like to see a man, even although he is not on the popular side, who has made a successful fight in life and has won an historical name. A loyal people is so far a generous people, for loyalty is the antithesis of envy. It is impossible not to see that in the great disparity between rich and poor in England there might be much room for envy. But we have been truly and recently by an acute observer, the an envious people. One great reason is, that they are a loyal people. They freely acknowledge that there is one family above them in whose doings they take the most intense interest, in whose grandeur they feel a personal concern, and in whose adversity and prosperity they delight to share. This feeling for one family above them blunts the edge of envy towards other families above them, and they learn to be content generally because in one direction they are satisfied and happy.

Some accidents, of course, marred the serenity of the day and the success of the pageant. One or two persons were killed, and many persons were maimed or hurt. The recklessness of an English crowd is only equalled by its good humour. The most unfit persons get into the worst kind of crowds in the most absurd way. Excitement destroys not only prudence, but the commonest care for the safety of helpless persons. Babies are taken in arms only to be suffocated; old ladies get under the wheels of hansom; young women are carried off their legs until they are trampled on, and have to be taken away on stretchers. But the mob on Tuesday did not show itself cruel or heartless, and the police frightened into obscurity the gangs of roughs who are apt to please themselves by causing the greatest amount of unpleasantness they can contrive to all who look likely to be afraid of them. The procession itself was not imposing. Nine carriages do not make much of a show; but it was the heartiness of the reception, the unanimity and depth of popular feeling, the free, painstaking effort to give the QUEEN its best that London was making, which constituted the greatness of the occasion. The Daily Telegraph assures us that so pathetic was the spectacle that a large number of officers at the Army and Navy Club began to cry as the QUEEN passed, and this certainly was a most striking tribute to the greatness of the occasion that touched the popular heart. Almost equally striking, however, was the assiduity and earnestness with which the inhabitants of houses or streets had set themselves to go somewhat out of the common groove of decorations in order to show that they had given not only their money but their thoughts to the cause of doing honour to the QUEEN and her son. Ludgate Hill more especially distinguished itself, and offered a very novel and pretty effect to the eyes of such of the Royal Family as had leisure to observe it. The actual passing of the procession lasted a very short time in proportion to the cost that each group had spent in preparing for it; but the few minutes during which it was the centre of excitement were supremely delightful to each street in turn. Perhaps those who went early and waited long in the Cathedral had the hardest time of it, and few probably would care to record how they whiled those weary hours away. One of those patient people has, however, thought proper to let the world know how his leisure was occupied. The Correspondent of the Standard asserted that he spent the entire morning in looking at the decorations of the galleries in St. Paul's, and thinking how very much better they would have been managed if Lord JOHN MANSERS had been First Commissioner of Public Works. Of all the vast crowd, thus man possessed with, and absorbed in, this overpowering thought was perhaps the most enviable, for an hour was but as a moment to him, and he did not even know that his patience was being taxed.

It does all men good to express on rare and solemn occasions the feelings which are never quenched or absent, but which ordinarily lie in a somewhat dormant state in their hearts. It is only at intervals that a nation can show its loyalty as England showed it on Tuesday, but when it does come, the occasion, if properly seized, makes a people a little better and good deal happier for the moment. Let us hope that an outburst, not of conventional and strained, but of genuine unbought loyalty, such as that which the day of National Thanksgiving evoked, may be of some use, not only to those who showed their loyalty, but to those to whom the loyalty was shown. The Prince of WALES must see that he is the heir to a throne the occupant of which has only to be a little loveable to be very much loved. The QUEEN has done great things for her subjects, and their gratitude is proportionate; but the English are willing to take almost everything on trust, and to make the best of the monarch they have got. To be ungrateful to a people so desirous of showing respect and kindness would be alien to the feelings of any man of honour and good sense in the position of a Sovereign if he would but try to do justice to himself and his nation. Fortunately there is no barrier of any kind between the Royal Family of England and the mass of the nation. The position of the Sovereign is thoroughly in harmony with the feelings of the people. It has much historical grandeur, a fair share of actual pomp, no inconsiderable connexion with practical government; but the QUEEN, though the heirress of ALFRED and the CONQUEROR, derives her title from the will of the nation, is not forced to seek eminence by intrigues and cabals, and has much the same tastes and habits, religious and social, as a large portion of her subjects. It certainly is not necessary for her to explain to any interviewing reporter, as the Count of CHAMBRAY lately did, that she does not wish to be a crowned canoness. The service at St. Paul's was not at all of the kind which a crowned canoness would have cared for. It was a homely, family sort of proceeding, with a prayer or two, ending with one of the least poetical hymns that were ever sung on such an occasion. The homely rhymes and halting metres of the Rev. Mr. STONE were very much what any curate might have written if any squire's son had recovered from an illness, and perhaps this accorded very well with the simple and family character of the day's work. It was because the whole proceeding on the part of the QUEEN and the PRINCE and the people was thoroughly free from any affectation that it had a nobleness of its own. The QUEEN's son had been as ill as a man can be without dying; he had been mercifully preserved, and the nation was very glad to see him well again. This was all; but it was enough to give zest to a holiday that will long be remembered, to afford vent to the emotions of a nation, and to inspire a hope that those bonds of law and order, the force of which depends so much on the sentiment of the people, may have been thus strengthened and made more enduring.

ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

THE decision of the Cabinet at Washington will be received in England with regret, but not with disappointment. When the English nation unanimously resolved not to submit the indirect claims to arbitration, little hope was entertained that the American Government would withdraw a demand which had been deliberately preferred. It is not yet known whether Mr. FISH will think it necessary to support his refusal by argument; but he may be supposed to hold the opinion which has been expressed with remarkable concurrence by the American press. If the question is discussed, the Protocol which records the proceedings of the 8th of March will probably be adduced in support of the American claim. It is not disputed that the American Commissioners then connected the indirect claims with the depredations of the cruisers; and it is known, though it is not formally recorded, that they asked for a gross sum which would have exceeded the amount of the direct claims. If Mr. FISH states that the understanding of his Government was that the proposed amicable settlement was an ultimatum, it can only be answered that in that case the negotiators were at cross purposes. Only a few of the more violent journalists affect to believe that indirect damages could have been awarded by the Tribunal, and many writers have intimated a doubt whether the disputed claim is properly included in the terms of reference; yet, because the claim has been presented, and because an objection has been raised on the part of England, it is declared by general consent that a modification of the demand has become impossible. The New York Nation, as might be expected, contains the clearest and fairest admission that the demand for consequential damages is inconsistent both with the understanding of the negotiators on both sides, and with the terms of the Treaty. It believes "that nothing was better understood by both parties, when the Treaty of Washington was under negotiation, than that the question of consequential damages—that is, the question whether England was responsible for the loss caused by the prolongation of the war after the escape of the Alabama—was not a question of dispute between the two countries. . . . It was never considered by any lawyer as a question which could be gravely submitted to any human tribunal." Again, the Nation shows that the provision by which the arbitrators were to assess the damages done by each vessel separately seems to exclude from the Treaty the demand for consequential damages. "It is fair to conclude, therefore, that the negotiators did not intend that any attempt to estimate English responsibility for that prolongation should be made." Nevertheless the writer in the Nation, after expressing full concurrence in the English interpretation of the negotiations and of the Treaty, contents himself with some vague and general expressions of regret for the probable failure of the negotiation. If his conclusions are just, the Americans ought to correct the error which they have committed; but he prefers to suggest that, if England had confidence in the Tribunal, the Board would be considered as competent to pass judgment on the extent of the American claims as on their nature. The English Government and nation have agreed to refer one issue to the Board of Arbitration; and they have, according to the Nation itself, not agreed to refer the question which is now in dispute. It is strange that they should be blamed for adhering to the Treaty which they have made, and for declining to assume the existence of a Treaty which neither they nor the other party thought of making. Confidence in the justice of their case is not sufficient when they are asked to submit to a fallible tribunal a ruinous demand. The framers of the American Case quote from Swiss and Italian jurists opinions which would countenance the widest claim for consequential damages; and the doctrines which may prevail in Brazil are absolutely unknown. It is not absolutely impossible that the arbitrators might adopt the same theory, and the English Commissioners never thought of submitting to any arbitrators whatever the question of a payment of three or four hundred millions. It may be incidentally observed that, in quoting the opinion of a certain Professor PIER ANTONIO in favour of their claims, the American agents betray the fact that, when they were drawing the earlier part of the Case, they were not prepared to demand consequential damages. The Professor declares that he is unable to conceive how another Italian jurist had excluded the demands for indirect damages which had been advanced by "il SUMNER ed il suo Governo." The framers of the Case quote the opinion, "without claiming" the extreme rights which this learned gentleman concedes to "them." The extreme rights which were not claimed at the 184th page of the American Case are no other than the claims which were added, probably by an afterthought, in the 477th and following pages.

Although it is difficult to understand the position or the feelings of a foreign country, it is not too much to say that in international controversies, and more especially in disputes with the United States, Englishmen make efforts to be just and impartial which are seldom reciprocated. The arguments which have in England produced unanimous and conscientious conviction have not even been noticed by the American journals. With scarcely an exception they speak with a contemptuous pity of the flurry or the excitement which they attribute to the English people, or they invent specious and baseless theories of party interests which are supposed to have prompted the agitation against the American demands. In no single instance has a distinction been drawn between the question of the extent of the reference and that of the merits of the demand. All Englishmen know with absolute certainty that the refusal to submit an unforeseen issue to the arbitrators has no relation whatever to party politics; but it seems impossible to make Americans listen to English statements or arguments; and they derive little assistance from the Correspondents of their papers. Only the other day the Correspondent of a principal New York journal avowed that he had not been aware of any doubt in England that the Treaty covered Mr. SUMNER's claim, which amounted, although Americans affected to sneer at the translation of their own rhetoric into figures, to hundreds of millions. If he had persuaded himself and informed his readers that the population of England consisted of Mahomedans or Buddhists, he could not have shown greater inability or disinclination to collect or to communicate accurate knowledge. The supercilious comments of American journalists on the feeling which their claim has produced frequently end with the not unfounded remark that England has more to lose than the United States by the failure of the Treaty. It is true that England has neither the power nor the wish to injure America, while Canada and other

English possessions would be exposed to danger in the event of a war. It would seem to follow that, in refusing to enlarge the terms of the reference, the English nation is protecting its honour and its safety at the expense of important interests; or, in other words, it prefers a measurable risk to the possibility of a mistaken judgment on the part of a Tribunal which has no jurisdiction over the issue of consequential damages. The comments which are made on Mr. GLADSTONE's speech may perhaps be natural or even reasonable, but they are utterly irrelevant to the justice or expediency of persisting in the disputed claim. Mr. GLADSTONE expressed with unnecessary, and therefore injudicious, vehemence his confidence in a construction of the Treaty which approves itself to the great majority of Englishmen, and to the most competent American interpreters. His language was not intentionally discourteous, except so far as an eager and positive disputant assumes too candidly that his opponent is in the wrong. Every page of the American Case is full of bitter and offensive attacks on the good faith of England; and yet, if it had confined itself within the limits of the reference, it would not have provoked a syllable of remonstrance. To persevere in an unjust demand because Mr. GLADSTONE said in his usual language and manner that it was unjust would not be a creditable proceeding. No notice appears to be taken of the fact that the American demand is regarded as inadmissible by the English journals which have, up to the present time, consistently displayed the strongest sympathy for the United States. In the general expression of contempt no exception is made in favour of the Spectator or of the Daily News. When the abstract of the Case was first published, the Spectator refused to believe that the American Government could have departed so widely and so wantonly from the spirit of the Treaty. Its misplaced confidence deserves a less discourteous return.

To a certain extent American politicians are misled by the sincerity and genuineness of their own disappointment. In common with the vast majority of Englishmen, they believed that a final and amicable settlement had been effected, and they could not have expected that their own Government and its agents would present a Case which both in form and substance would have been unnecessarily hostile if it had been intended to justify a declaration of war. Any English Government which had adopted a similar course would have been summarily driven from power; but American patriotism unfortunately requires that in all international transactions the Government of the day shall be unanimously supported. It has been shown on former occasions that neither the American Government nor its agents seriously expected to obtain indirect damages; and it appears that the claim would not have been preferred if the framers of the Case had not changed their minds during the progress of their labours. It may be plausibly conjectured that the American Government and people regret the impediment which has been unnecessarily placed in the way of the arbitration; but they chose to employ agents of whom some were notoriously unfriendly to England, and it is thought impossible to withdraw any pretension which has once been advanced. The failure which has been caused by the conduct of the American Government has been forced upon England. The unpleasant consequences which may perhaps follow the rupture of the negotiations cannot be contemplated without serious anxiety; but there is happily no room for hesitation, nor is there any cause which can produce future remorse. The apology which has been made without consideration cannot be retracted, and perhaps the blundering innovation on international law may be held valid, except as to the part which has been already annulled by joint consent. England is still ready to pay any damages which may be awarded on account of the Alabama claims, but not to extend the terms of the Treaty.

THE BALLOT BILL.

ALMOST the whole of Thursday evening was consumed by the House of Commons in a discussion of the question whether the Corrupt Practices Bill and the Ballot Bill are to be taken as separate Bills, or as virtually forming part of the same measure. The Government has separated them on the ground that each subject will raise a great amount of discussion, and that it is better and simpler to keep the two subjects of discussion apart. Mr. FAWCETT, however, stated with his usual candour the objections to this course of proceeding. The Government is very weak, and may any day go out of office. If it carried the Ballot Bill, but not the Corrupt Practices Bill, and then a dissolution took place, a new general election would be conducted under the Ballot without any of the checks on the operation of the Ballot which the companion measure is intended to provide. This would be to let the Ballot Bill operate for the first time in its worst shape, which would be unfair to the experiment of secret voting, and very injurious to the country. It is idle to say that the two measures may be looked on as covering totally distinct ground, that the Ballot Bill secures that the vote shall be given secretly, and the Corrupt Practices Bill that it shall be given honestly. The Ballot Bill is a great encouragement to dishonest voting, for it makes it impossible to know how a voter has voted. Practically, it is in a large measure through voters being known to vote in a particular way that bribery is detected. An election agent who has received a promise of support from a voter whose character does not command very high respect finds that his man has gone over to the other side, and further inquiries disclose that he went over towards the close of the poll, after much hesitation and after long colloquy with other voters of his own stamp who also did as he did. The election agent is tolerably certain that bribery has been at work, and he has a fairly good clue to discovering how and by whom the bribery has been administered. He knows where to begin to hunt up evidence showing that resort has been had to illegal practices. But under a system of secret voting there would be no clue of the kind. It is therefore in the highest degree reasonable to ask that every safeguard which can be devised against bribery should be adopted at the same time that the Ballot is made part of the institutions of the country. It is true that no new safeguard against bribery will make up for the loss of that which exists under the present system. We cannot have both secret voting for the prevention of intimidation and open voting for the prevention of bribery. But if we are to prefer preventing intimidation to preventing bribery, we may at least do all that we can to lessen the amount of bribery under the system of secret voting. Nor would it be very difficult to make the kind of bribery that would take place under the Ballot Bill a hazardous undertaking. But to do this it would be necessary for the House of Commons to use a severity towards persons of their own class which they have generally shown themselves very reluctant to exercise. Even if it could be shown that nothing could be done to mitigate the evil of increased bribery under the system of secret voting, it is at least desirable that this should be clearly realized, and that before the Ballot is carried the cost at which it must be purchased should be clearly known. Personation is less directly connected with the Ballot than bribery is, because personation may be stopped if enough money is spent to prevent it, and if the machinery of the law is sufficiently stringent, whether the voting is open or secret. Personation and the Ballot go together in the minds of men, because in the countries where the Ballot prevails personation often prevails; but there is no necessary connexion between the two. As, however, one of the popular objections to the Ballot is that it leads to personation, it might be wise to show how it is proposed to stop personation at the same time that the Ballot is adopted.

The Government, therefore, did perhaps the best thing it could in offering a compromise which Mr. DISRAELI accepted on behalf of the Opposition. This was that the clauses of the Corrupt Practices Bill as to personation and bribery should be taken out of that Bill and made part of the Ballot Bill. The only object of this arrangement is, however, to content the House of Commons. It is obviously a very clumsy mode of legislating, for personation and bribery are among the corrupt practices which a Bill to prevent corrupt practices at elections ought specially to prevent. That the Government should thus early in the Session have had to submit to such a compromise awakens natural uneasiness as to the whole character of the Session. The plain fact is, that the House has no confidence in the Government, and the Government has no confidence in itself. Last year it was in the heights of arrogance, now it is in the depths of despondency. It prepares halves or quarters of measures, and talks humbly about its chances of carrying these fractions of Bills into law. Mr. GLADSTONE informed Mr. MUNDILLA on Thursday night that, although the Ballot is to extend to municipal elections, the Corrupt Practices Bill is not, because it would have been necessary for the Government to devise some new machinery under which offences against the Corrupt Practices Act could have been tried in municipalities. How are the mighty fallen! Here is the same Minister who, in the days of his glory, delighted in contriving all kinds of elaborate machinery for dealing with Ireland, and now he pauses and he dotes before the difficulties of deciding the question how a man is to be deterred from giving his humble neighbours half a crown a head to elect him as alderman. This Ballot Bill is the first Bill in the Ministerial programme this year, and already the Ministry is getting faint-hearted. It speaks of its earnest desire to see the whole of the Corrupt Practices Act carried, but it owns that it may be disappointed. If any one threatens to attack it, even in the faintest manner, the Government feels as if it had nothing to do but to hide its head under its wings, and wait till it is shot. The COLLIER and the Ewells cases have sapped the personal respect and enthusiasm with which Mr. GLADSTONE was regarded, and he has sunk to the level of being defended on the ground that he is for the present inevitable. The Ballot is no longer a Ministerial or a Liberal measure. It is a measure on which schemers are fixing their attention in order to show how amazingly clever they can be at the election which they now think is near at hand. The whole atmosphere of the House of Commons is that of an Assembly which finds no interest in what is going on day by day, and is occupied in gloomy forecasts of the future. The legislation offered it is small, judiciously small, but not judiciously perfect. It is proposed and advocated in a faint trembling way, and every sign of opposition flutters the nerves of the Ministry. It is scarcely possible that a Session begun in this way can end with credit to Parliament and profit to the country.

Whatever may be the occasion, the two Messrs. BENTINCK will have their fun; and on Thursday night one of them made, and the other defended, a proposal that the votes of the House of Commons should be taken by ballot. Mr. C. BENTINCK argued that such a mode of proceeding would be in strict harmony with the Constitution, as a motion to the same effect was only lost by two votes in the Long Parliament; and as CROMWELL was on the side of the majority, it may be inferred that he got Parliamentary voting by ballot rejected in order that he might exercise that intimidation over members which was a necessary beginning of his despotic career. In the same way M. GUIZOT, as Mr. BENTINCK informed the House, abolished the system of secret voting which used to prevail in the French Chamber, because he found it interfered with that tyrannical supremacy which he cherished as the right of the First Minister of the Crown. Unfortunately the parallel broke down just as it began to be applied to the present state of things in the House of Commons. Mr. BENTINCK would have been glad to argue that the Ballot was necessary to protect members against the tyranny of Mr. GLADSTONE. But then he was still more delighted to point out that the days of Mr. GLADSTONE's tyranny are at an end; and as the two lines of argument were irreconcilable, he chose that which, if it told most against his motion, gave him the greatest immediate satisfaction, and a speech which purported to show how a wise House of Commons would guard itself against the machinations of CROMWELL or GUIZOT wandered into a strain of rejoicing over the helpless and prostrate condition of the Liberal party. Mr. BENTINCK had, however, a special triumph of his own, for he adduced a singular proof of the changes that come over political parties. He appealed to the SPEAKER to recall to memory an occasion when the SPEAKER, as Whip of the Liberal party, implored Mr. BENTINCK himself to talk against time in order that the Government of the day might bring up voters to defeat Mr. BERKELEY's motion for the Ballot. The laborious joke of Mr. BENTINCK's proposal was soon over, and the House entered on the debates of the Ballot Bill. The only point in the subsequent discussion that deserves attention is the ample manner in which the Conservatives redeemed their pledge to help to make the Bill as good a Bill as it can be made. Everything that was said and done was said and done with the obvious wish to help Mr. FORSTER, and with such encouragement and aid it is to be hoped that the Ministry, even in its present state of low spirits, may feel itself strong enough to make satisfactory progress with the Bill.

THE COUNT OF CHAMBORD.

THE visit of the Count of CHAMBORD to Antwerp has been a cause of almost universal annoyance. Some few persons no doubt felt genuine and intense pleasure in gazing with loyal veneration on the one living Child of France who has not dallied with modern ideas or thought of bartering his birthright as a Legitimate King for the miserable potage which is all that the Revolution has hitherto offered to French sovereigns. But this emotion must have been limited to the ladies in rich costumes and the priests who stood with clasped hands in the Royal ante-chamber. Everyone else, from the Count himself downward, must wish by this time that he had never left the seclusion in which it has so long pleased him to remain. His stay at Antwerp was the signal for disturbances which it was difficult to check and discreditable to allow. The Belgian Government had naturally no wish to abridge the right of asylum to the disadvantage of an exile who may yet sit on the throne of France; but his presence in their territory could hardly have been agreeable to M. THIERS. There was something more than a coincidence in the sudden appearance of the Legitimist pretender so near the French frontier just at the moment when the Legitimist section of the Assembly had been making a strong and, to some extent, a successful effort to heal the schism in the monarchical party, and to unite the partisans of the elder and younger branches in support of a common restoration. M. THIERS may not have thought it consistent with his dignity to address the Belgian Government on the subject, though this consideration is not one which has much weight with him when he has an object to gain by speaking. But the Belgian Cabinet has so many grounds of quarrel with the Liberal party that it may naturally have been irritated at having an additional disagreement thrust upon it by the arrival of the Count of CHAMBORD. The municipal authorities were less hampered in this respect, and though they seem to have left the rioters to do pretty much as they liked in the Place Verte, they were profuse in their expressions of regret when once they found themselves inside the Hôtel Antoine. No civic corporation, however, can be happy in the consciousness that it is allowing disorder to go on without let or hindrance, and the experience of the last fortnight at Antwerp may hereafter be turned against the officials who left things to take their course.

To Belgium, however, the annoyance has in the main been only temporary. In France it must have been very much more serious. It may be difficult to say precisely why and in what respect the monarchical cause has been injured by the Count of CHAMBORD's presence at Antwerp, but there can be no question that it has been injured. The truth perhaps is that the only real chance that Monarchy has in France is the chance that a nation tired of every form of government may at last return to the old house. It is an indispensable condition of such a reaction that there should be no apparent attempt to impose a King upon France. There are many Frenchmen probably who are quite ready to consider whether a Monarchy would not give them better guarantees for order and good government than either the Republic or the Empire. But, outside the extreme Legitimist section, there are no Frenchmen who are willing to play the part of the Prodigal Son, and to confess their own unworthiness of the least favour at the hands of their offended father. It would be unfair to the Count of CHAMBORD not to admit that his language at Antwerp has given no countenance to the notion that he expects any such submission. But it is the misfortune of a Legitimist pretender that mere silence on his part is not an adequate disavowal of those pretensions. Whenever he appears in public some shadow of Royal State must surround him. If he himself could forget that he is King by the grace of God, there will always be some among his attendants who are sure to keep the fact before the world. Of all the members of the Assembly who have lately been debating whether the Count of CHAMBORD should be called to the throne, not one can fail to see in the appearance of the Count in Belgium an intimation that the title of HENRY V. is unaffected by all that has happened in the last eighty years, and needs no aid from Frenchmen to give it technical validity. This was exactly the conclusion which, in the monarchical interest, it was most to be desired that Frenchmen should not draw, but it is the one which every Frenchman will draw from what has been going on at Antwerp. Even if it were possible for them to shut their eyes to so obvious an inference, the Legitimist press would take care to open them. The journals of a party in opposition are rarely so well subsidized as to make the number of their readers a matter of indifference, and young and enthusiastic Legitimists like to have their principles expounded and applied with all the force and piquancy of which the subject admits. In the hands of a writer like M. VEUILLLOT, for example, it admits of a great deal, and cautious deputies who would like the monarchical heaven to spread unnoticed for some time longer must have cursed the epigrammatic impudence which will not let Frenchmen remain in ignorance that their King is waiting to re-enter the patrimony from which he has been traitorously excluded.

Even M. THIERS would probably have preferred that the Count of CHAMBORD should not have come prominently before ward at this moment. His appearance gives a point to the monarchical manifesto that has been circulated in the Assembly which might otherwise have wanted; and though M. Thiers on the country is rather strengthened than this circumstance, his position has necessarily changed. He finds himself in opposition to most whom he has up to this time relied. As the champion of the Republic against a monarchical reaction, he will have abundance of followers, but they will not be taken from that Parliamentary majority which has hitherto given him a faithful if grudging support. If the monarchical demonstration had been confined to the distribution of manuscript manifestoes, M. LEFRANC'S Bill might never have been introduced. The Right are anxious to have it understood that they cherish no desire against the existing Government, and that their avowed monarchical hopes is only intended to apply to the state which must one day succeed to the present interregnum. An announcement of this kind might have been sufficiently parried by M. ST. HILAIRE'S letter. Under a Provisional Government no one has a right to complain if the thoughts of some of those who are subject to it occasionally travel into the future. In this respect M. THIERS, as painted by M. ST. HILAIRE, is as unblushing an offender as any member of the Right, but both are acting within the limits imposed on them by the situation. The one hopes that two or three years of the present Government will so habituate the nation to Republican forms that the Conservatives will no longer think that order and security are only attainable under a Monarchy. The other hopes that two or three years of the present Government will show so clearly the inherent weakness of Republican institutions that Monarchy will be welcomed as the sole resource of all who have anything to lose. But the arrival of the Count of CHAMBORD at Antwerp, and the rush of Legitimists which immediately followed, gave a different air to the monarchical movement. It revealed it as the avowed antagonist of the Provisional Government, instead of one among its possible successors. M. THIERS accepted the challenge, and replied to it by a Bill which places at his mercy the Legitimist as well as every other form of Opposition journalism. Probably if he had not taken some step of the kind he would have lost the confidence of the Left, and so found himself in the end an object of common suspicion to the whole Assembly. As it is, the Bill will probably be adopted with some modifications, and the monarchical party will be left to repent in silence the imprudence which led them to blow the horn before they had drawn the sword. Even the Count of CHAMBORD seems to have found out that his action was premature, since he has warned his friends not to renew in Holland the ostentatious devotion of which he was the object in Belgium. For the interests of Monarchy in France, this revival of prudence comes too late. Whatever harm it is in the power of the Count of CHAMBORD to inflict upon the cause he represents has been inflicted already.

MR. LOWE'S RESOLUTIONS.

THE House of Commons has a natural disinclination to relax or to modify its rules. The excitement among the members of the House during the debate of Monday was out of all proportion to the interest felt in the subject out of doors. Half the evening was spent in discussing the expediency of allowing a single member to exclude strangers by calling attention to their presence; and ultimately it was found for the moment impossible to devise an alternative arrangement. The Government, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Committee of last Session, proposed that strangers should only be excluded on a vote to be taken without debate or amendment; but Mr. BOUVIER and others objected that a division in a full House occupies half an hour, and that a motion for excluding strangers might perhaps sometimes be made for the purpose of delay. It might also have been suggested that if in times of agitation the galleries attempted to influence the House, a factions majority might possibly, like the Mountain in the French Convention, be inclined to sanction disorderly proceedings. Colonel WILSON PATTEN approved in the first instance of a plan by which twenty members would at any time be able to clear the House; but, when Mr. BOUVIER embodied the scheme in an amendment, Colonel PATTEN thought that the question required further consideration. It is acknowledged on all hands that the aid of reporters is indispensable to Parliament, while the spectators in the galleries only gratify their own curiosity. To the profane vulgar it would seem not impossible to adopt a rule of exclusion which should apply in the first instance only to the Strangers' Gallery, the Speaker's Gallery, and the seats under the gallery. A single member might be allowed, as at present, to call the Speaker's notice to the presence of strangers not occupied in the business of reporting; and, if it were thought desirable to attempt an impossible maintenance of secrecy, a vote might be taken on the exclusion of reporters. The absence of publicity which once surrounded the proceedings of Parliament with a mysterious awe would now render impossible the exercise of its sovereignty; but there is no harm in maintaining a fiction as long as it remains practically inoperative. Within modern memory the power of excluding strangers has only been used on two occasions; one expresses the resentment of an obscure member against unappreciative reporters, and more recently, with the comparatively laudable purpose of rebuking feminine want of delicacy. If the old rule is maintained, it will seldom be felt, and if it is abolished, it will scarcely be missed; yet the House of Commons found itself, after an earnest effort, incapable of adjusting the balance between two almost imaginary sets of advantages and dangers.

The contest on the second Resolution was much more serious and animated, and ultimately the recommendation of the Government and the Committee was adopted only by a small majority. It is to be feared that too many Englishmen who suppose themselves to possess some knowledge of public affairs are culpably ignorant of the conditions under which Parliamentary business is conducted, and of the limits and extent of the privileges of private members. As some antiquarian speakers remarked, the original duty of the House of Commons was to secure redress of grievances before granting the Crown any supply. Consistently with the ancient theory, as soon as the Government proposes the Estimates for discussion, active members give notice of motions to be made on the question that the Speaker leave the Chair; and, in a certain sense, all or most of their projects relate to the removal of supposed grievances. There is a wide gap between the proceedings of mediæval knights and hughers and the modern privileges of independent members, for the present practice is of recent origin, having been established only about seventy years ago, and having become general since the abolition of debates on petitions. It was by incessant speaking on strings of petitions that BROGHAM procured the recall of the notorious Orders in Council. In the present day he must have contented himself with motions on Supply nights, but the great service which his energy rendered to the country illustrates the advantages which may sometimes be derived from Parliamentary discussion, as distinguished both from legislation and from financial supervision. The admirers of bureaucratic government would not be unwilling to allow Parliament to amuse itself with talking, if it would transfer to permanent officials the real conduct of affairs, but it is because the House of Commons is supreme that its debates, even when they lead to no definite conclusion, exercise a commanding influence. All parties in the House agree that it is necessary to transact the regular business without surrendering the right and power of general control; but past and present Ministers not unnaturally differ from non-official members on the comparative facilities which should be respectively offered to the Government and to independent critics. One of the oddest cross divisions of the House of Commons separates those who have no wish or no hope of office from the acknowledged leaders of both parties on the opposite front benches. For certain purposes those who manage the business of the House must preserve with each other a common understanding which is regarded with an amusing jealousy by some of their followers. On one occasion Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. DISRAELI were almost hooted down by both sides of the House, and, amidst universal gloe, they were outvoted by an enormous majority.

Mr. Lowe, always more solicitous to convince than to conciliate, intimated in proposing the Resolution a distinct preference for Government business over amateur legislation. As he truly said, the Ministers are practically charged with the conduct of all important measures, and they are also responsible for the Estimates and Votes of Supply. In the Select Committee he had proposed that on two nights of the week Supply should have precedence, but he accepted as a compromise the concession of Monday nights; and he further agreed to allow one motion to be made on the question of the Speaker leaving the Chair, provided it referred to the branch of Estimates under discussion for the day. As he clearly explained, the discussion of general notices of motion not only immediately displaces the votes of Supply, but also renders it necessary for the Government on various occasions to bring forward Ministerial Bills in preference to proceeding with the Estimates. The consequence is, that the money votes are postponed to the latter part of the Session, when the morning sittings enable the Government to get through the business with less interruption. The most important practical result is perhaps that the public offices are subjected to additional trouble, and that the Estimates are perfunctorily examined or discussed in Parliament. When they are hereafter, under the new Resolution, introduced early in the Session, they will still, as in former times, be passed with little or no alteration, because those who frame them understand the wants of the various services better than any private members; but on the whole it is decorous and convenient that grants of tens of millions should be brought before the House of Commons when it has leisure to consider them. The form of giving a supply to the Crown is still properly observed; but, if the House of Commons made its liberality dependent on the redress of grievances, it would, under the modern Constitution, only stimulate its own activity by the threat of a penalty to be imposed on itself. The Cabinet, which represents the majority of the House, is responsible for the efficiency of the army, the navy, and the civil service, as well as for the provision of ways and means by which the consequent expense must be met. The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, the SECRETARY for WAR, and the FIRST LORD of the ADMIRALTY can do far more than the House of Commons to control extravagance and to sanction desirable and profitable outlay. Some of the most experienced members of the House concurred in opinion with the Government that one night in the week was not too much to be allowed for the business of Supply. The independent members will still enjoy the use of Wednesday for legislative crotchets, and of Friday for the exposure of grievances. On the rare occasions on which a grave charge is advanced against the Government, Parliamentary custom secures an early opportunity of discussion.

Having obtained with difficulty the consent of the House to the most important of the proposed changes, the Government may perhaps not think it worth while to proceed with the remaining Resolutions. It was on the remonstrance of Mr. DISRAELI that Mr. GLADSTONE withdrew his original motion for the appointment of a new Committee; and he may probably, if Mr. BENTINCK renews the amendment which he withdrew on Monday night, not be disinclined to shelve a question which may otherwise be troublesome. In the course of the last Session he more than once threatened the House with a forfeiture of its power if it declined to modify its forms of proceeding; but the causes of his irritation are no longer operative; and he has perhaps discovered that there is no point on which it is more dangerous to dictate to the House of Commons. The failure of one of the Resolutions, and the narrow majority which bestowed Mondays on the Government, may serve as a warning against the attempt to introduce more ambitious changes. Sir ERSKINE MAY's scheme of Grand Committees to discuss the details of Bills might perhaps be advantageously adopted, but when the plan is discussed, the opponents of change will not fail to remark that, if the practice adopted in appointing Select Committees is followed, all check on the majority will be lost. A Committee on any important matter is habitually, and perhaps necessarily, packed. The custom is to give the supporters of the Government a majority of one; and it is not uncommon to find that the most material questions are decided by a strictly party vote. It was in this way that Mr. GOSCHEN two years ago carried in the form of a Report a pamphlet previously composed by himself; and on the Report he founded a Bill which would have been regarded by a large portion of the community as in the highest degree mischievous and unjust. As the minority in the House could have no claim to a preponderating voice in the Committees, it is not easy to understand how the decisions of Grand Committees could satisfy Parliament; but it may be admitted that the plan is recommended on high authority; and the principal reason for not pressing it on the attention of the House is the dislike with which all internal changes are regarded. There is also a general impression that much of the hindrance which has recently occurred is due to deficient adroitness or imperfect temper on the part of the Government of the day. The House of Commons would inevitably resent an attempt to alter its rules if it believed that the same result might be attained by the exercise of foresight in the introduction of measures, and of tact in the conduct of business.

SPAIN.

IT seems possible that the political regeneration of Spain may ultimately be effected by an able and resolute King. A monarchy which is only in a prospective sense hereditary possesses but a part of the strength which belongs to the institution; but even an elected King is distinguished from an adventurer by the circumstance that he is inseparably identified in interest with the country. Queen ISABELLA herself might have survived the factions which disturbed her reign if she had not yielded to the selfish temptation of religious fanaticism. King AMADEO is not of an age or of a temper to cultivate his own spiritual welfare by the sacrifice of his duties at the expense of his subjects; and all the temporal motives which can influence his conduct tend in the direction of national prosperity, which again depends on internal harmony. The latest of six or seven Ministerial crises which have occurred since his accession appears to have been caused by the personal intervention of the KING to remonstrate against the squabbles of his Ministers. On the morning of a weekly Council Señor SAGASTA, having stated that there was no business which required the KING's attention, was surprised by the answer that nevertheless the KING had something to say to his Ministers. He then proceeded to read to them a formal document, expressing his resolution that there should henceforth be only two great parties in the Cortes and the country. He had no prejudice against either Radicals or Conservatives; but it was impossible to deal with petty sections of either party who were constantly quarrelling among themselves. In the hope that such an adjustment of parties might result from the impending general election, the KING insisted that his Government should abstain from interference with the free choice of the constituencies. When the majority was definitely ascertained he was prepared to support its policy with the aid, or subject to the check, of an organized Opposition. At the close of the interview the Ministers were divided in their interpretation of the KING's rebuke and warning; but, finding that the substance of the Royal letter had been communicated to the press, they ultimately thought it necessary to resign. The various candidates for office and the factions which they represent will have to devise some new combination; but no permanent Ministry can be constituted before the meeting of the Cortes.

The outgoing Cabinet, formed only a month before its retirement, affected to reproduce in some degree the union of parties which had lasted from the time of the Revolution to the death of PRINCE ALFONSO. Although the bulk of the Liberal party held aloof under ZORRILLA, SAGASTA himself professed to be a Progressist, while TOPETE was the acknowledged chief of the moderate Conservative party. The dissolution of the Cortes immediately after the formation of the Ministry seemed to ensure their retention of office for at least two or three months; but some members of the Cabinet thought there was a favourable opportunity for a job, and General GAMINDE, Minister of War, promoted several officers, including a brother of SAGASTA, to the rank of generals. Admiral TOPETE, either because none of the number belonged to the Unionist party, or perhaps in well-founded disapproval of a pernicious practice, objected to the measure, and demanded, on pain of the withdrawal of the support of his party, that General GAMINDE, Señor ANGULO, and two other followers of SAGASTA, should be removed from the Cabinet to make way for as many members of the Liberal Union party. SAGASTA offered a compromise in the dismissal of General GAMINDE, but the proposed victim obstinately refused to sacrifice himself for the benefit of his colleagues. The coalition was accordingly on the eve of rupture when the KING produced or accelerated the crisis by his unexpected allocution. He has since endeavoured to effect an alliance of all the Conservative fractions who would be represented by SERRANO, TOPETE, RÍOS ROSAS, and SAGASTA. As none of them is strong enough to command a separate majority, all the leaders have an interest in suppressing their differences; and it is possible that the KING's remonstrance may have produced a salutary impression; but the seventh or eighth Cabinet within a year could scarcely hope for a prolonged enjoyment of power, even if all political arrangements were not absolutely dependent on the character of the future Cortes. The Progressists can hardly fail to profit in the management of the elections by the petty and bitter dimensions of their adversaries. An Opposition is, in the nature of things, more easily united than a Ministerial party; and at present a follower of TURAT would probably not promote the candidature of an adherent of SAGASTA. The late Cortes was returned under the leadership supremacy of PAIN, whose authority united all the constitutional majority against the Carlist and Republican factions. The political anarchy which has followed his death is the most conspicuous memorial of his great services. It seems probable that his most valuable legacy to the people of Spain will have been the King whom he selected; yet for the present the new Italian dynasty can only be regarded as an experiment.

King AMADEO appears to have studied with unusual care the theory of a Parliamentary Constitution in its latest development. In the repeated changes of Government he has laboured to ascertain the leaning of the Cortes; and he has on more than one occasion refused to accept the resignation of a Minister who might in his opinion still have commanded a majority. The Presidents of the two Chambers have been repeatedly consulted as the best authorities as to the intentions of the Parliament; and the Cortes, if they had known their own minds, might at any time have determined the policy of the Government. The chief political leaders, such as SAGASTA and ZORRILLA, profess to share the King's desire for the establishment of two powerful and well defined parties; yet the assumption that the practical working of the modern English Constitution is founded on an immutable law of nature is hasty, if not paradoxical. The doctrine that the statesmen of a country should choose sides like boys at a cricket-match is a generalization from a narrow and empirical observation. If SAGASTA and half the Cortes think that a certain policy is right, it scarcely follows that the other half should, in concert with ZORRILLA, determine that it is wrong. While PRIN was in power the country was governed on a less artificial system; and if he could have rallied round him the extreme and outlying sections, he would certainly not have regretted the absence of a formal Opposition. The King may have reason to know that it is no longer possible to induce the Liberal Unionists and the Progressives to work together for the public good; but he is unduly sanguine if he supposes that he can consolidate all rival ambitions and jealousies into two solid and opposing forces. GEORGE III., who understood Parliamentary government better than any Continental politician, would have been incapable of appreciating the liberal and enlightened views of the young King of Spain. To him the political opponents of a Ministry which he favoured were malcontents, if not rebels; and he would have been the last to regret any internal quarrels which diminished their efficiency as a party. Modern statesmen are more tolerant or less in earnest, and modern Kings have discovered that impartiality is safer than active intervention. M. THIERS, who provisionally administers the functions of a King of the older type, differs entirely from King AMADEO in his estimate of the duties of an Assembly. If all French parties could be broken up into minuter fragments than those of Spain, they would be more docile or more easily manageable than the great bodies of Legitimists, of Orleanists, and of Republicans. It is true that a King and the President of a Republic govern under different conditions; but probably King AMADEO will sooner or later discover that it is impossible to manage Spain on strictly English principles. The object of party leaders in that country has been rather the acquisition of power for themselves than the promotion of political principles. In former times the rivalry between NARVAEZ and O'DONNELL was almost exclusively personal, and even now it is difficult to understand why SAGASTA and ZORRILLA, who were both members of PAIN's Government, should be necessarily chiefs of hostile parties. When the King has had time to acquire the confidence of the nation, he will probably be able to adopt in many respects an independent course without exciting suspicion or disapproval. It is not impossible that he may in time be recognised as the most honest man in the country, as he is apparently not the least able. His reprimand to his Ministers proves that he is not disposed to acquiesce in a state of chronic fecklessness and disorder; but at the same time he is thoroughly loyal to the Constitution which he has promised to maintain. If the restless competitors for power were capable of statesmanlike foresight, they would reflect that the ultimate struggle will not be among themselves, but between exponents or Parliamentary politicians on one side, and on the other either a King or a military chief. The rumour that all the disaffected factions, Carlists, Republicans and Aflentists, have conspired against the Government is significant, even if it is premature. The supporters of the Monarchy, on the other hand, profess confidence in the loyalty of the army; but generals who are required to give their support to a Government may prefer to sell it for a price. If the moderate majority of the Cortes and its nominees throw away the power which they possess, it will devolve on a different class of rules. In Spain constitutional government is on its trial; and if the experiment fails, the fault will rest with the factions which have wasted a probably irrevocable opportunity.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE EDUCATION QUESTION.

THE Ministers have made up their mind upon the Education question. On Tuesday they will meet Mr. DIXON's motion with an amendment which, in all but form, is a direct negative. Mr. DIXON proposes to condemn the Elementary Education Act on four counts—its failure to secure the general election of School Boards, its omission to make attendance at school obligatory, the liberty given by it to School Boards to tax the community for the maintenance of Denominational schools, and the further liberty given to them to impart dogmatic religious instruction in the schools which they themselves support. Mr. FORSTER declines to go into the inquiry to which the House of Commons is thus invited. The amendment of which he has given notice pleads the shortness of the time which has elapsed since the passing of the Act, and the necessarily incomplete progress which has been made in the arrangements under it, as a reason why the House cannot enter with advantage upon a review of its provisions. The Government is unmistakably right in taking this course. It is no longer possible to consider Mr. DIXON's proposals simply on their several merits. Were this possible, much might be said in favour of making compulsory attendance at school universal, and something perhaps in favour of appointing School Boards in every parish. Taken by themselves, however, any amendments in this direction would only make the Act more obnoxious to Mr. DIXON and those whom he represents. At present, the fact that compulsory attendance is not universal keeps a great part of the country free from controversy about the payment of fees in Denominational schools, while the limitation of School Boards to districts in which there is either a deficiency of school accommodation, or an effective desire to elect them on the part of the ratepayers, prevents that close identification of schools maintained out of the rates with a particular religious denomination which would otherwise be apparent in many rural parishes.

It would have been idle to attempt any compromise with Mr. DIXON on the basis of accepting two parts of his motion and rejecting the other two. Such a proceeding would not have conciliated the Dissenting opposition, while it would have involved the abandonment of a very strong position. Here and there, indeed, there may be Nonconformists whose dislike of the Education Act is founded on its alleged inefficiency in respect of the appointment of School Boards and of compulsory attendance. But the great majority among the Dissenters dislike it because it has incidentally worked to the advantage of the two denominations which have brought most zeal to the promotion of popular education. If the former section of its opponents had their way, there would be only so much the more fuel to feed the indignation of the latter section.

In addition to this, any proposal on the part of the Government to modify the provisions of the Education Act, even as regards the two points on which Mr. DIXON might perhaps make out his case, would be regarded by the Conservatives, and by an important section of the Liberals, as something not far short of a breach of faith. There is a sort of understanding among politicians that an important Act of Parliament is not to be altered in essential particulars within two Sessions of its being passed, unless the arguments brought forward in favour of the change were somehow excluded from consideration in the debates in which the measure was cast in its actual shape. It cannot be said with any truth that this is the case with the Education Act. It is true that the particular difficulty out of which so much controversy has arisen was hardly foreseen until the Act was passed. But though in 1870 the precise form which the antagonism between Denominationalists and Secularists would ultimately take was still undetermined, the existence of such an antagonism was manifest to all men. The reasons which Mr. DIXON will allege in support of his motion on Tuesday will be only a repetition of those urged by him in support of his amendment on the second reading of the Elementary Education Bill. If it could be shown that those who supported the Government two years ago did so in the belief that they were depriving Denominational schools of all aid, direct or indirect, from monies raised by taxation, or that they were ignorant of the important province assigned to Denominational schools in the Ministerial scheme, it might be maintained that the Act was the offspring of a misunderstanding, and that, as such, it ought to be reversed in the light of later knowledge. But neither the contents of the measure nor the declarations of the Government left any room for such a misconception. It was plain on the surface both of the Bill and of Mr. FORSTER'S speeches that its authors looked to the voluntary action of the Denominations to do much of their work for them, and that in return for this assistance the schools maintained by the Denominations were to be placed in a position of perfect equality with those set up by the School Boards. What new plea can Mr. DIXON allege for the readjustment of the question in a spirit of avowed hostility to the schools whose co-operation was thus courted? None, except that the provisions of the Act have worked badly. The answer to this is so obvious that it is strange that the prospect of being met by it should not have induced him to anticipate Mr. FORSTER'S move by postponing his motion at least till another Session. How can the working of an Act of Parliament be fairly criticized before there has been time to ascertain what that working is? It is hard to see how Mr. DIXON can hope to meet this objection. The only results to which he can possibly point in confirmation of his theory are results that were foreseen and counted on two years ago. The Government and the majority of the House of Commons had to make their choice between irritating the Secularists and a section of the Dissenters who for the most part had done very little towards promoting the education of the people, and irritating the great bulk of those who had already made great efforts in the cause of education, and were ready, if generously dealt with, to make similar efforts in the future. No one expected Mr. DIXON to approve of the decision to which Parliament came; but it did not seem too much to expect that he would acquiesce in it until such time as the reliance of the Government on Denominational energy should be proved to be unfounded, or as the Liberal party should have been convinced of its sin in using that energy for a public object. Certainly neither of these conditions has as yet been fulfilled. Instead of Denominational energy having shown itself unequal to the burden laid upon it, the main drift of Mr. DIXON'S complaint is that it has answered to the call in a way which even those who expected most from it failed to foresee. It is the extraordinary increase of Denominational schools that has evoked the passionate hostility of the Dissenters towards the measure under which such an increase was possible, and that has led so many School Boards to prefer paying Denominational schoolmasters to give secular instruction to the children of indigent parents rather than set up schools and schoolmasters for themselves. To the practical educationalist it is a fact of great moment that so many persons should be willing to bear a large part of the expense of giving secular instruction to all the children sent to them, on condition of being allowed to give religious instruction also to some of these children. By this means a School Board can in many cases be done without, and, considering that an education rate is an almost necessary accompaniment of a School Board, this is not a trifling advantage. Is there any evidence to show that the experience of the last eighteen months has made an education rate popular with rural ratepayers? Yet in the absence of such evidence Mr. DIXON'S policy would be tantamount to consigning the execution of the Act to a class which, having no education itself, naturally sees no reason why other people should have it.

This is the issue which is to be decided over again next Tuesday. There is no religious principle involved in it, though many Dissenters have brought themselves to think that liberty of conscience is in some mysterious way at stake. What is involved in it is the fortunes of elementary education. The Dissenters have taken a line which for all practical purposes is one of simple obstruction. They will not consent to secular instruction being given by, and to a considerable extent at the cost of, the persons who give religious instruction. If this objection is recognized, the inevitable consequence will be that secular instruction will be given very imperfectly, and sometimes not at all. There will be the same conflicts between the Education Department and the more obstinate School Boards that there have been between the Poor Law Board and the more obstinate Boards of Guardians. In the long run, no doubt, the Education Department will win; but before that day comes, a whole generation of children will have grown up in ignorance. There is no fear that Mr. DIXON'S motion will be successful, but it is nevertheless of great moment that the nature of the issue raised by it should be clearly understood. Mr. FORSTER is charged with having betrayed the Nonconformists. It is a sufficient answer that he could not have acted otherwise without betraying the cause of education. The Nonconformists have chosen to put themselves in a position in which fidelity to them is treachery to the community. They must not wonder that they are deserted by statesmen and patriots when they insist on preferring the ignoble interests of their narrow sects to the accomplishment of a great national purpose.

PAY AND EXPENSES IN THE ARMY.

MR. CARDWELL'S statement of last week did not deal with the question of the pay of officers, but it will, we think, before long be found absolutely necessary to consider the subject. The financial position of the soldier has during the last hundred years improved considerably; yet, notwithstanding that the expense of living has very much increased, the pay of the officer has remained fixed. In comparison, therefore, not only with the soldier, but with all persons in the service of private employers, and with the prices of the necessaries of life, the officer is much worse off now than he was formerly. At present it is impossible for a subaltern to live on his pay; a captain obtains from it a bare subsistence, and even in the case of an unmarried field officer the margin for luxuries is very small. It is notorious that badly paid work is generally synonymous with badly performed work. Further, the fact that a man who has completed his apprenticeship cannot live by his profession is apt to produce a want of self-respect. There are also other reasons for revising the existing scale of the pay of officers. Hitherto the army has not been looked upon as a profession by which a man might earn his bread. Only an insignificant minority of men possessing no private incomes have up to the present time accepted commissions. Henceforth, we are told, the army is to be open to every young man of talent, and the country insists that the career of arms shall be a genuine, earnest, and hard-working profession from which all idleness, incapacity, and mediocrity will be excluded. This theory is all very well; but if able men are to be attracted, attractions must be offered to them, and if soldiering is to be a profession, it must possess the conditions of a profession, and afford something more than honour and social position. Every other profession either affords a respectable subsistence from the first, or else holds out to the clever and industrious man a fair chance of competence ere middle life is reached, and a few grand prizes at a later period. The army holds forth neither of these inducements, and till it does, it will not divert its fair share of talent from the law, medicine, commerce, and civil engineering.

It is certain, however, that before the House of Commons will listen to any proposal for granting officers an increase of pay, it will demand that the extravagance now so rife among military men shall cease. How great this extravagance is money-lenders could tell, and the records of the Court of Bankruptcy sufficiently prove. We do not here refer to exceptional, but to habitual and almost compulsory, extravagance. The chief causes of this extravagance may be summed up in two current phrases of fatal and disastrous import. One is, "We must live like gentlemen"; the other is, "It is incumbent on us to keep up the credit of the regiment." Yet in the navy, as a rule, officers contrive to keep up their position and the credit of their ships without either running into debt or making constant demands on the paternal purse. It is well known that neither naval nor military officers are as a body rich; but while the latter, from false, and we must add vulgar shame, try to disguise a fact incapable of permanent concealment, the former honestly, and with manly self-respect, accept their position. Except in the very junior ranks a naval officer manages to live on his pay. In the army a subaltern cannot get on without an allowance of 100*l.* a-year, and even with that the closest economy is required to avoid debt. Government may doubtless accomplish much in the way of reform, and we gladly recognize in Mr. CARDWELL'S speech a sincere effort in this direction; but unless supported by public opinion—influenced by the senior officers—it can never thoroughly succeed. Moreover, any attempt to curb extravagance must be conducted systematically, or it will fail. Some sixteen years ago the Duke of CAMBRIDGE did make an effort to diminish the mess expenses at Aldershot, and eleven years later his example was followed as regards the Bengal army by Lord SANDHURST. The question not having, however, been dealt with systematically and as a whole, and, above all, but little perseverance having been shown, all the circulars and orders on the subject were soon treated as so much waste-paper. Perhaps the time for vigorous action had not arrived. Now, however, when a complete revolution in our military system is taking place, is the time for arresting a levissimum of expenditure which is quite inconsistent both with the means of officers and with that simplicity of living which should be the characteristic of an earnest, hard-working profession. One reason for the comparative extravagance of living which has hitherto prevailed in the army is perhaps that the subaltern, finding it quite impossible to live on his pay, is not over-scrupulous as to the extent to which his expenditure is carried. If with economy he could live by his profession, he would have the less excuse for extravagance, and the evil could be more easily checked by the authorities, as it is in the navy..

Let us notice the chief sources of the present excessive expenditure. These are two in number—namely, dress and the mess; and they were both referred to in Mr. CARDWELL's statement. In all armies, save the English army, it is the exception, not the rule, to wear plain clothes when not on duty. A century ago English officers could always be distinguished by their dress. Now it seems to be the fashion for them to aim at being taken for civilians whenever they are not actually in the performance of some military duty, and, seeing that the head-quarter staff sets the example, this is not to be wondered at. To judge from appearances the British officer is ashamed instead of being proud of his profession. The evil of this piece of false vanity is twofold. In the first place, it tends to make officers look on soldiering as an interlude rather than the business of their lives. In the second place, the expenses of officers are thereby unnecessarily increased. A moderate estimate of the extra expenditure thus produced is 30*l.* per annum. In our opinion plain clothes should seldom be worn by officers on full pay save when travelling, or engaged in field or athletic sports. The officer who is ashamed of his cloth is wanting in that professional pride which should distinguish him. Again, the officer's pocket might be greatly saved by a diminution in the present variety of uniform, and by making it the fashion that uniforms should be made by the regimental tailor, and accoutrements supplied from the regimental store. It is notorious that it requires a good memory in a cavalry or Highland officer to know what his dress should be under every diversity of circumstance, and the bill of the army outfitter and tailor has wrung many a groan from fathers' hearts. Besides, the terms tailor and money-lender are not seldom synonymous. Abolish the army tailor, and you at once circumscribe money-lending. The other great source of extravagance is the mess, with its concomitant expenses. Few officers can keep their mess bills under 10*l.* a month, while in many cases they double that sum. An officer has just informed us that a few years ago, when quartered at Gibraltar, his bill, though he was unmarried, and never dined at mess save on special occasions such as inspection dinners, amounted on an average to 5*l.* a month. The 10*l.* a month which may be taken as a not undue average for the bachelor officer includes not only the cost of his own breakfast, luncheon, and dinner, but those of mess guests and general expenses. Indeed the surplus over his own personal expenses for actual food may be estimated at not less than 20 per cent. Can anything be more absurd and wrong than that men whose incomes average perhaps from 250*l.* to 300*l.* a year, including all ranks, but of course excluding those who are exceptionally rich, should live in the style of the possessors of 10,000*l.* a year? The mess dinner includes soup, fish, French dishes, game, and elaborate sweets—fare which most of the partakers of it never tasted before they entered the army, and which they never see when they return home on leave. The majority of officers are the sons of clergymen or other professional men, or of squires with a moderate estate and immoderate families. At their fathers' houses the dinner consists of a plain soup or cheap fish, a joint and tart or simple pudding, washed down with beer and Marsala, light claret, or some other inexpensive wine. At mess, the subaltern, however freshly caught, grumbles if both rich soup and expensive fish are not provided, criticizes the made dishes which up to a month or two previously he had never heard of, and insists on game or poultry, whatever its price. As to the wine, in nine cases out of ten he pronounces the mess sherry "beastly," and on the slightest provocation indulges in dry champagne, of which he affects to be a connoisseur. At his father's table the plate was probably electro, and was limited to forks and spoons. At mess it is considered essential to have massive candelabra, silver forks, spoons, and dishes, and elaborate centrepieces, to purchase and keep up which special subscriptions are occasionally called for. If any prudent officer ventures to suggest the advisableness of economy, he is snubbed by his comrades with the remark that they must live like gentlemen, and must have a mess fit to ask guests to. It strikes him that it would be more gentlemanlike to avoid debt, while, as for guests, those who only come for the sake of a luxurious dinner are not worth inviting. Another argument in support of extravagance is that it is necessary to make some return for the hospitality of the neighbouring gentry. By all means, we say, be hospitable, but to attempt to vie with neighbouring magnates is not only ruinous but ridiculous. Officers succeed, at the cost of debt and ruin to many of their number, in making a false display of wealth, but every one knows perfectly well that they are, on the contrary, comparatively poor. It is absurd to argue that they pay individually little for the results they obtain, and that they merely take advantage of the co-operative principle. If by clubbing together they can secure a luxurious dinner at half-a-crown a head, it is evident that, by adopting the same expedient, they could obtain a good plain meal for half that sum, and they would still fare as well as their fathers and brothers.

In addition to the expenses we have mentioned, there is a special tax of a most onerous nature, which, though technically a voluntary subscription, is in reality obligatory. We refer to regimental balls. The cost of these varies in different regiments and under various circumstances. It is scarcely ever less than 5*l.* a head, generally amounts to 10*l.*, and occasionally is as high as 25*l.* or 30*l.* In the case of a ball given by a regiment at a certain Northern city a year or two ago, ladies were presented with fans at the door, perfumed fountains were scattered all over the rooms, and the supper was obtained from Paris. No London fine lady, with twenty or thirty thousand a year, would deem it necessary to be so lavish; why therefore should some thirty officers, possessing average incomes of at the most 300*l.* a year, indulge in such extravagance? No wonder that keeping up the credit of the regiment cost on that occasion upwards of 25*l.* a head. Indeed, that sum does not seem to be considered excessive, for it is estimated that it will cost the officers of another regiment, notoriously poor, no less than 25*l.* a head to return the hospitality of their neighbours in the same city. The total income of many of the subscribers does not, we may safely assert, exceed 200*l.*, which is scarcely proportionate to an expenditure of 25*l.* for one night's display. It is really time that such mischievous follies should be checked by the authorities and discouraged by the good sense of the older officers. Nor would there be either difficulty in so doing or lack of precedent for repressive measures. In the Navy the captain is held responsible that the mess expenses of his officers are kept within reasonable bounds. Why should not the colonel of a regiment be required to interpose his authority to prevent the credit of the regiment, the social position of the officers, and the goodwill of the neighbours, being purchased at their present exorbitant price?

CROWDS.

AS a rule, we see human nature by retail. We judge of our fellow-creatures as the student judges of a geological formation from hand specimens. It requires an imaginative effort of which few people are capable to construct a picture of the Sahara from a peck of dust, or of the human race from the half-dozen specimens with whose peculiarities we are intimately acquainted. It is worth while, therefore, to take advantage of an occasional opportunity for observing the phenomena presented by a vast crowd, and to have actually before our eyes an appreciable fraction of that object of which we talk so much and about which most of us know so little—the people of England. It is useless, indeed, to disguise the fact that a crowd, considered simply as a crowd and without reference to any ulterior object, is a highly disagreeable phenomenon. We have always wondered that Balaam, who was presumably not a sentimental person, expected to find it easier to curse the Israelites when he could only see a small portion of them. We are rather inclined to agree with Swift, that, although Tom, Dick, and Harry may be very amiable persons, a mixed assortment of precisely similar Toms, Dicks, and Harrys becomes rapidly detestable. The satisfaction which a crowd takes in seeing itself is, however, a notorious, if an inexplicable phenomenon. It almost upsets the philosophical theory that every event must have a cause. A crowd is often its own cause; or at least it resembles a planetary system in which there is no central sun, but each unit is kept in place simply by the combined attraction of all the other units. Though this was of course not the case on Tuesday last, it was true even of that occasion that the pleasure of which we are speaking was an ingredient, to an amount not easily determinable, in the motives which attracted people. The sentiment may perhaps be a relic of some distant age when man was a gregarious animal. Mr. Darwin has not yet arranged the precise line of our ancestry, but a good deal that is singular in human nature would be explained if it could be proved that one of our remote ancestors was a sheep. Whatever the ultimate cause, however, of this conglomerative or swarming instinct, we may learn many useful lessons whilst gratifying our strange propensity. A mob is in every respect a phenomenon worth studying. It is, for example, a practical exemplification of the strange power of human sympathy; the feeling produced is not a simple aggregate of what each individual would feel separately, but rises in some complex ratio as the emotion of the unit is intensified by the reflection of his own thoughts from the surrounding multitude. To realize fully the working of this curious action and reaction is to understand the philosophy of revolutions, crusades, or any great popular outburst of feeling. A mob may be regarded as the spiritual analogue of an electric battery, and politicians of a higher order than the orators of Trafalgar Square may do well to become familiar with this potent machinery. And, indeed, for Englishmen at this moment the problem is especially interesting. The mob went out on Tuesday to see the Heir-Apparent to the monarchy; but, if certain persons are to be believed, the mob was the Heir-Apparent itself. It was a specimen of our future master, if the prognostications of dismal Conservatives and sanguine demagogues are well founded; and assuming that there is a remote chance of such a consummation, one would rather like to know what are his tastes, opinions, and character. Is Leviathan, as Hobbes called him, likely to be a gentle or a brutal master? Does he show a taste for the guillotine, or is he likely to be of a lethargic temperament, and to bound his ambition to unlimited beer and plenty of holidays?

Probably we should be favourably impressed by the experience of Tuesday. After all, a British mob is generally conspicuous, and on such an occasion it is of course more than usually conspicuous, for a certain rough good-nature. There is not a bit of malice in it. A mob, it is true, may occasionally lose its temper at an election, or under the eloquence of a Protestant denouncer of the Scarlet Lady, or when it is moved by actual hunger or misery. But at the worst it is not bloodthirsty, as a French or an Irish mob is sometimes bloodthirsty. It is more given to horse-play than to absolute fury. It is not likely to cut your throat, hang you to a lamp-post, or drag your dead body through the streets, though it is not impossible that it may unintentionally knock out your brains with a brickbat. Even those two hundred persons at Reading station, who, to Mr. Odger's imagination, resembled a herd of "starving wolves," only succeeded in tearing his coat and forcing him to take refuge in a somewhat undignified, but not very inaccessible, refuge—rather a gentle exhibition of lupine ferocity. Even on the most serious occasions, an English mob has a coolness of temper, or a sense of humour, or some other undefinable instinct, which fits it rather for practical jokes than for graver outbursts of brutality. It always seems to be dimly aware that there is a comic side to its proceedings, and it is most judiciously reluctant to take a high moral tone, or, in other words, to become actively offensive. On the other hand, it cannot be denied that it is equally conspicuous for a certain helpless stupidity or pithlessness, which is occasionally irritating in the extreme. It cannot be said, for example, that Englishmen are generally aware of the fact that a thousand people will pass through an opening two feet wide more readily if they walk in file than if they insist upon all going abreast. They show a lordly indifference to the inexorable laws of space which is imposing, as all sheer stolidity is imposing, but is apt to lead to crushed ribs under the conditions of concrete existence. And finally, every mob, English or otherwise, has a happy facility in combining the extremes of rashness and cowardice. The ordinary rough appears to believe, or at any rate he acts as if he believed, that the bough of an elm-tree is capable of bearing for an indefinite period just as many human beings as can be placed upon it side by side; and when it snaps, as a tree corrupted by a long residence in London may be excused for snapping, he regards the accident as totally unprecedented, and probably due to a special interposition of Providence. He is not the less liable to the most groundless panics, and is likely to be just as easily convinced that St. Paul's is being upset by the crowd as that a deal beach with no particular support will bear any number of tons weight.

Now it cannot be said that we have been describing a model ruler of mankind; and indeed it has not been as yet proposed that the functions of government should be exercised by a mob pure and simple. There is no arguing from the mass to the units of which it is composed. A mob of statesmen, philosophers, or divines, if such a mob could be collected, would be just as thoughtless and impulsive as the mob of ordinary cockneys; and the humours of the crowd can no more be adduced as an argument that they will not exercise their political power judiciously on the polling-booths than the follies of a mob of Oxford undergraduates at a Commemoration would prove that they are incapable of doing well in the Schools. And it is true that anybody who has seen a well-dressed mob at a public meeting or an evening party will admit that in many respects it is not much more sensible than the less polished crowds which fill our streets on a public occasion. It is a little more subdued in manner, but without it is essentially as selfish, cowardly, and impulsive. The weakness of a mob, we have said, are not merely the sum of the weaknesses of its individual members, but are somehow developed like certain diseases by the simple process of placing a number of human beings on an unduly limited space of ground. And yet, after making every allowance, it must be admitted that the sight of a vast crowd is rather trying for the faith of a Thengiving democrat. The problem of all constitutional monarchies is in some way or other to bring together the wisdom of a nation, and to give to it the principal functions of its ruling. Now, whatever may be the form of the democratic argument, it must be admitted that the first impression produced by the sight of a great crowd is that the task in question must be uncommonly difficult. There is obviously such a vast superincumbent mass—not of wickedness, or even bad intentions—but of sheer unadulterated stupidity. The golden grains dispersed through the sands of a river, or the needle in a bottle of hay, are ineffectual symbols of the proportion between the wisdom and its opposite. One thinks, on the one hand, of the intricate problems which come up for the consideration of Parliament, of the vast Empire that has to be governed on more or less intelligible principles, of the financial and social and legal reforms that are needed, of the vast amount of knowledge required to supply the mere bases on which an opinion must be formed, and of the learning required to enable a man to go through any process worthy of the name of reasoning upon the data when discovered; and, on the other hand, one counts up the proportion of the crowd which presents even a prima facie appearance of knowing that there are such difficulties, to say nothing of knowing how to meet them. What an infinitesimal number of persons are there in any large mob who are fit, for example, to pronounce upon our Indian policy, on the view which we ought to take of Prince Bismarck, or on the American difficulty, or the best modes of educational or sanitary reform? We know very few, even amongst the most educated classes, whose opinions we should be inclined to accept on these or on a dozen other subjects; and the enormous majority of the people before us depend for their knowledge on some fragment of a stump oration, or on the dictum of some writer of second-rate articles who is all but as ignorant as themselves. And yet there are many sober and serious reformers who proclaim, and to all appearance believe, that the political salvation of mankind depends upon allowing all these people to have a voice in matters of which they are as ignorant as they are of the mode of calculating the path of a comet. One gentleman thinks that everything will go well when Parliament is arranged so as to present a photographic miniature of every shade of opinion in the country, so that, if there are ninety-nine fools to one wise man, one-hundredth part of the House of Commons should be wise. Another thinks that the political atmosphere will be purified as soon as we give votes to all the female fools as well as to all the male fools. When we see before our eyes the mass of our fellow-countrywomen—very excellent mothers, sisters, housemaids, and washerwomen, it may be, but dependent for their political knowledge on the scraps which fall from the table of their male relations—we have a dim sense of wonder at the faith of these reformers. Surely they must fancy themselves to be in possession of the philosopher's stone when they fancy that they can transmute this mass of ignorance into the pure ore of political wisdom.

There are, we are aware, many consolations which may be applied to these natural misgivings. It may be said, for example, that even our legislators are as great fools as the rest of us, and that in this world we must be content to rub on through a series of blinders. Or it may be urged that, if the masses are ignorant, they have good instincts, and can tell who is seeking their good, though they may not be able to judge independently of the merit of the measures proposed. To discuss any such suggestions would lead us into the whole theory of politics, which is perhaps scarcely admissible at the end of an article. We must be content to remark that an honest democrat will probably ask himself some such questions as we have suggested; and perhaps, when he has looked the people fairly in the face, and seen how much mud goes to how much gold in the composition of his idol, he will console himself with some of the off-hand solutions of the problem that are offered to us by ordinary reformers.

LAST TUESDAY.

AFTER making due deduction from the gushing enthusiasm and hysterical rhapsodies of some of our more emotional contemporaries, it must be admitted that the Thengiving of Tuesday is an historical event of considerable significance, and that everybody is entitled to shake hands over it, and to exchange sincere and hearty congratulations on the success which attended it. The procession was punctual; the Queen and Prince of Wales entered thoroughly into the spirit of the day, and bowed incessantly with a frank, cordial recognition of the popular greeting which they everywhere received; the crowds on their part were good-natured and orderly, and the authorities who had charge of the arrangements contrived that, as far as the proceedings in the daytime were concerned, everything should go off smoothly and agreeably. It is not always that such a happy conjunction of pleasant circumstances can be secured. The Times Telegraph is good enough to say that it is proud of its countrymen, and declines to measure its words, or timidly to abate its praise and admiration. Whether its countrymen are proud of the Times Telegraph is another matter; but there is certainly no trace of timidity in its glowing rhetoric, and if it has not measured its words, we have done so for it, and find that they fill some twenty-six columns of dense type, and that they form an unbroken column of the very longest and finest words in the language, mixed up with loose magnificence and Oriental splendour. From a short sentence we learn that the Queen's carriage was drawn by a trumpet whose blast was the loudest ever heard, and that the royal procession was seen through the land in a magnificent manner. This sort of writing may not have much to do with the practical details but it conveys a vivid idea of the kind of confused gorgeousness which characterized the decorations of the day, and may be described as typographical hunting. The other papers of Wednesday were equally copious, though less resplendent, in their narratives of the proceedings, and anybody who has gone through the various reports, or even one or two of them, will perhaps hardly be disposed to read any more on the subject. It may be worth while, however, just to put together briefly and simply some of the features of this really great spectacle. In the first place, the route of the procession from Buckingham Palace to St. Paul's by the line of the Strand and back by Oxford Street is rather more than seven miles in length; and along the whole of this distance the pavement on each side, the houses, roofs, temporary stands, side streets, and open spaces were thronged by an innumerable multitude. A portion of the crowd may have "doubled," as the actors say, assisting first at the going and then at the return of the procession; but the ground was occupied so early along the whole route that there could not have been much room for those who arrived late; and it may be assumed that the crowds in Oxford Street were quite distinct from the crowds which had previously gathered along the Strand. Thus there were seven miles of people closely packed on each side of the way, and here and there spreading out, as at Buckingham Palace and Trafalgar Square, into a vast sea of upturned faces. This was a sight of which any Sovereign might well be proud, and which hardly any other than our own could have commanded. And then there was the cheering. Salvoes of cannon are as nothing compared to the great shout an hour long which followed the Royal party, and which was kept up continuously, without the slightest pause or lull, along the whole line. For a good hour and more going, and for another hour coming back, there was a tumultuous, unintermittent, deafening roar from the throats of hundreds of thousands. The multitude was undoubtedly the best part of the show; and the Prince would have been more or less than man if he had failed to be profoundly touched by the sympathetic and kindly anxiety which was expressed in the glance of those myriad eyes:—

You would have thought the very windows spake,
So many greedy looks of young and old
Through casements darted their desiring eyes
Upon his visage; and that all the walls,
With painted imagery, had said at once,
Jesu preserve thee!

If there was not much fancy or variety in the decoration of the streets, there was at any rate no stint of bright colours and glittering gaude; and the general effect was blithe and cheery. There would probably have been more order, more obvious art in a French display, and the Germans on such an occasion would have come out strong in emblems and allegories. There is a kind of simple child-like poetry in the German mind which runs naturally to allegory. But Englishmen, either because, if they are poetical at all, they are poetical in a deeper way, or because they are more realistic, are usually not good at this sort of thing, and avoid it. At St. Dunstan's a kind of emblematic illustration of the force of prayer was exhibited; but it was hardly a success. The crowd identified the attendants at the patient's bedside with the doctors, and wondered why they should be arrayed in robes of gold and colours. There seemed indeed to be a good deal of curiosity about the doctors, and some surprise was felt that they were not included in the procession. The Prince's recovery would appear to be more intimately associated in the popular mind with Dr. Gull and the glass of bitter beer than with the bench of bishops. One of the inscriptions in the streets was tolerably comprehensive in its acknowledgments, and in the way of doggerel was, at least as good as Mr. Stone's hymn:—

To God who spared his life,
To Jenner, Gull, and Lowe,
And to the Princess wife,
Our gratitude we owe.

There is a comic side to the gravest subjects, and the crowd found plenty to amuse them in the incidents of the day. An admiral on horseback appears to have excited great admiration by the skilful manner in which he beat up to windward and ported helm on his rather lively craft. It was suggested that perhaps he would have been more at ease in the Speaker's state coach, which swung on its old leather straps like a hammock in a storm. The Nonconformists who were present must have been gratified by the sight of the Archbishop of Canterbury in the custody of a couple of mounted policemen, an omen of the doom which Mr. Miall is preparing for him. The Lord Mayor and Sheriffs went through their part of the performance with great heroism and gallantry. There are some things which it is difficult to accomplish with perfect dignity, and one of these perhaps is to mount a horse with the aid of a ladder and the many hands of a crowd of hunkies and policemen, more especially when the daring equestrian is arrayed in a voluminous crimson cloak, a tippet of ermine, and a big cocked hat. Once on horseback, however, the Lord Mayor, with his great sword pointed in air, looked sufficiently imposing, and his cloak hid the ampler in charge of his steed. The Sheriffs also had the aid of the sergeants to get up into the saddle; but it was thought better not to dismount the Aldermen and Common Councilmen, who, having been privately adjusted on horseback, were left there for an hour or so till it was time for the cortege to move off. A good many people, hopeless of seeing the show, contented themselves with watching the embarkation of Lords and Commons at Westminster Bridge. After accommodating members' wives, it was found that some spare room still remained, and Mr. Montague Guest was pacified by a kind of half-handed recognition being extended to "members' ladies." When the steamers were on their way to St. Paul's, a lot of gamblers on one of the bridges called out, "Have yer got lilka with yer?" It has since been thought worth while to make an authoritative announcement that the President designate of the British Republic of the future did not join in the thanksgiving for the recovery of the Prince of Wales. It appears that Mr. Bradlaugh also declined the Lord Chamberlain's civilities. Inside the Cathedral the scene was certainly very grand and impressive, and it was generally remarked that it would be difficult to find another edifice so well adapted for such a purpose. The decorations were meagre, but the people furnished a certain amount of colour to light up the building. There was a sufficient number of brilliant uniforms to supply several stripes and patches of bright colour in the area, and the ladies' dresses took off the sombreness of their black-coated companions. Although curiosity and an exhilarating sense of a bright pageant were perhaps more predominant than any other feelings before the service commenced, it was impossible not to trace the influence of tender and solemn thoughts as it proceeded.

The proceedings of the evening suggest the remark that if an illumination is worth doing it is worth doing well. The present practice of illumination imposes a burden on individuals for the gratification of society, and appears calculated to produce the least satisfactory result, with a large expense of money and unpleasant apprehensions, which are always more or less realized, of distressing accidents. The scene in Saville Row was disgraceful to the authorities who permitted it. A dense crowd collected to see the illumination of a house which has acquired celebrity by previous displays, and carriages were permitted to drive through this crowd, so as to increase the liability, which must necessarily be great, to overwhelming pressure. There was perhaps a grim propriety in the selection for such proceedings of Saville Row, where a case of semi-suffocation, or of fractured limb, would be certain to be treated by the best medical and surgical skill in London. The iron railings and stone steps, against which sudden pressure must drive the weaker members of the crowd, might probably aggravate the mischief, for which, however, special means of alleviation would be found within the houses. Let any person who doubts the justice of our complaint against the police who permitted such proceedings inspect the locality by daylight. It would have been quite bad enough to allow that to be done which necessarily attracted a large crowd into a street from which egress at either end is narrow and indirect. But to suffer this crowd to be invaded by carriages was monstrous. If carriages are to be permitted at all on these occasions, which we greatly doubt, they ought to be confined to the broadest streets and compelled to drive slowly. But we go the length of saying, that if a tradesman is desirous to display loyalty and patriotism, he ought to find some other method than the illumination of his shop front in a narrow or inaccessible street. Let the householders of the principal streets, who are generally expected to illuminate, subscribe to raise a fund for a display of fireworks in the Parks, and if subscriptions do not suffice, let public money be voted for the purpose. Considering the gratification to a vast population which such displays afford, no expenditure on any object not necessary could be more laudable. Besides fireworks, there might be such effects as were produced on Tuesday evening by circles of coloured lamps around the dome of St. Paul's. They could be seen from any open space from which the Cathedral is visible, and thus they rather attracted people from, instead of towards, danger. An illumination of the Houses of Parliament would be visible from great part of the Thames Embankment, and if the stairs leading to the river were duly fenced and carriages prohibited, a vast multitude could be assembled without danger and to their great enjoyment. Instead of attracting the turbulent East-enders to the more civilized parts of London, they should be entertained with fireworks in Victoria Park and illuminations of conspicuous buildings in their own neighbourhood. It must not be forgotten that three of the most dangerous places in London on Tuesday evening were St. Paul's Churchyard, Ludgate Hill, and Temple Bar, and it was the action of public authorities which drew together the crowds in which the greatest number of casualties occurred. The width of Farringdon Street interposing between Fleet Street and Ludgate Hill enabled the decorations of the triumphal arch to be viewed without the peril which attended a near approach to the Cathedral or Temple Bar. Considering the extent to which the City has been cleared in recent years, it seems wonderful that the Corporation should invite the public to crush itself to death in streets and places which still remain unwidened. Take their own recent work, the Holborn Viaduct, which they should delight to glorify. They might have produced there a far finer effect than at Temple Bar, and it would have been seen without danger by as many people as Farringdon Street would hold. If we go West we find Trafalgar Square, where surely Government might do something to amuse the public on such a festival without endangering their lives. It might at least have been expected that Lord Nelson would have figured as a part of the display. There are also those empty, dreary spaces beside the Embankment, and there is the river, and there are all in order not to bring ourselves into collision with the economic principles of Mr. Lowe, we will venture to suggest that the Metropolitan Board of Works might be empowered on certain occasions of special rejoicing to expend a limited sum in the nocturnal ornamentation of the capital on a comprehensive system, and with due regard to the suggestions of decorative art. An infinitely small addition to the general rate now paid would relieve tradesmen from the future obligation to exhibit, and ourselves from that of again beholding a wearisome succession of stars, crowns, initials, and other devices, showing much less variety than the shapes of the houses to which they are affixed. We are aware that some tradesmen may regard illumination not as a costly burden, but as a profitable advertisement, and in this point of view the present system is particularly objectionable. Perhaps the strongest impression which remains after one of these displays is that of its general meanness and poverty of invention, and the palpably commercial motive of some of the most successful efforts that were made. As was said on a memorable occasion, "We cannot be all tailors," and therefore if the metropolis is to be illuminated it ought to be done at the general expense, and on the principle of aiming at a few grand and widely seen effects. We should have thought that something might have been done at the Victoria Tower which would have gratified every person who could stand upon the Embankment or float upon the Thames. It was said that the fireworks prepared for the national festival held on the conclusion of peace with Russia were not all expended, and that the residue were returned into store, where perhaps they still remain. We should imagine that the resources of Woolwich Arsenal would be available for pyrotechnic work at moderate expense; and certainly, if bonfires were desired, the materials would be forthcoming to any extent from the public offices. The Admiralty, for example, might contribute an enormous mass of Reports and correspondence which have never been arranged, and therefore are practically useless; and the Home Office might send Mr. Bruce's abortive Bills, which would supply enough waste paper for any reasonable quantity of fireworks.

Returning, however, to the point from which we started, we must emphatically express the wish that London may never again arrange for itself an evening's amusement which is certain to end in bringing sorrow into several or perhaps many households. We propose, as regards Temple Bar and St. Paul's Churchyard, the same test that we have applied to Saville Row. Let readers go and look at the places, and say whether any reasonable persons charged with local government would invite or encourage masses of people to concentrate themselves there after nightfall. The City Police are entitled to credit for having excluded carriages from their jurisdiction; but although in this respect they showed prudence, they cannot be exculpated from blame for not foreseeing that which actually occurred. "At a quarter to 10 o'clock there was a terrible crush of people at Temple Bar. One man was killed and several other persons dreadfully injured." When this country pays the indirect damages for the Alabama's cruise, the City authorities ought to be put upon their trial for causing this man's death. It is impossible to read the list of injuries which has been published without feeling that they painfully deform a picture which otherwise the nation might look back upon with pride and joy.

THE LITERARY USES OF FOLLY.

CONSIDERING how irritating and irksome folly is when we come to close quarters with it, how what Hawthorne calls the intolerable proximity of a fool makes life a difficulty and a weariness, mankind shows a seeming inconsistency in its delight in the delinquency of folly. Yet certain it is that there is hardly any subject more attractive in the whole range of literature, or any characteristic of humanity that more exercises the observation, research, and powers of analysis of wise and witty men. Every student of human nature and society, from the Son of Sirach downwards, has exercised his keenest intelligence on the anatomy of folly, whether in the abstract or in some particular example. Especially is it meat and drink to the wit to see a fool, to penetrate into the inside of him, to detect the springs of action, to trace the vagaries of his shuttlecock mind, to take him off. And he is encouraged in this employment by a certainty of sympathy. His hearer or reader is sure to meet him half way. If he likes to talk of folly, we like to listen: so long as it is folly at arm's length an unfailling interest hangs about the subject, high and low, vulgar and refined, the fool is a fascination to them all. Of course at first sight this looks very much like pride. If we laugh at fools in print or on the stage, it is an assumed evidence of self-love; we deride folly because we think we are, at least by comparison, wise. But there is probably another side to this partiality. The fool amuses us, not because he is a monster, but because he is one of ourselves. To a certain point we can always fraternize with the laughter-moving fool, either in the object he aims at or in his mode of seeking it. If both the object and the mode were foreign to our nature, we should view the portraiture with indifference as a dull failure. We cannot be diverted by an exhibition of human weakness apart from sympathy. We see ourselves in the fool we laugh at, knowing too well that our wisdom does not make away with our folly, but only keeps it under. We differ in this, that with the ideal fool folly is never a concealed quality; it is always uppermost, it is what he values himself upon. We confess that in ourselves something may be found akin to his extravagances, but discretion and judgment befriend us. So when the satirist boasts of some pre-eminently successful presentation of folly, he bids us believe that it is not a caricature of this or that man amongst us, but He's knight o' the shire and represents you all.

And if it is not self-love but self-knowledge that keeps the subject in perennial freshness and interest, yet it is not all humility either. The fool exhibits in an extraordinary degree human vivacity; a quality excellent in itself, yet one on which thought and discretion not seldom act as drags. We could all be brighter than we are if we were not afraid of being foolish. We hold ourselves in check, but we admire energy and self-assertion; and are not these special characteristics of the fool proper? We do not recognize as such a man of feeble volition—shy, reserved, dull-spirited; a man so characterized may lack understanding, but he does not offer the points and marks proper to our present subject. There is no fool either in satire or experience who does not show an exceptional vitality, a delight in making his nature manifest; and so long as we are concerned with him only as a spectacle, we feel ourselves bricker and more capable under the influence of his sprightliness.

Folly is a flash, a prominence, an attraction. There are people who are really great in all their qualities—who cannot help making a figure, an appearance, whenever they show themselves. Next to them come the fools. An unobtrusive fool is a contradiction in terms. The spirit of folly is combustible, and flames out on the smallest provocation; vitality is necessary to keep men thus conspicuous in any field. Folly is, in truth, an enduring, long-lived quality. What Charles Lamb says tenderly of a foppish schoolfellow who died prematurely is felt as a truth by us all:—"When men go off so early, it scarce seems a noticeable thing in their epitaph whether they have been wise or silly in their lifetime." Folly being thus long-lived and self-satisfying, it is perhaps no very great reproach to mankind that we pity a man for being blind and lame, but never pity him for being a fool. There must always be an appeal for pity before we bestow it—a mute appeal perhaps, but still our pity is asked for. The fool who asked for your compassion in good faith would by the act withdraw himself from the category of fools.

A creature thus vivacious, forward, apt at self-display, exhibiting in broad, bold characters the commonest impulses, desires, ambitions of humanity, naturally takes a prominent place in all pictures of human nature. All literature gives evidence of the attraction. Folly, indeed, while literature was in abeyance, became a profession, and as such has embarrassed our language with a merely technical use of the word. People could not do without the diversion which the exhibition of it in books and on the stage now affords us, so they took the rude, straightforward course of making it a livelihood. Of such Ben Jonson sings:—

Fools, they are the only nation
Worth men's envy, or admiration;
Free from care or sorrow-taking,
Selves and others merry-making;
All they speak, or do, is sterling.
Your fool he is your great man's darling,
And your lady's sport and pleasure;
Tongue and bauble are his treasure.

But the folly which gets its own living—which thus makes and not mares—has absolutely no modern characteristic. Jonson in his Alchemist has plenty of fools—hungry dupes preyed upon by sharpers; Dogberry, Justice Shallow, and Sir Andrew Aguecheek are fools for all time. One and all are boasters, especially of the achievements of their folly. Slender, on the other hand, is simpleton pure; he wants the vivacity which is the distinguishing mark of a subsequent creation. No fool of later comedy could so far forget self as to give utterance to the ear-pleasing apostrophe, "Oh, sweet Ann Page!" Dickens's Toots is something of this school—capable of devotion, but not capable of making it pleasing. Even to assert a liking is beyond the simpleton's powers of self-assertion or independent action. The sprightly fool would have had no need to fall back on father and uncle when the supreme moment came:—

SLENDER.—I had a father, mistress Anne; my uncle can tell you good jests of him. Pray you, uncle, tell mistress Anne the jest, how my father stole two geese out of a pen; good uncle . . .

ANNE.—Master Slender, what would you with me?

SLENDER.—Truly; for my own part, I would little or nothing with you; your father, and my uncle, have made motions; if it be my luck, so; if not, happy man be his dole! They can tell you how things go better than I can; you may ask your father; here he comes.

Slender is an ugly fellow and a boor. A world of evils, ill-favoured faults are made handsome in the father's eyes alone by the glamour of his three hundred pounds a year. The modern example is polished by society and travel into a lady's man, and at the same time, as the moralist of the day observes, into something ten thousandfold more insufferable than the simple lost, his advantages supplying variety of matter to his impertinence, and giving him an opportunity of abounding in absurdities. Shakespeare, however, has forerunners of the fool of a more refined age; the fool of parts, for example—the fool who can do something well enough to outshine the wiser neighbour. He has his place of society exalting the foolery of the day to their highest development. Such is the capitalist merchant, who has been at a great feast of languages and stolen the words, when the learned pedant finds too pickled, too spiced, too salted, too acid, as it were, too periphrastic—who in fact puts his nose out; of whom he critically observes:—

He draweth out the thread of his verbosity finer than the staple of his argument. I abhor such phantasies, such incoherent and point-devise comparisons, such reckons of orthography as to speak about, fine when he should say, doubt; dot when he should pronounce debt; d, e, f, t; not d, e, f; he clepeth a calf calf; half half; neighbour, vocatur, nebhour, neigh abbreviated ne.

Like the fine gentleman of a later date, he despises arithmetic; witness his discourse with the page:—

ARMADO. I have promised to study three years with the Duke.

MOTH. You may do it in an hour, sir.

ARMADO. Impossible.

MOTH. How many is one thrice told?

ARMADO. I am ill at reckoning; it fitteth the spirit of a tapster.

MOTH. You are a gentleman and a gamester, sir.

ARMADO. I confute both; they are both the varnish of a complete man.

MOTH. Then, I am sure, you know how much the gross sum of deuce-ace amounts to.

ARMADO. It doth amount to one more than two.

MOTH. Which the base vulgar call three.

ARMADO. True.

Parolles is a less aimable specimen of the same species. He can speak five languages, and Helen, for his master's sake, owns to some liking for him:—

And yet I know him a notorious liar,
Think him a great way fool, solely a coward;
Yet these fix'd evils sit so fit upon him,
That they take place when Virtue's steely bones
Look bleak in the cold wind.

He on his part reciprocates her regard thus far:—

Little Helen, farewell. If I can remember thee, I will think of thee at Court.

We need not quote Hotspur's popinjay, with his pouncet-box and "holiday and lady terms," who illustrates with such exquisite truth that distinguishing quality of the ideal fool—an absorption in self which no presence, no circumstances, no excitements, surprises, or terrors can shake; whom nothing can deter from the exposition of his individual tastes, preferences, and small, paltry experiences:—

He made me mad
To see him shine so brisk, and smell so sweet,
And talk so like a waiting gentlewoman
Of guns, and drums, and wounds (God save the mark!),
And telling me, the sovereign'st thing on earth
Was spermaceti for an inward bruise.

No man is quite a fool who can be carried away out of himself; but the fool has always a suggestion, and the merits of spermaceti obtruded upon Hotspur in such a battlefield are just the sort of suggestion which tallies with our experience.

But, though nobody can portray a fool better or with more playful enjoyment than Shakespeare, fools do not take the same prominent place on his canvas that they do later on in our literature. When wit was the boast of an age above every other intellectual or indeed moral endowment, folly and false wit necessarily became a subject of constant prominence and interest; and their delineation was an art to be pursued with all the seriousness due to an important study. Wits discussed their own and each other's foibles as a sort of crucial test of literary success; failure in this department was visited with severer remark than in any other. Thus Wycherley said of Shadwell that he knew how to start a fool very well, but never was able to run him down. "Most modern wits," says Dryden in his prologue to The Man of Mode,

Such monstrous fools have shown,
They seem not Heaven's making, but their own.
Something of man must be exposed to view,
That, gallants, they may more resemble you.
Sir Fopling is a fool so nicely writ,
The ladies would mistake him for a wit,
And when he sings, talks loud, and cocks, would cry,
I vow, methinks, he's pretty company,
So brisk, so gay, so travel'd, so refined,
As he took pains to graft upon his kind.

Pope pinned his own and his victims' hopes of immortality pre-eminently on his satire on fools; the fools who, he anticipates, shall survive in the Dunciad so long as the English tongue shall remain such as it was in the days of Queen Anne and King George. Such immortality is more surely won, to our mind, by his less spiteful ideal impersonation—

Sir Finesse, of amber snuff-box justly vain,
And the nice conduct of a clouded cane.

Some of the fools who were elaborated with so much care, but are now laid on the shelf—a fate no way to be regretted in regard of the company we find them in—may still serve to illustrate effectively the more harmless varieties of a past state of society. But they must be reserved for another opportunity.

ÆSTHETICS OF THE THANKSGIVING.

THE Thanksgiving service inside St. Paul's Cathedral was to the highest point impressive in its cause and in its conduct, in the outburst of loyal devotion out of which it grew, in the elements of which it was composed, in the demonstration of those whom it chiefly concerned, and in the attitude of the vast crowd of notabilities and obscurities whom it brought together in such a union of common worship as, we suppose, the Church of England has never before, since the Reformation, witnessed. But as a function it was not impressive. Even members of the Church Association may have felt, when they had seen the great principles of popular, aristocratic, and civic activity embodied in the gorgeous processions of the Speaker, the Lord Chancellor, and the Lord Mayor, and after them the principle of religious life with no more brilliant paraphernalia than the crumpled surplices of the Chapter and the grim vesture of Anglican Episcopacy, that if some measure of outward show be wholesome in any other branch of our old traditional society, it cannot be out of place in the most sacred and most important of its institutions. Neither did the interior of the Cathedral display any attempt at special decoration. Every tradesman in Oxford Street who had a little balcony to drape endeavoured to contribute to the general cheerfulness by some well-intended contrast of colours, every public body or enterprising adventurer who erected a street stand, expanded in draperies, in borders, and in banners. But the Board of Works, after it had raised (and for this we commend it) its massive galleries within the Cathedral, could find nothing better with which to drape them than the inevitable and perpetual monotony of unrelieved red cloth. Of symbolical decoration there was of course an absolute absence; the Dean and Chapter, with the heavy work of the permanent decoration of the Cathedral on their hands, could not have been expected to spend their funds on temporary decorations, while the niggardly interpretation of national feeling which characterizes our artistic administration never, we may be certain, for an instant compassed such a notion as the adornment of God's House to make it fit for a nation's thanksgiving. Yet we are pressed with the remembrance of how rapidly, how simply, and how cheaply foreign Cathedrals can be made to assume their festal attire by some rich tapestries well hung, some banners tastefully disposed, some standard evergreens judiciously ranged, and some artificial lights symmetrically displayed. We cannot, therefore, help regretting that St. Paul's should have shown what we venture to prophesy will be the last salient example in England of the superstition of false simplicity, upon an occasion when the popular feeling would have welcomed an unsuspicious resort to thoughtful art.

To find the real æsthetics of the Thanksgiving we must follow the line of the procession along those leading thoroughfares which converge upon St. Paul's—namely, Pall Mall, Trafalgar Square, the Strand, Fleet Street, Ludgate Hill, Holborn Viaduct, Holborn, and Oxford Street. There was of course infinite jumble, while countless false concords of colour and vexatiously ungraceful trappings might have been noted on too many of the houses, but it would not only be ungenerous, but unfair and almost untrue, to dwell upon them. The general result is the important consideration in all united demonstrations, and in the breadth of the whole effect minor incongruities are effaced. A few colours thrown together upon a small area may be a discord, but the repetition of such discords along a mile or more of street connects the many faults into one brilliant flower-garden, in which the eye refuses to rest upon any specific point. In Oxford Street, in particular, the repeated strings of flags stretched over the roadway contributed not only tone, but that aerial perspective which no amount of side line decoration could adequately provide. In many places, too, combined action supplemented individual fancy. The double range of Chinese lanterns along the whole extent of Oxford Street was of course primarily erected for the illumination. But even as a daylight garnishing it was far from devoid of quaint picturesqueness. The gay festoons of white and pink flowers depending from tall shafts which lined the western part of Holborn deserve praise as an example of a pleasing effect attained by cheap and easy means. The decoration of Ludgate Hill exhibited a similar arrangement of a more elaborate type. On the other hand, the uniform strips of red cloth which crossed at mid height the various houses of Fleet Street erred as an attempt to apply an unchangeable system of decoration to a most discordant mass of constructions. If the width of the strips had been uniform, but the colours left to each man's taste, the whole would have made a remarkable patchwork, but the pictorial result would have been far from unsatisfactory.

Some special points require more particular notice. The triumphal arch at Regent Circus must be credited with good intentions. But the open space where Bloomsbury Street diverges from New Oxford Street was taken advantage of for a structure of much simpler gracefulness; an open circular temple in the mid street, capped by a trophy of flags, and linked with the corners of the convergent streets by strings of flowers. Far more elaborate was the triumphal Gothic arch—Ludgate revived—where Farringdon Street parts Fleet Street and Ludgate Hill, with its triple portal, its pyramidal contours, its mouldings and tracery, its gold and heraldic blazoning. The details, as we need hardly say, could not stand criticism. But it was a showy piece of street scenery, and a refreshing substitute in an old English city for the crumpled repetitions of Palladio which generally passes muster by way of triumphal arch. Poor Temple Bar was in the unhappy plight of the man who falls between two stools. Left alone it would have been the old familiar grimy Temple Bar, such as two centuries of London traffic and weather have left Wren's handiwork. Temple Bar adequately decorated would have been a bold experiment and one which called for sympathetic appreciation. At the triumphal entry of the Prince and Princess of Wales. Mr.

Dunning, the then City Architect, converted Temple Bar by means of gorgeous draperies into a very rich arch, but no more the identical Temple Bar of our everyday life than it was the Arch of Titus. Mr. Horace Jones, his successor, announced his intention of working upon the real arch, instead of hiding it away, and in so doing took hold of the right conception. But time or means, or both, must have failed, and so the Bar has not only been cleaned, but actually whitewashed, while the decoration has stood still at a partial and ineffective gilding of some of the mouldings, and a small contribution of additional imitative sculpture. Such feeble presentments of possible work are worse than useless, for they only disgust persons whose artistic education ends at enabling them to appreciate actual shortcomings, without comprehending the real effect which has been inadequately foreshadowed. Of private displays, Messrs. Gillow's, in Oxford Street, with its silvered statues and carefully decked balconies, deserves particular notice.

It would not be fair to close our review without some reference to opportunities lost. First among them is the "Place" at the bottom of St. James's Street in front of the Palace and of Marlborough House. If there was one locality in London more than another which instinct would have fixed upon for some signal display of artistic loyalty, it would have been the curtilage of the old kingly residence, the portion of the town adjacent to the house of the invalid on whose behalf all the ceremony was taking place, and the spot where the Royal Procession first turned into the streets; and yet this position was totally forgotten. As for Pall Mall and Charing Cross generally, we may safely say that they showed very indifferently by the side, not only of the wealthy City, but of the more remote regions of Oxford Street. The weak point of the Northern line was at the "Carfax," where Oxford Street, Tottenham Court Road, New Oxford Street, and Broad Street meet. Grim and squalid as this quarter is in its working-day guise, it possesses an irregularity of outline of which, in artistic hands, good use could have been made for a very effective street scene. As it was, the decoration displayed there was insufficient and commonplace. But of all neglected points, the Holborn Viaduct was the most desolate. No arch, no trophy, no subtly marked a spot which, alike on account of its ancient civic history, and from the noble opportunities created by its modern manipulation, ought to have been emphatically a central point of the whole decorative scheme. The empty spaces were no doubt filled up by a series of stands, whose red cloth and little banners imported colour into the scene. But stands are only secondary decorations, for their intention is not to honour the procession, but to house the gazers, and as elements of a general system of ornamentation they are among the least effective, from the unbroken horizontal outline which the circumstances of their construction impose upon them.

On the whole, the mass of decorations, with all their drawbacks, showed a manifest advance of national taste in the right direction. For us, who look upon art as a wholesome and freshening element in the moral life of a nation, as of every member of that nation, the circumstance is satisfactory, for we have never been among those who have striven to save themselves trouble by writing down the British nation as hopelessly inartistic, and blind to the impressions of outward form and colour. The ancient records of the realm tell a very different story; while the political accidents of the three last centuries seem to yield sufficient reason why the bigoted worship of false simplicity should, not without credit to national moderation and firmness of purpose, have got deeply rooted in, at all events, the middle class mind of England. But it never held exclusive hold even of that portion of the population. If other evidence were wanting that it had not done so, the popularity of the Lord Mayor's Show is convincing evidence; so was that of the old Birthday procession of mail-coaches, not to talk of the perpetual gala in Hyde Park which vexes Mr. Harcourt's patriotic soul. It is, however, a long lane which has no turning, and we see on all sides symptoms of the break-up of the old British indifference to public art. Of these symptoms none has been more important, because so spontaneous, so general, and so little encouraged by persons in official station, than the circumstances of the National Thanksgiving.

INTERVIEWING A PRINCE.

THE Times on Thursday morning congratulated the Count of Chambord on having secured a valuable advertisement in its columns through granting its Correspondent an interview at Antwerp. People who read the Times for the sake of news will probably think that the Count had decidedly the best of the bargain. He obtained a couple of columns of valuable space, studded with his name, in return for a little cheap civility and a kind of rag-bag collection of stale Legitimist sentiments and worn-out phrases. Perhaps big Jupiter would not have been so obliging to the Count if he had known that little Jupiter had been put on a level with him. As a peculiar favour and signal mark of esteem, the Count takes the Times into his confidence; but the next day he is quite as confidential to the Telegraph, and, we suppose, if any other paper had thought it worth while to send a reporter to Antwerp, the Count would have been only too glad to see him, and would have gone through the same farce of unbosoming himself, and disclosing the innermost secrets of his soul. Divine Right and Legitimist principles have come to a pretty pass when an old-established paper like the Times is treated on an equality with the Louis Napoléon of journalism. "The principle of Hereditary Monarchy," said the Count, "is on my side of the question"; but Legitimists should surely hang together. There are different kinds of interviewing, but almost every kind of interviewing is foolish and objectionable. If a public man does not desire to take the world into his confidence, it is an impertinence to ask him to do so in a private interview. If, on the other hand, he wishes to make a statement to the public, he should do so in his own name, and should authenticate it by his signature. Our newspapers have not yet got the length of sending an emissary to the Treasury to ask Mr. Gladstone whether he does not think the Ewells appointment a shady business, or how he reconciles his present position as to meetings in the Park with his encouragement of the rioters when he happened to be on the other side of the House, and "Gladstone and Liberty" was the cry of the mob. Mr. Gladstone himself has indeed given the newspapers encouragement to do so. He has intimated to the Correspondent of a New York paper that whenever he says anything in the House of Commons which is not clearly understood he will always be happy to answer any inquiries on the subject. It is obvious that Mr. Gladstone cannot refuse to his own countrymen the confidence which he places so freely and generously at the disposal of Americans; and the occasions on which he uses language in Parliament which requires subsequent explanation occur, we imagine, pretty frequently. Perhaps the Premier had better secure a page or two of his favourite journal for "Gladstone's Answers to Correspondents." It must be admitted that it is much more honest and straightforward for a public man who has anything to explain to write his explanation himself than to make use of an interviewer who conveys the information at second-hand, and who can always be repudiated. When the Times reporter was taking leave of the Count of Chambord he asked, "Have you any intentions, Monseigneur, as has been attributed to you, of publishing a further manifesto, or rather, for the reporter is a wordy fellow, and was evidently determined to report himself as much as possible, 'of communicating publicly your ideas in some form or another upon points with which you have not hitherto dealt?' " "No," replied the Prince, "I have for the moment abandoned that intention. It appears to me that it would be useless to write again; but when I shall believe the moment has arrived, I shall speak, and I will explain myself in a manner that will dispel all doubts." In plain English, the simple-minded reporter was told his face that he was under an entire delusion if he imagined there was anything new in what had been communicated to him, or that the Count meant to commit himself by anything he had said. The Times calls the rigmarole of meaningless phrases which the Count recited to its reporter a manifesto, and in so far as it suits his purpose the Count may perhaps take advantage of it as such; but he intimates very clearly that it is not a real manifesto, and that when he thinks proper to publish one, he will do it at his own time and in his own way. When the Count of Chambord wants to say what he means, he has only to write a letter, and the papers will be happy to publish it.

An examination of the reports in the Times and Telegraph will show how worthless is the information which the Count communicated to their representatives. The Times man appears to have written down a series of questions beforehand, and to have assumed that the Count would of course answer them categorically. There is, however, an obvious difficulty in the case of conversation-book talk, and that is, that when you have prepared an admirable series of inquiries and remarks on your own side, your interlocutor starts off on a line of his own which quite throws you out. Something of this kind seems to have befallen the Times reporter.

"Monseigneur," said I, "in your last manifesto you said you represented Reform and not Reaction. Those who are opposed to you have imagined that they found in that word Reform a menace against the Liberal institutions of France." "Yes," he said, and his countenance seemed in the shadow to sadden, "it is the custom of France never to accept the sincerity of spoken words. I made use of the word Reform because there are many bad things to reform, and not because there are Liberal conquests to destroy. I said what I meant, and if I had desired to say anything different I should have expressed myself differently."

That is all very well, the reporter might have said, but if there are bad things to be reformed, people would very much like to know what the bad things are. Again, in answer to a question about universal suffrage, the Count replied in the following enigmatical manner:—

"It is not universal suffrage that would suppress, but universal chance. At present very frequently it is chance alone which determines the choice of the electors, and the nation which has the right to be represented often allows itself to be led astray by considerations quite foreign to the choice of a representative." It is then the first victim of his own error. To be truly represented a nation must act with a full knowledge of facts, and must only be governed by precise considerations really in harmony with the object it has in view."

If the object of the reporter was to ascertain whether the Count designed, if he ever got the opportunity, to make any change in regard to universal suffrage, it is a pity he did not repeat his question, and ask for an answer, Yes or No. If the Count had said, "It is not universal suffrage I would suppress, but a great deal more coming up the street put his head into the window and said, 'What was that?' So he died, and also married the baron, &c." "It would have been quite as much to the point as his meaningless remarks about 'precise considerations' in harmony with the object it has in view." The Telegraph Correspondent repeats the same story.

the Government than his colleagues, but he got very little out of him, except that if the Count ever spoke over France, he would be not the King of one time but the father of all. As to the form of the Constitution, the Count said that must be decided by France as represented by the Chamber. "But then," he added, "no questions of the future, and the future is in the hands of God." From this the Correspondent vaguely deduced that the Prince would be bound by any Constitution which he accepted with the Crown; but the reply obviously throws no light whatever on the kind of Constitution he would accept. It is perhaps not of much practical consequence to know what the Count of Chambord thinks on these subjects, but it can hardly be worth while to send reporters to Antwerp to extract answers of this kind. The Count has published a number of manifestoes in his time, he has a number of journals either in his pay or devoted to him for other reasons, and nothing can be simpler or clearer than the ideas he is known to represent. It is possible that there may be something behind what he says which he does not yet care to avow; but it is absurd to suppose that, if he does not choose to publish his secrets in a manifesto, or to communicate them to the journals which he inspires, he will divulge them to the reporters of English newspapers.

The only part of these letters which is of any interest or value is the account they give of the appearance and manner of the Count and his relations with the devotees of Divine Right who made a pilgrimage to Antwerp to see him. The Telegraph reporter was very favourably impressed by the Count. He describes him as one of the freest and youngest looking men he has ever seen, simple, frank, polished, exceedingly intelligent, and thoroughly posted up in the politics and literature of the day. The Correspondent of the Times was somewhat disappointed as to the looks of the "Enfant du Miracle." He portrays him as short, stout, dragging his right leg in walking, with the toes turned out, and rather greyish; but he has a high prominent forehead, a good expression of mouth, and a sonorous and sympathetic voice. His answers to his visitors are in the highest style of art. It is needless to say that one of his secretaries sees all the visitors beforehand, and pumps them about their personal history and pet sentiments:—

"You were at Patay," said the Count to a young man. "Oh, how I did hope that the precious blood there shed would have sufficed to appease the Divine wrath!"

"You have given a noble example to your company, I know," said he to another; "continue to serve France above all."

"Plus IX. gives us a beautiful example of patience and resignation," said he to one of the priests; "unhappily we have neither his virtues to wait with patience nor his age to resign ourselves."

Outside, meanwhile, the mob was shouting various cries, and Vive la République! mingled with Vive le Roi! As soon as a reception began the democrats began their tumult, and they did not desist till it was over. They appear to have been chiefly Belgian students and French refugees, and their argument was that as Victor Hugo, Puvion, and others had been expelled from Brussels, the Count of Chambord ought to be expelled from Antwerp. There can be no doubt that Belgium has a difficult part to play as a constitutional country which not only adjoins, but speaks the same language as, a nation in a state of periodical revolution; and its hospitality is apt to be abused. If, however, Belgium desires to have the credit of constitutional principles, it must adhere to them with some consistency; and it is quite certain that neither Victor Hugo, nor M. Thiers, if he happened to be in exile, nor the Emperor Napoleon, would be permitted to hold levees in any part of the country such as the Count of Chambord has been holding at Antwerp.

PARLIAMENTARY LOGIC.

IF the scheme which was once proposed of a daily or weekly "Chronicle of Human Error" should ever be carried into practice; if, daily or weekly, men versed in the various branches of human knowledge should record the choicest blunders and unwise utterances made in their several departments; it is a painful thought how large a share of the pages of such a universal black book would have to be set apart for utterances made in the great council of the nation. We are not thinking of the occasional ebullitions of the great leaders on either side, but of that vast mass of sayings which are uttered when some honourable member, who to an outsider seems to have no particular call to say anything at all, gets on his legs as if purposely to show how little he knows of the facts of the subject on which he is talking, and how wide a gap it is possible to put between the assertions which are intended to pass for arguments and the conclusions to which the supposed arguments are intended to lead. What manner of men can these gentlemen be, who, like the crow in the fable, might have kept their reputation by the easy process of holding their tongues, but who prefer to open their mouths, as if of set purpose to lose it? Two explanations indeed are possible, but they are explanations of the same sort as that which tells us how the elephant stands upon the tortoise, but does not tell us what the tortoise stands on. We cease to wonder at the members themselves, but only at the cost of having to wonder at somebody else instead. Perhaps it is done to please their constituents; perhaps the aim of Bunscombe makes it a point of honour that their member should say something, and they are better pleased that he should talk nonsense than that he should not talk at all. In the same way daily undoubted and sympathetic with the members, but then our feelings of wonder are transferred from these to the constituents. We perhaps should think less with the reporters. We know how little sense is to be gleaned in human testimony of any kind; how little that the minutest, instead of the words put into their mouths, really uttered words of surpassing wisdom: it may be that they talked so far over the heads of those who had to record their sayings that we get only the wood, hay, and stubble of the reporter's imagination, instead of the genuine gold, silver, and precious stones of the senators themselves. In this case, again, our feelings of wonder are in no way lessened; they are simply transferred from the members to the reporters. Of these two possible explanations, the former, as being a question of motives, does not concern us, but the latter, as a question of facts, concerns us a great deal. We wish it to be distinctly understood that any remarks which we make on the speech of any member are made only hypothetically, on the supposition that he really said what the newspapers make him out to have said. If the truth should happen to be that he said something quite different and much wiser, all that we say of course falls to the ground.

In casting our eyes over the reports of the debates for the last week or two, some very choice flowers of this kind may be culled. There is, for instance, a passage in the speech of Mr. Hardcastle in which he introduced his now denuded Game Laws Amendment Bill, which makes us quite understand the feelings of that zealous Oxford student who is recorded to have read a certain passage of Aristotle nineteen times with his coat off before he had the faintest glimmering of its meaning. Mr. Hardcastle is reported to have said that "he did not believe that public opinion was altogether in a satisfactory state, while he was also convinced that public opinion was to a great extent influenced by the justice of the law." This is a little hard, but we think that by an effort we see our way through it. Mr. Hardcastle may possibly refer to that remarkable way in which law and custom do in many cases react on one another till it is impossible to say which is the cause and which is the effect. Or he may simply mean to say, what is almost a self-evident truth, that men think more lightly of breaking a positive law when they do not feel it to be inherently just than they do when positive law and natural justice clearly go together. But what follows is altogether beyond us:—

There could, for instance, be but little moral difference between the purchasing the right to the presentation to a living on a Monday or a Wednesday in any given week, and yet if the incumbent happen to have died on the Tuesday, the purchase on the Wednesday would constitute the offence of simony.

We are bound to suppose that this illustration does in some way or other bear upon the Game Laws, but it quite passes our understanding to see how. Taken by itself, it would not give the faintest hint whether the orator was speaking for the Game Laws or against them. It would be equally dark in the mouth of Mr. Peter Taylor or in the mouth of a battle-loving county member. But we will say that Mr. Hardcastle has chosen his days of the week very discreetly. There are acts which may be lawfully done on a Monday, but which, according to the views of various religious schools, would be unlawful if done on Friday, Saturday, or Sunday. Wednesday is perhaps not quite so safe as Thursday, but it is safe as compared with the days further on. The people of Brobdingnag, indeed, according to Captain Lemuel Gulliver, kept their Sabbath on Wednesday, but among nations of the usual height the second and fourth days of the week are pretty much of a muchness. But the odd thing is that Mr. Hardcastle thinks it strange that it should be unlawful to do a thing on a Monday and lawful on a Wednesday "in a given week." This seems to be because the two days are so near together; if it were Monday and Wednesday in two successive weeks Mr. Hardcastle would not find the same difficulty. Yet we can conceive many cases besides that of buying a presentation in which things may be very properly done on Wednesday which it would be highly improper to do on Monday in the same week. Let us put a bold face on the matter and take the strongest case of all first. It may be bigamy in a given man and woman to marry on Monday, but perfectly lawful on Wednesday, if the husband or wife of one of them died on the Tuesday, and if a licence can be got with the needful speed. Far be it from us to counsel or approve such hasty remarriages as an ordinary rule. But we know that so to act may sometimes be not only lawful, but a man's highest duty. Did not good King Harry so act out of motives of the purest patriotism? Or again, a man may rightly do many acts on the Wednesday which he could not lawfully have done on the Monday, supposing that on the Tuesday he has succeeded to an estate or has been appointed to an office. If it so chanced that Mr. Hardcastle's election happened on a Tuesday, surely he felt quite another man on the Wednesday, a man endowed with different powers and privileges from what he had been on the Monday. Perhaps Mr. Hardcastle means that he sees no reason in the law which allows a presentation to be sold while the living is full, but forbids it when the living is void. For such a view there is doubtless something to be said from two opposite sides. But this is not what Mr. Hardcastle says. His words, if they are his words, mean, not that it is unreasonable that the death of the incumbent should make a difference, but that it is unreasonable that it should make a difference so soon as the day after his death. Now, we would ask, would Mr. Hardcastle legislate for the case of a demise of the Crown happening on a Tuesday? In such a case, to our thinking, there would be a great moral difference between many acts done on Monday and the same acts done on Wednesday. It would be the duty of the new King to do many things on the Wednesday which it would have been unlawful, and perhaps treasonable, for him to have tried to do on the Monday. Or would Mr. Hardcastle make the dead King, by a legal fiction, reign for a few days longer, in order to avoid the anomaly of so short a space as two days making so great a difference?

May we go back for a short time to a period yet earlier than Mr. Hardcastle's Game Law Amendment Bill? Let us turn to the debate on the Ballot. There is Mr. Liddell; he stands forth as a friend of the Monarchy and the House of Lords; but those who really wish those institutions to last should certainly pray that they may be saved from such friends as Mr. Liddell. "During the recess they had heard animadversions on the monarchy and the House of Lords, and in some obscure places something about republics." We can conceive the delight of the orator in talking about "animadversions." It is almost equal to enlarging the bounds of the terraqueous globe. In the mouth of the most slovenly speaker it is five syllables—as many as Nebuchadnezzar; and by a distinct utterance it may be made into six—equal to Mesopotamia itself. The next time Mr. Liddell wants to talk big, let us recommend by way of variety "diatribes" instead of "animadversions." Those unlucky people who have learned Greek are always so puzzled at once to know what a "diatribe" means, and to find out whether it is meant to be three syllables or four. But the odd thing is, that the animadversions on the monarchy and the something that was said about republics seem to have had nothing to do with one another. The something about republics was said only in some obscure places; while the animadversions on the monarchy seem to have been made in places of greater dignity and importance. An enemy might perhaps ask what was said about republics in the obscure places, and whether what was said there may not have taken the form of animadversions on republics. At any rate Mr. Liddell goes on to give his own animadversions in the very grandest form of the grand style:—

They had learnt a lesson from what had lately happened on the other side of the Channel; and the state of things also across the Atlantic taught them that a high state of morality was not the invariable accompaniment of a Republic.

Now as this sentence was received with a cheer, it would seem that there were other people in the House besides Mr. Liddell himself who really thought that it proved something. But against whom did Mr. Liddell fling himself to be arguing? Was anybody ever idiot enough to maintain that a high state of morality is an invariable accompaniment of a republic? Would Mr. Liddell venture to say that it is an invariable accompaniment of a monarchy? But if he would not, his argument is clearly worthless. People who stop to think would see that some monarchies have had a higher moral state than some republics, and that some republics have had a higher moral state than some monarchies. A man who is bent on something else than talking big might have seen that the comparative advantages of the two forms of government in any particular case must be argued on quite different grounds. And really the Attorney-General for Ireland is not much better than Mr. Liddell:—

He thought the result would be to strengthen the Monarchy, and he hoped the time would never come when there would be in this country any institution like the Commune of Paris or the Tammany Ring of New York.

The Attorney-General for Ireland has at least the advantage over Mr. Liddell of calling a spade a spade. When he means a Commune and a Tammany Ring, he talks of a Commune and a Tammany Ring, and he does not, like Mr. Liddell, point vaguely to "the other side of the Channel" and "across the Atlantic." But still, what is his argument worth? If it means anything, it would mean that all republics must lead to something like the Commune and the Tammany Ring. Now, to go no further, the former Republic of Venice, and the actual Republic of France, whatever there may be to be said against either of them, are at any rate as unlike as possible to either the Commune or the Tammany Ring. And we would venture to ask whether the Attorney-General for Ireland ever heard of another republic which is just now engaged in revising its Constitution. It is a comfort to think that the royalty of England can be defended by arguments somewhat stronger than those urged on its behalf by Mr. Liddell and the Irish Attorney-General.

We will not dwell on the singularly emphatic and mysterious utterance of Mr. Walter in the course of the same debate, when he tells us, in words evidently full of meaning, how

With regard to the exercise of secret voting in political elections, he thought that honourable gentlemen who imagined that the humbler classes of voters were the only classes that would make use of the Ballot were under a great mistake. He thought that if they were to have the Ballot at all they would find that persons in the upper classes would be quite as ready to avail themselves of it as the lower classes. But that was not a matter which he was anxious at the present moment to press upon the attention of the House.

For what more convenient season Mr. Walter keeps back this Burslem-like oracle it is not for us to guess. But we may be allowed to ask whether Mr. Walter meant his argument to tell for the ballot or against it. To those who wish to legislate in the interest of the whole nation, and not in the special interest of either the upper classes or the lower, it might seem a strong argument in favour of any measure that it was acceptable to both upper and lower classes at once. But whether Mr. Walter meant this or anything else we are left to guess, as he at once left the subject of the ballot and went on to talk of the wholly distinct subjects of the anomalies existing with regard to borough boundaries and to the county and borough franchises. But we are in no mood for such grave inquiries. We have before us the speech of Mr. Montague Guest, who, to be sure, has already made himself famous. Yet we doubt whether all the subtleties of his speech have been commented on as they deserve. Mr. Guest thought it "a most unjustifiable thing that married members should have tickets for their wives and that unmarried members should not have tickets for their wives." The wives of unmarried members, or of unmarried men of any kind, are a class so seldom spoken of that it is not wonderful that the remarks of Mr. Guest were received with "much laughter." An uncharitable censor might be tempted to expound the seeming anomaly by referring to the story of Sheridan and his son. "Tom, I recommend you to take a wife." "By all means, sir, whose wife?" But it is more probable, as well as more charitable, to suppose that Mr. Guest aspires to nothing more than the apostolic privilege of leading about a sister. We do not know whether Mr. Guest is in any way a kinsman of the more famous bearer of his name, but things really look as if he had been dabbling somewhat inopportunely in the lore which his name suggests. The whole thing becomes plain by the light of early Teutonic scholarship. Mr. Guest simply used the word wife in its earliest meaning. This appears quite plain when we come to the words of explanation upon which Mr. Guest fell back after the "much laughter" of the House; wife, weib, in the earliest stages of our language, simply means woman, married or unmarried; and in the refined language of the nineteenth century the place of the exploded word woman is taken by that of lady. Mr. Guest, therefore, when the House had "laughed much" at the antiquated language by which he had ascribed wives to unmarried men, most properly translated the remark into more modern phrase by saying, "It was not asking too much to desire that a ticket should be granted to each member's lady." And, as the House still laughed, though this time it was only "a laugh," instead of the former "much laughter," Mr. Guest the third time made his meaning clearer still by speaking of a ticket for each member and "his wife or lady." We need not be reminded of the story of the wife of an Irish Archbishop demanding admittance at a forbidden door on the ground that she was the "Archbishop's lady," and getting for answer that she could not be allowed to go in there even if she were the Archbishop's wife. In Mr. Guest's language wife and lady are not opposed, but synonymous, words; they are alternative translations in earlier and later English of yuwif or femina. Mr. Guest, we think, was unfairly laughed at; his expressions were perfectly accurate, only he might perhaps be open to a little gentle censure for thrusting such antiquated forms of speech on a modern House of Commons. Our only difficulty is to be found in Mr. Guest's last sentence, where he speaks of a "ticket for their sisters or other lady," which sounds as if the "other lady," whoever she may be, is of the same value as several sisters. It may be doubted whether in the arrangement of seats in the Cathedral this would be found to be physically true, but here again it is only Mr. Guest's early researches which have led him astray. Just as an Englishman, his oath or his life, was looked on as equal to several Welshmen, just as athane was looked on as equal to several churls; so Mr. Guest looks on some other class of lady not more minutely defined as equal to several sisters. But, after all, his meaning is much clearer, and what he means is much more to the purpose, than the dark saying of Mr. Ayrton in answer to him, in which he speaks of "those occupying a distinct position of relationship towards the members of the House and occupying a position in society as the wives of members." This class of persons, whoever they may be, are to have a selection made in their favour, and it may possibly mean that a preference is to be given to those ladies who have the twofold claim of being at once sister to one member and wife to another. But Mr. Ayrton has so much to say about position, his own position which is shared by Mr. Guest, the distinct position of relationship occupied by some ladies towards members of the House, and the position—seemingly not the "distinct position"—occupied in society by the same ladies or others as the wives of members, that we think it better not to inquire too minutely into this mysterious subject of position, and so forbear from guesses which might prove to be fruitless.

THE RENEWAL OF THE VATICAN COUNCIL.

IT is difficult to say what amount of credit is to be given to the telegraphic and other reports which have recently appeared in the newspapers, of a design on the part of Pius IX. to recall into existence the Vatican Synod which, if not dead, was certainly supposed to be buried. The idea of His Holiness making a pilgrimage to Germany in proprio person to heal or suppress the nascent schism in the Church almost reminds one of poor Abbe Laborde starting for Rome in 1854, with his breviary and his green umbrella under his arm, to stop the definition of the Immaculate Conception, or of the late Canon Townsend and his wife interviewing the Pope in the hope of converting him to Anglicanism on the spot. Still there are many conceivable reasons which might lead the Pontiff, or at least the advisers who usually have his ear, to think a migration from Rome towards Germany is far from clear that they would not have occasion to regret their counsel afterwards. It is less easy to understand any adequate motive for desiring to revive, under far less suspicious circumstances, the "farce"—as one of the actors has himself termed it—played out at the Vatican in 1870. No doubt there is a certain informality in the present state of things, and many Roman Catholics who object on more substantial grounds to the new dogmas have a convenient plea for declining to receive them in the fact that, the Council being still unfinished, ad hoc sub judice lis est. But, on the other hand, the Court of Rome has never admitted the validity of the plea, and could not, without patent inconsistency, admit it now; while it is very questionable whether the inconvenience of again having to use a machinery which was found to require so much manipulation would not greatly outweigh any contingent advantages of putting it together again after its work is done. It may be inferred from the cautious language of the Tablet last week, that the Ultramontane journals have not yet received their cue, and the subject is not improbably still under discussion at headquarters. The sort of ostensible and temporary success achieved by the coup d'état of July 1870 may have suggested to the Jesuit Cemarilla the ambition of achieving some further triumph for their cause. They have already, by the admission of their most resolute opponents, accomplished an "immense revolution" in the Church, and made it "impossible to deny that Roman Catholicism and Ultramontanism are convertible terms." But then the victory was not by any means a costless one, and they may naturally be anxious to secure as well as to improve upon it. Let us for a moment review the salient points of the case.

If few of the bishops persist in open resistance, there are many everywhere who make no secret of the purely formal nature of their submission, and tell their friends that they are simply biding their time, till the coming reaction is fairly set in. And their recorded words are always liable to be quoted against them when they show any disposition to profess a different line. We referred just now to one of the French prelates who called the Council Luxubrium Vaticanum. Then there is Archbishop Kenrick's published statement in his treatise De Pontificis Infallibilitate, that the composition and organization of the Council invalidate it de facto and de jure. And if we turn to the official Synopsis Observationum, since reprinted in Friedrich's Documenta, we find one Bishop saying that he had rather die than accept the decree; another, that it would be an act of suicide for the Church; an Irish Bishop, that it is an "unprecedented innovation," and will produce "a horrible infidelity on every side"; while a fourth adds, that it will "lead to the apostasy of a great number of the best Catholics." The Archbishop of Cincinnati declares that henceforth there will be no answer to the Protestant dilemma, that either the faith has changed, or it was false to disclaim the new dogma previously; Cardinal Rauscher says it is a declaration of war with the whole past of the Church; another German Bishop, that it "has no basis in Scripture or Tradition, and antiquity believed the contrary"; Dupanloup, that it is "an unheard-of absurdity." Nor do the anti-infallibilists scruple to lay down very explicit grounds for their rejection of the Council. They say that an Ecumenical Council should faithfully represent the universal Church, and not only the Court of Rome; that all available means should be taken to facilitate a thorough discussion of the points at issue, instead of all means being taken to stifle it, on the principle, to quote a recent writer, of "Stat pro ratione voluntas—Jenitarum"; that, instead of freedom of meeting together and of the press being denied them, the entire liberty of all members of the Synod should be guaranteed; and that, instead of notorious forgeries being used as evidence, only authentic documents should be admitted.

And this opposition to the authority of the Synod is not of a nature or extent to be lightly ignored. There are the Uniate Armenians, who hold out in their separation from Rome, notwithstanding the pretended success of Mgr. Franchi's mission last year, while in 1870 alone three thousand Danubian Slaves abjured Roman Catholicism. In Germany, and especially in Catholic Bavaria, there is a formal schism, growing every day, and all the German Universities are at open war with Rome. In France, where the national character is less serious, and there is more of sceptical indifference, opposition, though no less real, takes for the most part a somewhat different shape. There is a vast interval between those who "believe" and those who merely "accept" the dogma, and diplomatic silence means in the mouth of a French Catholic, as one of them lately explained with more force than elegance of diction, "Je me soumetts comme Catholique, mais le diable m'emporte si j'en crois un mot"; much as Sancho Panza says, "I forgive you, as a Christian." However, it seems that even in France regular committees have been formed of Old Catholics, in unions with members of the Oriental Churches, with Anglicans, and with French Protestants, under Dr. Michaud's guidance, and he speaks of having received warm encouragement from all these sources. What is more surprising is that the movement makes itself felt in quarters where it might be least expected to penetrate. We have heard of convents even in England where the death of Pius IX. was prayed for by the nuns during the Council as the last hope of averting what they regarded as a grave scandal to the Church; and a recent occurrence at Bonn, which has been noticed in the German newspapers, proves that the feeling among this class of persons is both deep and permanent. A certain Mother Augustine (Amalie de Lammert), for twenty-four years Superior of the Sisters of Charity in charge of St. John's Hospital at Bonn, who was renowned and venerated all over the Rhineland for her holiness of life and works of mercy, and was even reputed to work miracles, refused after the Council to accept the Vatican decrees. She was unshocked and turned out of the convent during her last illness, to her great distress; but her Ultramontane relations seem to have been hardly less cruel than her ecclesiastical judges. She was harassed in her last hours by their solicitations and the visits of infallibilist priests whom they forced upon her to shake her resolution, but she told them that "she had no untruth to answer for before her Saviour, and dared not appear before God with a lie in her mouth." After a long and painful illness, patiently borne, she died at the end of January last without the Sacraments, and the vengeance of her persecutors still pursued her to the grave. Her earnest request to be buried in her convent, or at least in her conventual habit, was refused, and, when she was laid in the family burial-place at Weissensturm, the parish priest would not allow the last rites of the Church to be solemnized. Professor Reusch, one of the priests recently excommunicated by the Archbishop of Cologne, attended to say some prayers over her grave. Rome may well tremble for the consequences of a dogma which both Irish Catholics, as Mr. Whittle assures us, and professed nuns, usually the most ardent and obedient of her votaries, regard "with dismay," and had rather die "unhouselled, unanointed," than accept.

Yet one does not quite see what remedy another Session of the Council could provide. Neither the Austrian nor the English Government would be likely to interfere with its assembling on their territory so long as no violation of the law was attempted. But they certainly would not hand over to the Pope the control of the police and of the press in the city where it assembled, which proved on a former occasion of such paramount importance to his interests. Nor is it obvious what a Council, with the best intentions, could do for him which he could not do as well or better without its aid. There cannot be two co-ordinate jurisdictions, and no ulterior sanction can help, any more than it can hinder, the action of infallibility. If Pio Nono's ruling passion for the construction of new dogmas is still unsatisfied, he has unlimited means for its further gratification in his own hands. There was, we believe, some talk at the time of getting the Council to endorse the Syllabus; but why call in a human authority to authenticate the suggestions of the Holy Ghost? Every one of its eighty propositions is infallibly guaranteed already. The raison d'être of General Councils was to collect and solemnly promulgate the verdict of the Universal Church; but if infallibility lies not with the Church but with the Pope, there is at once a safer and shorter method of attaining the desired end. Dr. Dollinger has pointed out in the lectures now in course of delivery at Munich the close analogy between the circumstances of the Vatican and of the Fifth Lateran Synod held at Rome just before the outbreak of the Reformation, under Julius II. and Leo X. Both were exclusively designed for the exaltation of Papal authority; to neither did the Episcopate venture to offer any effective resistance, and the first led, as the second is leading now, to a vehement reaction within the Church. That reaction was partly represented and partly restrained by the Council of Trent, which was a model of liberty and moderation as compared with the hole-and-corner Lateran assembly composed of some fifty Italian prelates. Even the Old Catholics of Munich are content to accept its doctrinal utterances. But it does not follow that a second Council of Trent would command the same reverence, even in the very problematical contingency of its proceedings being conducted with an equal amount of freedom and respect for national requirements. It has indeed become pretty plain that nothing like universal recognition would be accorded in the present day, even among Roman Catholics, to any Council where the Eastern Churches were unrepresented, while on the other hand the Jesuits, if not their master, may be credited with sufficient discernment to be aware of the hopelessness of eliciting their assent to infallibilism. And a Council of Malta would lack even the magic which sometimes dwells in a name. On the whole, till the rumours flying about just now have received some stronger confirmation, we shall adhere to our previous belief that infallible wisdom will be wise enough to let well, or at least to let ill, alone.

THE SUNDAY POST.

THE Post Office yields a flourishing revenue, and it is obvious that the feeling which requires a diminution of Sunday labour in delivering and receiving letters can easily be gratified if the nation is disposed to incur the necessary expense. Indeed, the worthy people who desire to deprive their neighbours of a Sunday post might partially attain their presumed object by subscribing to provide for the regular postman a substitute for the whole or part of that day's work. Among recent Parliamentary papers is a Report upon this subject, which causes us to observe that its authors have omitted to take account of the addition to the labour of postmasters, or at least post-mistresses, by the introduction of cards which invite perusal during the process of sorting. They have also forgotten to mention whether in ascertaining the majority which may obtain discontinuance of a Sunday post, cards are counted equally with letters, and what is the value of a newspaper of a religious or sporting character or of a book as compared with a letter. Another important question would be whether the requisite majority must be shown to exist for a day, or week, or longer period; because, if a short period would suffice, it would be easy for a Sabbatarian Association to complete the desired number of letters by artificial means at moderate expense, which they would doubtless cheerfully incur for the advancement of a favourite plan. The Committee of Inquiry gives a curious account of the result of attempting to substitute delivery at the post-office for delivery from house to house on Sunday. They conclude that this change is not advisable because, among other reasons, a large number of non-official persons, callers and messengers, who perhaps need not otherwise stir from their homes, have to visit the post-office. This is, we believe, a new as well as strange variety of fanatical absurdity. Can it possibly be considered to be wicked to walk along the High Street of a town on Sunday? A person who comes to the post-office must at any rate have got out of bed, and we will not say dressed, but put on clothes, and therefore that person is more or less advanced towards a state of preparation for attending church or chapel. We should think, in apparent opposition to the author of this Report, that for the majority of the population the worst way of spending Sunday was not to stir out of their houses. But we are told that a further objection to the delivery of letters on application is, that it tends to bring together "a crowd of sometimes disorderly persons" at the post-office. The disorder would probably consist in this—that some of these persons might be smoking pipes or cigars, and that they might engage in conversation or a little mild chaff of one another. The only disorder that could naturally arise on the occasion would be a contest of not very violent character for priority of application. The excitement of such a scene would not be greater than occurs habitually at the entrances of certain fashionable churches. But perhaps it might happen to some expectant of a letter to bring a dog, and the animal, not having been properly instructed in the principles of the Christian religion, might have the audacity to bark, which would of course be a disorderly and almost profane proceeding. The Committee resemble those pious mothers who sometimes accompany their sons on first going up to one of the Universities, and occupy themselves in endeavouring to make sure that young Hopeful will attend at least once on Sunday at a church where the unadulterated Gospel may be preached to him. They perhaps discover after a term or two that their sons have contracted a disinclination to have any sort of Gospel, pure or impure, preached to them; and it may be well if they do nothing worse in their career at college than sit in their own or a friend's rooms on Sunday mornings employed in colouring a meerschaum. We could wish that our towns saw no worse sight on Sunday morning than that of a "disorderly" crowd waiting outside a post-office for letters. We shall expect to be told next that people who fetch their dinners from bakeries are disorderly, and that if they would content themselves with cold meat or bread and cheese they need not stir from their homes on Sunday. Really this is Sabbatarianism gone mad. It may be, however, that the practical objections stated to this Committee by experienced officers were valid, and that the Report gives silly reasons for a sound conclusion. It is properly suggested that any person who objects to delivery on Sunday may have letters kept till Monday, and if this were done to a considerable extent the amount of Sunday labour in any town might be largely reduced without interfering with the convenience of people who do not hold strongly the Sabbatarian view. We can remember when there were people who desired to prevent other people's dinners being baked on a Sunday, and we are by no means sure that such people do not still exist. The Report adds that the time occupied by delivery would be much reduced by the general adoption of letter-boxes in doors. People have a propensity to remain not only in their own houses but in their own beds on Sunday mornings, and it is probable that delays from want of letter-boxes are more numerous and longer on Sunday than on any other day. If a Society were formed in any town for promoting the general adoption of letter-boxes in doors, the result might be approved on economical as well as on Sabbatarian grounds.

Many persons who reside in London would be equally disturbed by a proposal to deliver letters in London, or to discontinue delivery at places to which they go for short visits to the country. Violent interference with our habits, whatever they be, is disagreeable, but there are some would-be legislators who seem to think that any change which is unpleasant is necessarily beneficial. The extreme Sabbatarian who would close post-offices altogether on Sunday may remember that they were recently used in order to transmit by telegraph the form of prayer for the recovery of the Prince of Wales as well as the bulletins of his illness. But if a person must be in attendance during certain hours, it is not, perhaps, a spiritual disadvantage that that person should have employment. The Committee were assured that, as the sale of stamps could not be refused for telegraphic purposes, it would make no practical difference in the work of the officers if they sold stamps for postage as well. We suppose that the number of persons likely to apply for stamps could not anywhere become so large as to be capable of being contemplated as a disorderly crowd. The Committee assumed that even if a post-office could be wholly closed on Sundays for letters, it must remain open during some part of the day for telegrams. We have, however, an impression that certain post-offices which are open during some hours of Sunday for letters are, or lately were, altogether closed against telegrams. The Committee say that they have felt the danger of exciting discontent and opposition from "a numerous and influential section of the community," in which perhaps they would include the readers of weekly publications. The reason why so many of these publications appear on Saturday is probably this, that Sunday is the day on which they are most likely to be read. There are undoubtedly large numbers of persons who, having devoted the days to their own business, employ a portion of the seventh in informing themselves as to the progress of the business of the nation. The greater part of England is now accessible by railway in twelve hours, and the bulk of the population are not likely to surrender the privilege which they at present enjoy of receiving on Sunday morning the London publications of the day before. But the constantly increasing business of the Post Office not only can but must be arranged upon the plan of allowing to all offices a reasonable amount of relief from labour on Sunday. Irrespective of religious considerations, all men require for bodily health periodical rest from work, and that rest may as well be given on Sunday as on any other day. Christians in general agree that labour should be suspended on Sunday sufficiently to allow opportunity for public and private worship, and the Sabbatarians might reasonably be content with that which they can obtain without trouble, and they should not disturb themselves and others by agitating for that which it is very improbable they will ever obtain at all. The Committee suggest that all messengers who travel as many as fourteen miles daily in the performance of their official work on weekdays should, by the employment of substitutes, be entirely relieved from work on every alternate Sunday. The expense of such substitutes is estimated at about 4,500*l.* a-year, and we should say at once that this expense ought to be incurred, not only for the relief of hardly-worked postmen, but in order to deprive the Sabbatarians of any reasonable complaint against the system of delivery of letters on Sunday. It is already the rule of the service that rural post-messengers should return earlier from their work on Sundays than on other days, and this rule does not appear to the Committee to be capable of improvement. We hear nothing of the famous proposal of compelling rural post-messengers to ride on bicycles, and therefore presume that it has been for some time abandoned. In towns the time occupied in preparing letters for delivery and delivering them is from three hours to three hours and a-half, and except at remote towns the work commences at 7 A.M. Thus a letter-carrier in a town, unless he is required to collect letters from a box or to carry a mail-bag to a railway-station, has all the remainder of Sunday to himself. We think that he is not badly treated, but we do not object to his being treated better; and indeed we should hardly object to any reasonable diminution of Sunday labour at post-offices; but we would most strongly resist the fanatical proposal to abolish it altogether. The authorities decline to entertain any such proposal except on evidence of "substantial unanimity" among the inhabitants of a town in desiring it, and there has been no instance of such evidence being produced. Looking at the thing practically, it is probable that postmen in general have a moderate appetite for church or chapel services, which might be sufficiently gratified by allowing them to call twenty-one hours their own property on Sunday. But we should think that, by a small subscription in any town, substitutes might be provided, so that every postman should have one Sunday in two or three wholly to himself. If this were done, the Sabbatarians would be deprived of the last vestige of a grievance.

REVIEWS.

BISSET'S ESSAYS ON HISTORICAL TRUTH.*

MR. BISSET is not the only writer who is likely to be charged with secondary or interested motives when he seeks only to know whether certain alleged facts are really facts or whether they are not. To those who will take the trouble to read through his book it will be clear that the acceptance of his own conclusions is not the first object present to his mind, and that he would be well content to weigh evidence which pointed in a different direction, and to admit himself in the wrong as soon as he was shown to be so. To those who glance over these pages superficially it may seem that Mr. Bisset's great aim in writing them is to cover with infamy the dynasties of the Tudor and Stuart sovereigns of England. In truth, Mr. Bisset is in this volume both a judge and a pleader; and, like some others, he may suffer from the combination of vigorous advocacy with a keen judicial scrutiny. The myths of the ancient world have been related with the greatest enthusiasm by those who look with cold unbelief on all efforts to treat them as sources of genuine history; the exquisite narratives of Herodotus have been most appreciated by some who have dealt most roughly with them as historical documents. And so it is with Mr. Bisset. More fairness requires the admission that in every one of his essays the first question presented to his mind is the nature and value of the materials with which he has to deal, and the first point to be ascertained is, whether there be any evidence forthcoming in any given matter, and, if so, what may be its results. But so strong is his respect for law, so intense his hatred for all violations of law through mere insolence or arrogance of power, so detestable in his eyes are all schemes for trampling on the liberties of a people by corrupting the administration of justice, so horrible all systems of terrorism which seek to ensure impunity for wicked rulers by impressing on the governed the hopelessness of resistance, that his very sincerity may appear so some an extraordinary enthusiasm. Nor can we well deny that, however noble this enthusiasm may be, it carries with it, like all enthusiasms, its own special dangers; and that the historical critic whose first object it is to clear up some of the darkest passages in the history of our country may seem to be bent rather on maintaining that Elizabeth and James I. were among the very wickedest of human beings. With the temper which leads a man so to speak we can, scarcely fail in a certain degree to sympathize. There can be no other motive for such inquiries and for such condemnation than the desire to resist the tyranny of power, and to establish the supremacy of law over the arbitrary will of the despot. Nor can we forget that the existence of organized conspiracies on the part of sovereigns against the liberties of their people are at the least within the range of possibility, and that the examination of such evidence as may have come down to us may prove that these conspiracies have in this country been both more frequent and more serious than we generally take them to have been. Whenever this can be shown, the expression of a righteous indignation is fully justified. We cannot expect from every historian the cold neutrality of Sir Cornwall Lewis.

* Essays on Historical Truth. By Andrew Bisset. London: Longmans & Co. 1871.

We have become familiar of late years with the protests of writers who insist that scepticism deal very hardly and unfairly with the historical evidence furnished by the traditions of the ancient world, and who hold that a satisfactory result cannot be attained until these sceptics allow in historical investigations the application of a more flexible rule than that which guides a court of justice. The refusal to see in the Trojan war of the Iliad the reflection of a real struggle between Achæans and Trojans on the shores of the Hellespont, or to discern in its results the influence of Hellenic colonization on the coasts of Asia Minor, is blamed as a real, though perhaps unconscious, effort to obstruct the growth of historical knowledge. But the position may obviously be reversed. Even into the history of periods for which we have a large, perhaps a too large, amount of indubitable contemporary documents, so much of falsehood has either crept in or been purposely introduced, that, except by the strictest applications of the canons of judicial evidence, the discovery of the truth of many facts must, it is thought, be abandoned as hopeless. To the existence of difficult passages in history, so difficult as to involve the extreme perplexity, we cannot possibly shut our eyes; and equally impossible is it not to long for the means of clearing away the darkness. In short, if we lose something by dealing too rigidly with so-called traditional history, we may lose much more, and do a greater injustice, by dealing in too lax a fashion with a history which may have come down to us in written or printed documents, but in documents possibly which have been composed to distort, or tampered with to hide, the truth. Nay, the palpable wrong done in many instances by giving credence to testimony purposely falsified may justify an excess of caution in the acceptance of statements which are said to rest on the authority of merely traditional narratives. If the Earl of Gowrie and his brother are, on the supposition of their innocence, extremely ill-used men, so also on the same hypothesis is Themistocles an extremely ill-used man, and if an examination of such evidence as we have in the latter case shows that at the least the verdict must be one of "Not proven," even the comparative mythologists may be forgiven if they refuse to become diggers of history out of the wells of indefinitely more ancient, and therefore more uncertain, traditions. If we will generalize, our generalizations must be based on facts, not on fancies; if we deal with particular events, we may be sure that in a vast number of instances our task will be far harder than we may be inclined to suppose that it will be. In either case a loose acceptance or rejection of evidence will cause mischief which will spread far beyond the regions of theory. Dreams about government must be followed sooner or later by a very ugly awakening.

Mr. Bisset's volume is taken up with an examination of some of these dreams, and some of these instances in which, for whatever purpose, historians have handled evidence essentially judicial in a way which is certain to defeat the ends of justice. If we say that the latter portion of his work is far more valuable than the former, we do but imply that, excellent though his remarks may be on the generalizations of M. Comte and even of Mr. Buckle, they can scarcely do more than slay those who are already slain. Without disparaging the genius of M. Comte, or even questioning here the truth of his philosophy or theology, we may very safely hold that, so far as they rest on deductions from history, they rest on a foundation wholly of his own devising. His system may conceivably be right; though Dr. Whewell has shown long ago that the idea of there being a good positive stage of science which in the order of history succeeds a bad metaphysical stage is a mere dream. But M. Comte's dreams are mischievous dreams. We shall simply misinterpret the whole history of the world if we listen to his talk about the transcendent wisdom and beneficence of the old Egyptian priesthood, and to his placid assertion that the statesmen of Greece and Rome, greater though they were in his judgment than all modern statesmen put together, are but incomplete personages in comparison with "the fine theoretical nature of antiquity." But, exploded though the notion may be among genuine historical scholars, the fancy that the sciences or the art of Europe was cradled in Egypt, or Nineveh, or Babylon, is so widely spread among less informed or more credulous men, that Mr. Bisset has done excellent service in once more giving M. Comte's dreams in review. It is well to strip of their majestic generalizations a philosopher who bids us venerate the memory of Joseph and impostors; who, by an astounding chain of logic, holds that the nation of Aristophanes derived its strength from the errors which had sprung up during the long intellectual interregnum between the age of Socrates and his own (37), and who insists that there must always be a necessary harmony or correlation between the form of government and the state of civilization (40). It is manifestly impossible, as Mr. Bisset replies, to explain changes and revolutions except by the fact that the form of government has come to be out of harmony with a large portion of the people.

Such a discordance between the aims of the rulers and the wishes of the governed pre-eminently marks the age of the Stuart Kings of England; and Mr. Bisset very fairly insists that, if we fail to understand the government of the Stuarts, we cannot take a right measure of the resistance which brought about their downfall. The Tudors and Stuarts are no favourites with Mr. Bisset; indeed, he makes no secret of his opinion that their government was suited only to savages such as the Zulu Kaffirs. Perhaps others, who have reached this conclusion by a different road, may be disposed to think the expression not much too strong. That English freedom would have been effectually crushed if the schemes of Strafford had met with no opposition, few will be hardy enough to deny. If, in addition to this, the evidence of history seems to show that, in the eyes of the Stuarts, the lives of their subjects were at their absolute disposal; that these lives were taken, when it became necessary to take them, without process of law, that such crimes were concealed by an unbounded use of lies and terrorism, that even the imputation of suspicion against the King or his Ministers brought with it almost inevitable ruin; that evidence was suppressed or fabricated, documents mutilated or forged, and that judges and lawyers were in league to uphold this iniquitous system, we can but confess that Mr. Bisset's vehement denunciations of the infamy of more than one of these Kings, and of James I. in particular, are justified. The matter is wholly one of evidence, and we must admit further that, if in the instances cited his position should be regarded as substantiated, the number and enormity of the cases must be held to settle the point definitely.

The incidents which Mr. Bisset has examined in detail in the present volume are those which relate to the deaths of Lord Gowrie and Alexander Ruthven, of Prince Henry, the eldest son of James I., of Sir Thomas Grenbury and Lord Salisbury, and finally of Lord Essex, who on the eve of the trial of William Russell died, or was murdered, in the Tower. With the evidence in each and all of these cases Mr. Bisset urges that some at least of the historians who profess to deal with it have dealt unfairly, but within the limits of a few paragraphs it is obviously impossible to go through any one of them thoroughly. The Gowrie story, however, is, in its atrocity and its complications, so cruel an instance that, if the crime can be charged on King James, all antecedent improbability is taken away from any other iniquities attributed to so merciless a tyrant and so shameless a liar. At stating the fact is significant that Hume, who dismisses the death of the father in one or two lines, is absolutely silent on the subject of the tragedy which resulted in the death of his two sons and the wiping out of his name. Of Walter Scott it is enough to say that he gives full trust to the narrative of the King, and, "not content with turning a story resting upon such evidence into history, has, in one of his romances, characterized the basest and most cowardly act of a life of cowardice and baseness as one in which King James 'showed the spirit of his ancestors' (191). But the evidence which is forthcoming contradicts this story in every particular, and acquires increased force when we remember that it admits 'the uninterrogated, untested evidence of a single and deeply interested witness' (193). The King told a story, which Walter Scott follows, that Alexander Ruthven decoyed him from the hunting-field by telling him about a man with a pot of gold (George Grainger, it, who seems to have been master of Lord Gowrie's household, swears that when, on the King's arrival, he asked young Ruthven the reason of his coming, the answer was, that Robert Abercromby had brought the King there to cause His Majesty to take order for his debt. This Abercromby was not produced, and the suppression of his evidence must be taken into account against the King, on whose side even the torture of the boot could extort nothing more than mere expressions of opinion not antagonistic to his version of the matter. If we take the evidence of Andrew Henderson, the supposed man in armour, we find him asserting that the King would have been twice stabbed that day had he not relieved him, and if we believe the King's story, that this man enabled him to throw open the window and cry "Treason! Murder!" we have before us a man who deserved to be well rewarded by the King. But the summons of treason issued in August includes the name of Andrew Henderson, and, again, by October this same name has disappeared from the list of traitors. Moreover, in his first deposition he swears that Ruthven intended to murder the King, the second asserts that he wished only to keep him a prisoner. "The memory of a man who was telling truth could not," Mr. Bisset holds, "put him on such a point as this at such a distance of time as two months." In short, he comes to the conclusion that "the whole of Henderson's statement is a tissue of falsehoods, and that there is no evidence of a credible nature that he was at Falkland on that day, or that he was in the chamber with the King and Alexander Ruthven at all" (207). Nay, more, the story of the man with the pot of gold was not the story first told by the King himself. On the day after the tragedy, Nicolson, the English Ambassador in Scotland, wrote to Cecil saying that the King had been enticed to Gowrie House by a message from Lord Gowrie that he had found in an old tower a great treasure to help the King's turn. - But if we take the King's story, in any of its forms, it is full of internal improbabilities of the gravest kind, and he had taken care that the lips of those who could gainsay him should be sealed in death. He had come for the special purpose of seeing the man with the pot of gold; yet for an hour after entering the Earl's lodging he sat grumbling about the long time spent in getting his dinner ready. Why did he not spend the hour in the examination which was the special object of his coming? To explain the plot, the King alleged that the object of the Gowries was vengeance for the death of the Earl, who had been executed in 1585; but with this King James had had nothing whatever to do. To explain the closing scene, he declared that "when Ruthven put his right hand to his sword, he with his right hand seized upon Ruthven's right hand and sword, and with his left hand clasped him by the throat, as Ruthven with his left hand clasped the King by the throat with two or three of his fingers in his Majesty's mouth, to have stayed him from crying" (242). But at the same time and with the same hand to clasp another by the throat, and put three or even two of the fingers of the hand in that other's mouth, is, Mr. Bisset remarks, impossible. The story may prove that there was a struggle; but it proves that the struggle was on Ruthven's part purely defensive, as "he, a young man of at least ordinary strength and courage, would have found no difficulty in dealing with a person of such a feeble body and such consummate cowardice as King James" (244).

But although the chief witnesses against him had been removed by death, and those on whom he could not place sufficient reliance had been executed with all possible despatch, James did not yet feel easy. His story was not believed, and one man was found bold enough and honest enough to tell him to his face that he did not believe it. It was necessary therefore to bring up more evidence; and thus we have, as a second part in this black drama, the narrative of the trial, torturings, and execution of the wretched notary Sprot, and his revelations of treasonable correspondence between Gowrie and Logan of Restarling. While Sprot was yet living to be tortured into satisfactory confessions, the story was that Gowrie had written one letter, which was to be found in Sprot's chest. The King's advocate never, it appears, took any steps to get this letter; but when Sprot was dead, the Privy Council produced not one letter, but a long correspondence, of the genuineness of which some writers speak as though it were unquestionable and unquestioned. It would be almost an injustice to attempt to compress the evidence on which Mr. Bisset holds that they are barefaced and palpable forgeries, and that they were written after the passing of the Act for extirpating the name of Ruthven—a proceeding not only new, but unprecedented—in July 1600, when the letter is said to have been written, in which the writer, by a strange power of divination, anticipates in his own case a penalty which had never yet been devised. We will content ourselves with expressing our gratitude to Mr. Bisset for the masterly and thorough analysis which entitles him to a high place in the ranks of judicial historians. In the eyes of Englishmen it will be no demerit if the impartiality of the judge is united in Mr. Bisset with an intense hatred of the tyranny which the Stuart Kings exercised to their profit in Scotland, and from which they hoped to reap still greater profit in England. It would be well if all historical students would read Mr. Bisset's essays, with the purpose not of accepting his conclusions, but of sifting the evidence on which they rest, and of judging for themselves whether it be possible to come to any other.

DIXON'S SWITZERS.*

MR. DIXON is a most provoking writer, because it is so perfectly plain that the worst features of his style and matter are deliberately put on for a purpose. There is unluckily a large class of mankind which likes extravagant and sensational writing, while it is careless about sense and accuracy. To the perverted tastes of that class Mr. Dixon does not scruple to address himself. There can be no doubt that he does so with his eyes open. Mr. Dixon does not lie under the hard necessity of either writing nonsense or not writing at all. Throughout his writings there are lucid intervals. The push of gaudy and extravagant talk to which he doubtless owes his popularity is ever and anon relieved by intervals which show that he is capable of better things. When Mr. Dixon gets a book ready for the market, he takes good care of the two ends. Without a sensational beginning and a sensational ending the thing would not do; it would not hit the taste of Mr. Dixon's public; perhaps it would not be recognized as a work of Mr. Dixon's at all. But when the two ends are once carefully provided, when the book is ready to come in and go out with a flourish of trumpets, the middle, it seems, may be safely left to itself. There are several parts of this book in which Mr. Dixon condescends to give information which cannot easily be found elsewhere; there are even some places where he condescends still further to clothe that information in a garb of reasonable English. Mr. Dixon, like Mr. Disraeli, seems to have one point on which he is in earnest. On all other points we cannot help suspecting Mr. Disraeli of mocking us, but we know that he gets thoroughly in earnest whenever he begins to talk about Jews. In the like sort Mr. Dixon has his one point on which he seems to be really speaking because he has something to say. That point, as he becomes a member of the London School Board, is popular education. But the effect of coming to the man's real thoughts is different in the two cases. We can always tell when Mr. Disraeli is in earnest by his talking nonsense which he would not have talked at any other time. Mr. Dixon's earnestness, on the other hand, leads him into passing fits of sense. He seems really to have looked with some care into the state of education in Switzerland, and there are several places in this book in which he gives the result of his inquiries in passages which do not sin against good grammar or good taste, and in which we may even now and then find that rare phenomenon in Mr. Dixon's style, the presence of the historical tenses. When he gets upon education he can give us sober facts and figures; he does not think it needful to gasp and pant through every sentence, and he can speak in his own person without resorting to the pseudo-dramatic trick of an imaginary conversation. To be sure the subject is brought in and sent out with a flourish; but, if we may liken Mr. Dixon's arrangement to a sandwich, he gives us a good thick slice of solid meat in the middle. All this shows that he not only has the natural gift of writing sense, but that he has not wholly lost it through the long practice of writing nonsense. But this only makes his offence greater. A man who can do better things whenever he chooses sets himself down in cold blood to gratify a vitiated taste which in his own heart he must despise.

We spoke just now of Mr. Dixon's fashion of throwing things into the form of imaginary conversations. He has a way of bringing out this and that point dramatically, by putting it into the mouths of characters whom we can hardly think that he ever met with in real life, and who look very much as if they were called into being on purpose to set forth this or that side of a question more effectively. Now drama and dialogue, when they profess to be nothing else than drama and dialogue, are perfectly legitimate kinds of composition; but we confess that we doubt whether it is quite the thing for an author to call up puppets of his own creation in order to make books of quite another kind seem a little more lively. Mr. Dixon's very preface is a dialogue of two voices, an English voice and a New York voice. In the English voice we seem to hear the voice of Mr. Dixon himself, and we have a lurking suspicion that the New York voice is set talking purely for the sake of contrast. Directly after, at the very beginning of the book itself, we get an elaborate picture of a Sister Agnes from Wallis and an engineer on public service from Bern, who presently fall discoursing as if they were in a dialogue of Plato. The one talks the most old-world piety, and the other the most enlightened modern philosophy in the highest politest style. We get illustrations from the Caspian Alps and the Plains of Esdraelon; we have a parable of Man and Nature living in peace like a man and wife, growing like each other year by year; and we learn how the people of Italy are not only soft and poetic, which we had heard before, but also "phosphorescent," which is a new light to us. The nun was "warm and feminine, with a drooping brow, and eyes that wait on nature and solicit saintly help." Our acquaintance with nuns is not large, and Mr. Dixon's description, though it sounds very touching, is still so vague that we do not feel certain whether we have ever seen anything like it among ordinary lay women. At all events, the thing described found favour in the eyes of the Bernese engineer; for after the nun, "the golden sunset on her face," had uttered a specially devout sentiment, we read how "a smile that seems to say—if ever smile had meaning—I should like to kiss that nonsense from your lips," plays round his delicate mouth and sparkles in his cold blue eyes. Happily, however, the engineer, "genuine son of Thor" as he is elsewhere called, had the grace to restrain himself; for a moment after he is talking philosophically about the mountain races in every sense. But towards the end of the dialogue a third speaker creeps in unawares, and though the nun still puts in a word now and then, we seem to be hearing a dialogue between the engineer and Mr. Dixon. Then comes a chapter which seems to be all Mr. Dixon's own; we are told how "the sun is sinking, the mist is rising," and how "a flash, a star, a comet, expands and colours the pinnacle of flame." In the next chapter the engineer and the nun turn up again, and after a paragraph put into the mouth of the engineer, we get another paragraph which is made up of the word "Excellior!" This last paragraph, as it is not put into the mouth either of the engineer or of Sister Agnes, we suppose we are right in looking on as the genuine, though not quite original, composition of Mr. Hepworth Dixon. Gradually the nun and the engineer die out, something in the same way as the personal Childe Harold dies out in the poem called after him, and we are left standing face to face with Mr. Dixon himself. The nun makes a formal and pious farewell; but the engineer gradually fades away, as the nun did a chapter or two back, in a mist of statistics and philology; but before he goes, among other statements about language, some of which sound very odd, he tells Mr. Dixon—if it be Mr. Dixon—that "the Swiss language is High German in the Colleges, Low German in the streets." Now really Mr. Dixon is singularly lucky. We never had the good luck to overhear a dialogue between a nun with a drooping brow and an engineer with cold blue eyes. Still less did we ever come across any one in any book or corner of the Everlasting League who told us that High German was spoken in the Colleges, Low German in the streets. Does Mr. Dixon think the difference between High and Low German is a physical one? We have noticed that several of the most learned men in Switzer-

lead carry on their labours, like Esquimaux, up several pair of stairs:—

... εὐσεβὲς μὲν ἐργασίας,
ὁὐκ ἀνασβέδον;

Perhaps Mr. Dixon thinks that that is the reason why their German is said to be High, and he seems to leap to the conclusion that the German spoken by the little boys who run about under their windows must necessarily be Low. It is perhaps by way of following out this view that all the Swiss peasants that Mr. Dixon meets dwell in "thorpes," "Tentonic thorpes." For our own part, we had thought that the word thorpe, as an appellative, had been dead and buried for some centuries, and we do not remember to have met with the word, even in proper names, anywhere south of the Thames. We should rather have looked for our Swiss peasants in High German Dörfer; but, if they speak Low German in the streets, it is not unlikely that they also speak it in the cottages; and, if so, we may reasonably conceive them as cleaving to the oldest forms, and as loyally obeying Grimm's Law by talking of thorpes as Mr. Dixon describes them.

Mr. Dixon's book is throughout written in the sandwich fashion of which we have already spoken. We now go on for several chapters without anything more about Sister Agnes or any particular flourish of trumpets of any kind. To be sure, the next time the trumpets do sound they sound louder than ever. But that is not for several chapters to come, not till Mr. Dixon has got to Einsiedlen, when we get a page or two of the very finest writing, nearly every line having the word "whang" in different forms—"whang," "wha-ang," "wha-a-ang":— ἀρχαῖος πρῶτον πάντας πάντας, ἐξῆν' ἰδὲν παπαπάντα.

Before we get to the whanging, Sister Agnes has appeared again, but before that we have several chapters in which Mr. Dixon really tries to do some politics and history. We know that he is really trying, because in these chapters we get the surest sign of a lucid interval, the employment of the historical tenses. When Mr. Dixon is on the high horse, writing in the "whang, wha-ang, wha-a-ang" style, everything is present or future; in these humbler chapters he stoops, like other men, to imperfects and aorists. To describe the communal institutions of Switzerland is doubtless less exciting than to echo the "whang, wha-ang, wha-a-ang" of the guns on a festival day at Einsiedlen. For many pages together, therefore, we get what, for Mr. Dixon, is a near approach to good sense and good English. And people do fancy such odd things, and make such strange confusions, that in these times we can sincerely thank Mr. Dixon for explaining that the Swiss Communes have nothing whatever to do with the late Commune at Paris. We will let this piece of good service count against the astonishing statement that "the German Kaisers draw their line from Neufchâtel." What Mr. Dixon probably means is the well-known fact that the Kings of Prussia were for several generations Princes of Neufchâtel, but that they drew their line thence is a discovery of Mr. Dixon's. But when we get to the chapters in which he takes upon him to expound the history and constitution of the League and its Cantons we get stranger things still. First and foremost Mr. Dixon, in a book bearing date 1872, still believes in William Tell, in the Three Men, the Thirty-three Men, the Oath of Grütli. Mr. Dixon is trying to explain that Zurich, though the first in rank, is not the oldest Canton, but that Switzerland takes its name from Schwyz; and he does it in this fashion:—

Schwyz gave her name, her genius, and her flag, to the Alliance. From Schwyz we get the name of Switzer; the connexion of religion with democracy; the pure white cross upon the blood-red field. When Tell was tending kine at Hütigen, on the Uri slopes, there were no Switzers save the men of Schwyz. Tell never called himself a Switzer. Tell was a Uranian, and his Canton Uri. Schwyz had gained in war—for she was ever stout in fight—the flag she lent her allies of the League. Three other Forest Cantons, Uri, Unterwalden, and Luzern, were in the League while Zurich stood outside—a feudal and imperial town. But Zurich was a rich and powerful city, and the moment she adhered to the Alliance she assumed in it the leading part. Bern followed her, and shared her power. Luzern, as chief of the four Forest Cantons, claimed an equal rank. As soon as any Federal Council met, this council set by turns in either of these capitals—two years in each. But Zurich and Luzern have each given up the claim to rank as capitals; and now the President, the Council, and the two Assemblies, find a permanent seat in Bern.

What the latter part of this sketch of the growth of the League means we are quite unable to guess. It seems to us that Mr. Dixon has jumbled together the fourteenth century and the nineteenth. We do not know what time he refers to by the words, "as soon as any Federal Council met." The name Federal Council (Bundesrath, Conseil Fédéral) dates only from the Constitution of 1848, while the state of things in which meetings were held in three Forêts in turn belongs only to the Federal Pact of 1815. Then again, who are "the President, the Council, and the two Assemblies"? The Bundespräsident has no existence apart from the Bundesrath, and by the "two Assemblies" it is to be supposed that Mr. Dixon means the two Councils, Chambers, or Houses (Räthe, Conseils), which together make up the Federal Assembly (Bundesversammlung, Assemblée Fédérale). Mr. Dixon would doubtless think it odd, if any Swiss writer on English matters should talk about "the two Parliaments," but here he does exactly the same thing. To be sure he mends matters a little when he gets to a chapter called "the Federal Pact," where he does give a fair account of the Constitution now under revision. He makes, however, the mistake of thinking that the clergy are excluded from both Houses of the Assembly, whereas the restriction applies to the National Council only.

Mr. Dixon is not much more lucky with the Constitutions of the Cantons. He gives the following description of what he calls Parliamentary Democracy:—

In each of the first group of Cantons—that of Parliamentary Democracy—a council, called the Grand Council, is elected by the voters having civil rights; that is to say, by males who have attained the legal age and have not lost their rights by either emigration, idleness, or crime. The voting is by ballot. This Grand Council names a smaller body, called a State Council; and these two chambers choose, according to a form laid down, a President, who bears the title of Avoyer, Landammann, or Burgomaster, to conduct the government and execute the laws. A meeting of these members is the Cantonal Assembly. From their decisions there is no appeal. The three estates of President, State Council, and Grand Council exercise the sovereign power.

We wonder whether Mr. Dixon ever took the trouble to look at the Constitution of Geneva. To talk about "the three Estates of President, State Council, and Grand Council" might be a mere silly flourish on the part of one who probably fancies that one of the three Estates of England is the King. But it is utterly unpardonable in one who is pretending to explain Genevese politics to leave out of sight so important a body as the Council General—that is to say, the whole body of electors. It is by them, not, as Mr. Dixon says, by the Grand Council, that the executive power, the Council of State, is chosen. And it is by the Council of State alone—not, as Mr. Dixon says, by the Council of State and by the Grand Council together—that the President is chosen. Moreover, the President is a mere Chairman of the Council of State, and not, as any one would think from Mr. Dixon's account, an independent power in the Commonwealth. Nor is Mr. Dixon much more lucky when he gets from "Parliamentary Democracy" into "Absolute Democracy." He gives a description of a Uri Landsgemeinde which is both weak and inaccurate, and which shows that he can never have seen one. The readers of the Saturday Review may possibly remember descriptions of Landsgemeinden by those who had seen them, and they need hardly trouble themselves with Mr. Dixon.

From Uri Mr. Dixon goes on through Graubünden, where, oddly enough, he finds Lutherans at Chur; through Zurich, where he finds a church of "Charles the Great," meaning doubtless the Great Minister of the twelfth century, which is a church of Charles the Great only in the sense in which the present St. Paul's is a church of Ethelbert. But Mr. Dixon was perhaps misled by the statue on the south-west tower, the statue of "Kaiser Karli," as the Zurichers speak of the great Emperor, in the same spirit of indulgent familiarity which Lucius Papirius showed to Jupiter himself. A little way on we read:—"In the Virgin's quarter, near the Town Hall, stand the city schools for boys." The words "Virgin" and "school for boys" make us think that Mr. Dixon has got the cloister of the Frauenmünster in his head; but if by the Town Hall he means the Rathhaus, we cannot follow him in his topography. Presently we read that in Zurich "singing clubs were formed. A theatre was built. Some fine hotels were added to the town. The Dom was put into repair." The "Dom" is, we suppose, yet another name for the Great Minister; but the short sentences show that Mr. Dixon has got into the gasping mood; so the next sentence is—"a higher spiritual plane was reached." We have now got into the region of fine writing, and we have only to ask what "a spiritual plane" may be, and whether it applies only to the "Dom," or also to the theatres and hotels. In another chapter or two Mr. Dixon gets once more to an account of the beginnings of the League, which it is hardly worth while to examine in detail, but which at least has the merit of being written in the past tense. This chapter seems to show a process of enlightenment in Mr. Dixon's mind; for though he still talks about the oath of Grütli, he has nothing to say about William Tell. But in a later chapter both Grütli and Tell appear in the mouth of a priest of Schwyz, who, however, confronts them with the names of Kopp and Rilliet. It is plain then that by the time that Mr. Dixon had got thus far he had heard the names of Kopp and Rilliet. Whether he ever heard of Hisely, Huber, and Vischer, and a crowd of others who have had their share in substituting history for legend, we are not told. Now the judgment of charity is that Mr. Dixon learnt something as he went on, in the very process of making his book. In his first mention of these matters he seems to swallow the whole myth without straining at a single detail. This is, we fear, not a very unlikely state for many people to be in even now; but it is hardly the state in which a man should sit down to write even the shortest sketch of the history of Switzerland. In the second stage we hear nothing of William Tell. The last reflexion of the Sun-god has died away from Mr. Dixon's story, as the sun himself died away in the piece of fine writing earlier in the book. To disbelieve the story of Tell, but to believe the story of the oath, is a possible frame of mind. The story of the oath, though there is no historical evidence for it, is not so palpably mythical as the story of the archer. Are we then to infer that between these two stages of his work Mr. Dixon had taken a dose of Kopp and Rilliet, or at least had heard of their names, and was thus brought to what we may call a half-critical state of mind? If so, why did he not make use of his new light, and cut out all that he had before written about William Tell? A conscientious scholar would have done so; but we know how conscientious scholars set about their business, while we do not know how writers of the school of Mr. Dixon set about theirs. Are we to infer that books of this class are written in such a desperate hurry that the author never stops to correct what he has written, and perhaps forgets what it is? Or are we to suppose that, though Mr. Dixon's study of Kopp and Billiet had convinced him that William Tell was a myth, yet he did not find it prudent to strike out what he had written about the mythical hero, because William Tell was the only Switzer of whom his public had ever heard, and to them a book on the Switzers which had nothing in it about William Tell would have seemed a contradiction.

We have now done with Mr. Dixon. We believe that he might have done good service—indeed we do not deny that to some extent he has done good service—in collecting facts about communal, educational, and military matters. An account in sober English of what Mr. Dixon has seen and heard on these points would have been of use to readers of a higher class than his ordinary public. But it is not for such readers that Mr. Dixon writes. He has chosen his own lot, and a man who might do better things deliberately caters for those who are attracted by imaginary conversations between blue-eyed engineers and nuns with downcast brows, and who, we suppose, see something either of wit or of eloquence in a page mainly made up of inarticulate sounds.

ELZE'S LIFE OF LORD BYRON.*

THIS book, as the translator allows, will not add to our knowledge of Lord Byron's history. The author has used old materials without sifting them. Yet, excepting some errors, especially in his judgment upon the quarrel between Lord and Lady Byron, he has given, though not a brilliant nor a lively, a good solid chronicle of Byron, which is said to be the first, besides one of little note, that has appeared in Germany. The reason for republishing the book in England is not quite plain. The two last chapters—"Characteristics of Byron" and "Byron's Place in Literature"—which the translator thinks important and novel, might have been printed without the four hundred pages of old matter which has been open for years past to everybody in England. If we might hazard a guess at the reason, we should say that the preface sounds as though it were meant to stimulate the imperative demand of friends for the publication of a coming book, heralded as the late Lord Broughton's final and complete vindication of Lord Byron. It is hard to disturb the reveries of enthusiasts, but we must remind Dr. Elze and his translator that no words of Lord Broughton can weigh down the damning evidence on record. Besides, Lord Broughton has warned us that he will not tell everything, that he will not discover anything injurious to Byron. "My sole wish," he says in his "Posthumous Memoirs," "was to do my duty to my friend"; and elsewhere we find these words of his, well worthy of note:—"I know more of B— than any one else, and much more than I should wish anybody else to know." Nor is it to be forgotten that he, above all, was the destroyer of Lord Byron's memoirs. It is too much to ask for implicit faith in the new version of an interpreter whose own act has prevented us from comparing it with the original.

We must perhaps make one qualification to the statement that Dr. Elze has not added to our knowledge of Lord Byron's history. If we may trust him, uncontradicted by his translator, he has made certain, what was before conjectural, the cause of the quarrel which ended an affectionate friendship of fifteen years, beginning from 1815, between Lady Byron and Mrs. Leigh. They did not quarrel about money matters, but because, on the publication of Moore's Life of Byron, in 1830, Lady Byron, reading the scenes which ended in the second offer of marriage, discovered that Mrs. Leigh, who was at Newstead in September 1814, was the friend whom Lord Byron had consulted before he wrote the pretty letter.

It is not easy to tell by what rule the leaders of Lord Byron's defence divide his friends from those whom they would call his enemies. The editor of Medora Leigh sent forth a book to vindicate Byron, and Dr. Elze thinks that the vindication was complete; yet Dr. Mackay has received even less mercy than might have been expected by an enemy. Again, in Moore's book, which Dr. Elze praises as a masterpiece of extenuation, the translator finds only Lord Byron's charming letters and journals encumbered by the author's tedious, turgid reflections. The unfriendly regard in those cases may perhaps be attributed to the unwitting disclosure by Dr. Mackay and Mr. Moore of facts which, well considered, compel conclusions most unfavourable to Lord Byron. On the other hand, Byron's character as drawn by Dr. Elze is of the vilest. Yet the biographer is praised by the translator for his skilful and artistic use of the old materials, and for the truth and soundness of his critical judgments, with a gentle hint that perhaps his analysis of the rich and varied traits of Lord Byron's character is as unparing as it is elaborate. The reason of this forbearance may be that, while Dr. Elze writes down crime and folly in the plainest words, he writes without a sign of moral disapprobation, and seems to absolve the offender because he was a very young man, of rare genius and ungoverned temper, and had been hugely aggravated by his wife. We do not contest the fitness of ranking Dr. Elze among Lord Byron's friends, but there seems no sufficient reason why those who cannot agree that crime and folly are to be thus unqualifiedly should be branded as small men, slanderers, and enemies. Byron, has, in truth, no enemies. The world, which in his lifetime showed no lack of love and admiration, chastened by transient fits of just anger, is still only too ready to pity and forgive for the sake of his transcendent genius. How should he have an enemy? His contemporaries are gone; and there is no living poet who, pretending to vie with him, can hate him for the same cause for which he hated Shakespeare. It is ridiculous to call those the enemies of Byron who simply decline to worship a man whose image is thus graven by one devotee and set up by another. We copy a few out of many such strokes:—

An unmanly vanity which displayed itself not only in his person, in his dress, and in his manners, but leavened at last his whole character.

The greatness of Shakespeare excited in him only mortification and jealousy, and he gave vent to these feelings in censures as bitter as they were unjust.

He told Lady Blessington that Shakespeare owed one half of his popularity to his low origin.

His character, in spite of its undeniably finer qualities, has been shown to be—inconsistent, vain, embittered, petty, unmanly, egotistical, often insincere and distrustful.

The question, doubtless, had been debated also between Byron and Shelley. The latter, at any rate, it is well known, could not be convinced that marriage between brother and sister was absolutely sinful, and appealed to antiquity, to the Ptolemies, and to other examples.

The immorality [of Don Juan] lies rather in the cynical nihilism that pervades the whole poem, which destroys the difference between good and evil, between right and wrong, between the beautiful and the repulsive, and degrades all things alike to the meanest level—everything, in short, but sensual pleasure.

Goethe declares Don Juan to be the most immoral work which poetic art ever produced.

Enough, Byron was a porcus de grege Domini Joannis [a hog from Don Juan's sty], and Fletcher, though he had a wife at home who had not separated from him, worthily followed him as his Leporello.

His poetry bears the same relation to his life as his own Apollo-like head to his Satyr-like feet.

We have not space to mention more than two of Professor Elze's minor errors. When Lord Byron bequeathed all that he possessed to Mrs. Leigh and her children, it was not because his father and her father, Captain Byron, had wasted her mother's fortune; for, in the will made in 1811, and unrevoked until 1815, the year of Medora Leigh's birth—the will by which he gave 7,000*l.* to the young (treck—he did not give one shilling to his sister. Walter Scott never accused Lady Byron of capriciousness of temper; but he did tell of a visit that she paid to Abbotsford in 1817, and he spoke of her as one of the most interesting creatures he had ever seen, and of her patience and becoming resignation; he said that his heart ached for her, and he wondered that, young and beautiful, having birth and rank and fortune and taste, and high accomplishments and admirable good sense, she could have failed to make Lord Byron happy. Her visit must have recalled to his memory the scene in Murray's drawing-room two years earlier, when Byron quoted to him with the bitterest despair the strong expression of Shakespeare:—

The gods are just, and of our pleasant vices
Make instruments to scourge us;

and added:—

I would to God that I could have your peace of mind, Mr. Scott; I would give all I have, all my fame, everything, to be able to speak on this subject [that of domestic happiness] as you do.

The more serious errors of Dr. Elze lie in his narratives of the destruction of the Memoirs and of the separation. First, as to the Memoirs. The manuscript was the absolute property of Murray, who, on the day after the news of Byron's death had arrived in London, offered it for two thousand guineas (the price that he had paid to Moore) to Wilmot Horton, who at the time of the separation had represented Lady Byron, and was now the representative of Mrs. Leigh. The two ladies were of one mind. Colonel Doyle was to have acted for Lady Byron; and when, for a reason that will appear presently, she was forbidden to interfere, the Colonel and Wilmot Horton were both permitted to appear under the name of two friends of Mrs. Leigh. Gifford, whose judgment Lord Byron had always regarded as almost infallible, pronounced that the manuscript was too gross for publication. Hobhouse insisted that it should be burned. Moore, who meant to take it away from Murray and to edit the Memoirs for Longmans, protested that he, and he only, had a right to pay for the redemption of the manuscript, and entreated that it might be placed in quarantine with a banker until the leprous parts had been cut out. To this Wilmot Horton assented, saying that it was what he meant to propose. Hobhouse and Moore agreed that it would be treachery to Lord Byron to suffer Lady Byron to interfere. The manuscript was to be given to Mrs. Leigh, and she was to determine whether it should be destroyed or saved. But she had not the two thousand guineas, and Lady Byron offered to pay the price, as that the Memoirs might be delivered to Mrs. Leigh, to be dealt with as she might think fit. Lord Byron's friends, Gifford, Hobhouse, and Dr. Mackay, all declared it to be essential to his reputation that the Memoirs should not be published; Hobhouse and Moore agreed that, although she might pay the money to prevent the publication, she should have no power over the manuscript. Wilmot Horton, deemed that it might be published and preserved. Until the very end it was considered as a matter of course, that if Moore paid the money, it should be preserved for him; but, if Lady Byron's offer was accepted, it should be at the absolute direction of Mrs. Leigh. The strange will of Hobhouse over-some Wilmet Chilton's desire and Miss's hand stopped. But however the destroyer of the Manuscript. Is a last desperate effort to save them. Murray pointed out that he would be a shrewd offer to him if he did not refuse and deliver the manuscript to Mrs. Leigh. He flung away, and Murray received, the two thousand guineas that he had borrowed from Langens. Misshouse held him to his promise to place the manuscript in Mrs. Leigh's power, and it was burned. Wilmet Chilton's motive was obvious. If the objectionable portions could be saved, he would be glad to save Lady Byron's money. Why did Misshouse refuse so reasonable a proposal, and demand that the manuscript should be destroyed unopened? Is the answer to be found in his words that he knew much more of Lord Byron than he wished anybody else to know? Did he find—for he had read the manuscript beforehand—hidden thoughts that ran through it and might one day be uncovered? He pleased Moore, who was not rich, and many a time afterwards urged him, in vain, to accept Lady Byron's money. Is it to be supposed that Lord Broughton was a go-between, seeking, with a bribe furnished by Lady Byron, to persuade Murray to destroy her husband's defence against calumny? Yet that is the charge which Dr. Elze brings against Lady Byron.

* Lord Byron: a Biography, with a Critical Essay on his Place in Literature. By Carl Elze. Translated with the Author's sanction, and abridged with notes, with Portrait, and Facsimile. London: John Murray.

We did not expect that the sophistries with which we dealt two years ago would come before us again, vamped up as foreign novelties; that we should be called upon to repeat that Lady Byron was neither mad, nor guilty of an atrocious lie for a most wicked purpose. As to her sanity, it may suffice to say that through the whole course of the events which are still the subject of controversy, all the world, foes as well as friends, were watching her with eyes vigilant or jealous. A mere doubt of the soundness of her understanding would have been invaluable to her husband, as his surest, his only sure, defence against the charges upon which she demanded separation. No such suspicion was suggested, and we will not, a dozen years after her death, in order to evade a difficulty and save the trouble of thinking, pretend to believe that she was a mad woman. Granting the truth of the accusation published by Mrs. Stowe, the conclusion that it was the cause of separation seemed inevitable. Then came the letters of January and February 1846, the startling fact that Lady Byron and Mrs. Leigh were affectionate friends at that time, and until the year 1850, and the evidences, collected by the Quarterly Review, proving that at the time of the separation and down to his death, in the year 1824, Lord Byron's fixed and deliberate feelings towards his wife were those of respect and admiration. These are things which his advocates have never attempted to explain, and which, in parting with the controversy (20th January, 1870) we pointed out as presenting the difficulty. Dr. Elze acknowledges that the affair is involved in obscurity, and, professing himself unable to reconcile such contradictions, covers them over with a cloud of idiosyncrasies, hallucinations, mental delusion, and monomania. We find a difficulty on the one hand, but we find impossibilities on the other; and, because we see no other way of escape out of the obscurity, we may recommend for consideration the solution offered in a vindication of Lady Byron which came out last summer—that the crime published to the world by Mrs. Stowe had been forgotten before the marriage; that it was discovered, and, being deeply repented, was forgiven after the marriage; that Lord Byron would have renewed it, but did not prevail; and that it was not the real cause of separation, although Mrs. Stowe has testified that Lady Byron declared to her that it was.

Of Byron's place in literature we cannot speak fully here. Dr. Elze ranks him with Shakespeare and Milton, herein going beyond Chateaubriand, who held him to be the greatest poet that had arisen in England since Milton. Chateaubriand was perplexed because his name had never been mentioned by Lord Byron, who followed his footsteps among the ruins of Greece, along the shores of the Mediterranean, and through Rome, and who seemed to have borrowed some outlines from L'Histoire to adorn them with his own colouring in Childe Harold's Pilgrimage. Edgar Allan Poe said that he who sang Childe Harold was of the family of René; M. Villemain, that the imaginations in the incomparable pages of René had been re-created in Childe Harold. For twenty years French and English journals had been filled with controversy on the works of Chateaubriand, and English critics had compared him with Lord Byron, who must have heard his name; and it was passing strange that, citing almost every contemporary French writer, he should have passed it by unnoticed. René might surely claim some part in the creation of that one single person who had appeared in the various characters of Childe Harold, Conrad, Lara, Manfred, and the Giaour. The question which troubled Chateaubriand can perhaps be answered by those who have studied the Byron mystery, and are acquainted with René, with the chapter in the Génie du Christianisme entitled De l'usage des passions, and with the Défense du Génie du Christianisme—those passages of it especially which tell how Chateaubriand had fought against the humour that possessed the young man of his time to be guilty and gloomy after the fashion of Rousseau and Werther, and those other passages which sum up the character of René, and mark the different degrees assigned to him and to his repentant victim. Byron persistently obtained from Chateaubriand any obligation to René. A reason will suggest itself to those who consult the books, and we will not unnecessarily dilate upon the historical theme.

COMMENT ON MODERN GREEK FOLK-LORE.

THIS interesting book Professor Schmidt has given us of his work on modern Greek folk-lore as illustrations of Hellenic antiquity makes an important contribution to the knowledge of the remaining past. If it were only an account of the amount of information it contains, a great part of which has been obtained by the author himself from the mouths of peasants and other Greeks of low degree, it would be invaluable to students of comparative mythology and folk-lore; but it has many other good qualities to recommend it. Professor Schmidt has not thought it beneath the dignity of a scholar to pay attention to the arrangement and condensation of his material, so that if the other volumes of his work correspond in this respect with the first, and if he will deign to provide it with a practical index, ordinary readers will be able to consult it without undergoing the pains which so many erudite books inflict upon them. He seems, moreover, to possess a large share of the judgment and critical calmness which very learned men sometimes prove themselves to lack, and therefore he deserves to be listened to as an umpire rather than as a partisan when he discusses those questions concerning race which have given rise to so much heartburning among Hellenes and Philhellenes.

In his preface Professor Schmidt expressly declares that his work is of a purely antiquarian nature, and that it is not intended to be, what the Greek newspapers said it was to be, a reply to Fallmerayer and his disciples. But his opinion is thoroughly opposed to that of the celebrated upholder of the theory that the modern Greeks are mainly of Slavonic descent, and he gives it full expression both directly and incidentally. The conclusion at which he arrives is, that although the Slavonians undoubtedly occupied parts of Greece, yet they did not eject the original inhabitants, who ultimately proved sufficiently strong and numerous to absorb their invaders. "The Greeks have not been Slavized," he says, "but the Slavonians have been Hellenized." In support of this opinion he relies mainly on the fact that the language of the people shows but few traces of Slavonic influence, being a direct descendant from that spoken by the Greeks of the classic period. Of late years the various dialects of Greece have been carefully studied, and one of the results of this research has been the proof that a number of classic words and expressions have been retained by the peasantry although they have died out of the speech of educated men—a fact which he thinks strongly in favour of the supposition that there has never been a break in the Hellenic character of the population of Greece. So far as this part of his argument is concerned, and in his remarks about the neglect of Fallmerayer to test his theory by researches among the islanders as well as the mainlanders, we are entirely of Professor Schmidt's opinion. But we are inclined to doubt some of the conclusions which he deduces from the unquestionable similarity between the customs and the superstitions of the modern Greek peasantry and those of the ancient Greeks. That Professor Schmidt has proved such a likeness in every case which he adduces there can be no doubt. But we venture to suggest that in many instances Slavonic superstitions are more akin to those of new Greece than the religious ideas of the old Greeks can now be proved to have been. It is true that it may be replied that the Slavonians have borrowed from the Greeks, and Greek ideas have indisputably affected, to no small extent, the folk-lore of at least the Eastern Slavonians. But it seems probable that the beliefs of the common people in modern Greece have taken more of their colouring than Professor Schmidt will allow from those of the foreigners who, at one time, according to Constantine Porphyrogenitus, so overran "all Hellas and the Peloponnesus," that "the whole country was Slavized and became barbarian."

Professor Schmidt has divided the first volume of his work into five sections, the first of which is devoted to the "Heathen Elements in the Christian Faith and Worship" of the modern Greeks. In it he shows how the traditions connected with the ancient religion have been in many cases preserved by the memory of the people, although the old gods and demigods have been changed into saints and other Christian characters. Sometimes the name of a dethroned divinity is to be heard in the speech of the people, as when the Cretan exclaims ἡσυχίαν πρὸς Ζεὺς ἡμῖν—the word Ζεὺς being supposed to represent "O Zeus!"—or talks about the village Ζεφύρα—i.e., Vale of Zeus, which lies at the foot of Mount Ida. Sometimes the attributes of the Olympian ruler have been transferred to the Christian Deity, the word θεός conveying to the mind of the modern Greek peasant the ideas which were connected with the name Zeus by his pagan predecessors. Thus, when a thunder-storm takes place, he exclaims, Βοῆς ὁ θεός, or—in allusion to the firing of guns and the general uproar consequent upon a wedding—ὁ θεός παντρεύει τὸν υἱόν μου, "God is celebrating his Son's marriage." One peculiarity of the modern Greeks, as distinguished from those of old, is that they represent God as riding like the German Wotan, the Scandinavian Odin. Zeus, like Thor, either walked or drove. But the θεός of the present day resembles Zeus in many other respects; as, for instance, in that he produces earthquakes by bowing his head or shaking his locks.

But, as a general rule, the respect paid to the heathen gods has been transferred, as in other lands, to the Virgin and the Saints. St. Nicholas has succeeded to Poseidon as the ruler of the seas and the rescuer of shipwrecked mariners. In Focæ, for instance, he is known by the name Θαλασσιεύς, and is invoked in a church upon the shore. St. George is the patron of warriors, and rescues prisoners taken in battle. Cosmas and Damian carry on the work of the old gods who cured diseases; St. Marina fulfils many of the functions formerly attributed to both Artemis and Aphrodite. The old local gods have become local saints—one spot boasting of a St. John surnamed ὁ κυνηγός, and another of a St. George μυθουργός, the latter of whom appears to have inherited some of the worship formerly paid to Dionysos. In one popular tale the discovery of wine by Dionysos is attributed to a St. Dionysius; in another St. Paul, as a Christian Herakles, is spoken of as clearing Oreste of wild beasts. The holy pictures of the present day have, in some cases at least, taken the place of the old idols, many of them being looked upon as oracular. A picture of the Virgin Mary, for instance, was seen by Professor Schmidt in a grotto near Kallipádo, in Zacynthus, on which peasants who had questions to ask stuck small pieces of copper money. If the coins adhered to the picture, that meant Yes. If they dropped off, that meant No. The burning of lights also before these pictures, and the Easter-tide decking of the churches with foliage, seem evident relics of heathenism, while a Christian version of the Torch Procession which formerly took place during the greater Eleusinia may be recognized in the funeral procession which on Good Friday evening passes through the streets of Athens with blazing lights and mournful song—a procession, by the way, of which Curt Wachsmuth has given an interesting account in his excellent sketch of the subject which Professor Schmidt is now treating in detail, entitled Das alte Griechenland im neuen. The cakes, in some respects answering to our Christmas plum-pudding, in which, under the names of τὰ στυπὰ and τὰ κόλυβα, the modern Greeks indulge on days consecrated to the dead or to the Saints, are compared by Professor Schmidt with the old Hellenic thankofferings, and the Christmas festivities at which cakes called κουλλοειρα are eaten seem to him due to a recollection of ancient rites in honour of the hearth. So the heathen ἐγκοιμήσις, the sleeping in a temple in order to be rid of a disease, has crept into Christian custom; in Lesbos, for instance, it is still the practice to bring the sick and insane to the Church of the Miraculous Virgin of Agiáso, and there to leave them on a Saturday night. On the Sunday morning it is expected that they will be found hale and sensible. The explanation is, as in heathen times, that the patron of the temple descends at night and performs miraculous cures.

But we must not dwell any longer on this portion of Professor Schmidt's work, or we shall have no space left for the mention of its other sections. Of these, the second is devoted to Demons—τὰ δαιμόνια, as these are often called, just as in early Christian writings the heathen bore the name of οἱ ἔθνη—among whom the place of honour is given by the author to a race of female spirits bearing a singularly strong resemblance to the Russian Rusalkas or the Servian Vilas. Under their present name, the commonest form of which is Νηπαίδας, are grouped the representatives of all the various kinds of nymphs who were known in classic times as Dryads, Oreads, &c., and especially of the Nereids, whom they resemble in some respects, though they are no longer exclusively sea-nymphs. They are generally beautiful both in face and form, though they are sometimes represented with goats' feet. They are not immortal, but they often live for fifteen centuries. They have husbands who resemble the old Satyrs in appearance, but sometimes they fall in love with a modern Hylas, and carry him off into their subaqueous haunts. Indeed several families in Greece are supposed to be descended from them, as certain great houses in classic times traced back their origin to unions between heroes and nymphs. Sometimes, like Swan Maideus, they are captured by mortals, for if a Nereid is deprived of her scarf she loses her magic powers. There are many stories of Nereids who lead quiet lives with their capturers, and prove themselves excellent wives, till some day or other they recover their long-lost scarfs, and immediately disappear. In one case the departing wife not only takes away with her one of her two boys, but also carries off half of her only daughter. In Cephalonia, however, it is held that the truant wife will return to her husband at the end of seven years, provided he has never once left the house during that period.

The Nereid is a sufficiently dangerous sprite, but she is not so much to be feared as the Lamia, whom Professor Schmidt considers the modern representative of her classic namesake, but who seems to be twin sister of the terrible hag known in Lithuania as the Lavne, in Russia as the Yaga Baba, in India as the female Rakhasa. In one of her peculiarities, however, that of sometimes having one foot made of metal and another constructed like that of an ass, she resembles the Hellenic Empusa. The Kalikantzaros, a sort of wer-wolf, seems to be of decidedly foreign origin, especially as his name can be traced, through the Albanian, to the Turkish Kara-Kondjolos. He makes his appearance only during the period between Christmas Day and the Epiphany. At that time he asks all whom he meets the question "Cork or Lead?" If they answer "Cork," he does not molest them; but if they say "Lead," he attacks them with his sharp nails and scratches them almost to death. The only way of keeping him quiet is to give him a sieve and tell him to count the holes in it. This he cannot do, the number three being always avoided by him—for a curious reason, suggests Wachsmuth. The question put by the Kalikantzaros recalls to mind that sometimes asked by the Slavonic Rusalkas, who say "Wormwood or Parsley?" On the unhappy mortal who answers "Parsley" they immediately pounce, and tickle him till he stams at the mouth. Both formulas are now unintelligible, but they are probably corruptions of some foreign phrase which has degenerated into incoherence. When the priest comes to pay his official visit on the 6th of January, the Kalikantzaros disappears. According to a popular tradition, he and his kindred spirits then "dive under the earth and saw away at the great pillar which supports it."

The "Lame Demon" may fairly be traced back to the Satyr of old days, whom some recollection of the fall of Hephaistos has represented with a limp like that of our Wayland the Smith. But he has become very malicious, and is much to be feared, though he may be kept at a distance by fire, or by the burning of fragments of old shoes—the specific hurled by ourselves after a newly-married couple. In the same way the spirit in whom the herdsmen on Parnassus recognize the ruler of hares and wild goats may be identified with Pan. But the Bourkolakas, or Vampire, seems to be of decidedly foreign extraction. Its name Professor Schmidt allows is "undoubtedly of Slavonic origin," being akin to the Servian Vukodlak, wer-wolf, and he justly laughs at the attempt to derive it from such words as σείρα, slime, and λάκκος, a pit, though he admits there is more plausibility in the Μαρμολέκη derivation. But he thinks that, although the modern vampire is called by a Slavonic name, and some of the traditions connected with it may have been borrowed from the Slavonians, yet the original idea is deducible from old Greek superstition. This may be the case, for vampire stories have always flourished in all countries, and among others in classic Greece; but the great similarity between the vampire of Slavonian lands and that which in modern Greece generally bears a Slavonian name leads us to incline towards a different conclusion. It should be stated, however, that in the islands the vampire is found under the really Greek names of καρχαράς, the "devourer," σαρκωμίνος, the "well fed," &c.

The third section of the book is devoted to Guardian Angels, Local Spirits, and Dragons, the last of which bear a strong resemblance to the Fiery Snakes which play so leading a part in Slavonic folk-lore. This section is full of interest, especially as regards the stories about house-spirits and the account given of the sacrifices attendant upon laying the foundation of a new house; but we must now pass rapidly on. In the fourth section the author gives a full account of the Giants who have succeeded to the classic Cyclopes. They are sometimes called Έλλανοί, or Hellenes, that name having been applied in early Christian times to the heathen Greeks as opposed to the orthodox Γραικοί or Ρωμαίοι—i.e., Romans. The fifth and last section deals with the subjects of "Fate, Death, and Life beyond the Grave." The ancient Fates have not altered much, only the people call them οἱ Μοῖραι, instead of αἱ Μοῖραι. Soon after a birth they visit the new-born babe, settle its lot in life, and write their decree on its nose or brow. Consequently it is important to propitiate them, and the infant's relatives are careful to provide a handsome meal for them, and to speak of them euphemistically as "the good, the golden Fates."

The classic Charon, under the name of Χάρος, or Χάρουρας, has become changed from the Ferryman of the Dead into Death itself. Some writers think that Charon was originally the Destroyer, but became changed into the Ferryman under the influence of foreign, probably Egyptian, ideas. Professor Schmidt will not give a decided opinion on this question, but he wishes to point out that the idea of Charos as Death is not absolutely modern, but may be traced back to Hellenic times. The usage of placing a coin in the mouth of a corpse as an offering to the ferryman of spirits—or as a toll, to be paid on crossing the bridge of souls which the Turks have probably introduced into Greek folk-lore—has in recent times been to a great extent abolished by the Church. As for the realm swayed by Charos, it is gloomy in the extreme—the tone of the stories showing, we are told, that, as in old days, death brings with it no benefit, life is still all in all. But this remark might be made with equal justice of the stories of many other lands.

Here we must stop for the present. But we shall wait with much interest for the arrival of the new collection of popular tales and songs which Professor Schmidt promises, and to which he often refers in the most tantalizing manner—a collection which will, we have no doubt, form a most welcome supplement to the works of Fauriel, Passow, Hahn, and the other explorers of the rich field of modern Greek folk-lore.

POOR MISS FINCH.*

OUR prolific novelists are all mannerists, more or less, but no one of them is more of a mannerist than Mr. Wilkie Collins. Were his title-pages suppressed, the least critical of circulating library subscribers might be trusted to pronounce decisively on the authorship of his productions. For his is not mere mannerism of style—although that is marked enough—but a very decided mannerism of mind. He has considerable powers of imagination, but it is plain that his imagination works and schemes with patient deliberation. He plans his stories as a plotting chamber-counsel might draw a settlement, elaborating details with the conscientiousness of a man who guards himself against flaws, and realises his grave responsibilities. The plot must work plausibly, even where it is to be startlingly sensational, and accordingly the wilder its episodes the more realistic are the incidents of its every-day life. It is the art of Deceit adapted to a species of writing which in the days of Defoe was not yet in fashion. There can be no doubt that Mr. Collins has studied the tastes of his public, and in certain instances has pleased them—we will not say pandered to them—with great success. But novels constructed like the Women in White will less than any others bear indefinite repetition. It is hard to cap a climax of sustained and of intricate interest, and one great success in that particular line makes an author his own most formidable rival. Each successive work becomes more of a strain and an effort, and he has to go further afield to grasp the leading conception which is to produce his latest effect. His conception in itself may do the greatest honour to his ingenuity, and yet because it is far-fetched it is likely enough to fail of interesting his readers. We should say this is very much the case with Poor Miss Finch. In Poor Miss Finch we find all the author's characteristic faults and merits, and each intensified. As his faults are of a sort that irritate, we fear they may be found to outweigh the merits; and yet the merits are unmistakable. The plot is constructed with Mr. Collins's customary care, and excellent situations are continually rising out of it. The conception of the heroine entitles him to the credit of the originality he claims for it. There is evidence of observation and research in the information which Mr. Collins has collected, and he uses it in a way that surprises without positively shocking us. And yet we find the book wanting in the two primary essentials of a novel; the heroine fails to charm, and the story flags when it begins to interest us.

* Poor Miss Finch. A Novel. By Wilkie Collins. Author of "The Woman in White," &c. 3 vols. London: Richard Bentley & Co. 1872.

In the first place, Poor Miss Finch is a surgical and a medical novel. Now we are willing to admit that passions sufficiently intense, and situations sufficiently sublime, may be born of pain and physical afflictions. We know that Poor Miss Finch's special burden of blindness has lent itself before now to the noblest purposes of poetry and romance. But then those authors who have turned it to their professional purposes have idealized it gracefully, resting lightly even on the sightless eyeballs, dealing with the thoughts and following the mournful fancies of a mind driven to prey upon itself. Mr. Wilkie Collins recognizes this in his preface, and takes credit for handling the subject of his choice in an original and more natural manner. He undertakes to interpret faithfully what others have misrepresented for artistic purposes—to represent a blind person acting and speaking as she would really act and speak. The professed moral of his story is to show "that the conditions of human happiness are independent of bodily affliction, and that it is even possible for bodily affliction itself to take its place among the ingredients of happiness." How far he has succeeded in the latter part of his design it is difficult to say, for we do not see how a story based on circumstances purely fictitious can prove anything. But, with regard to the former, we have little doubt that Mr. Wilkie Collins has made his blind girl more faithful to nature in thought, act, and speech than Lord Lytton's Nydia. What then? Fidelity is, after all, not the foundation of all fiction. We set Murillo's fanciful Madonnas higher than his realistic monks, and so we prefer the work of art that suggests to us bright impressions and graceful fancies. Mr. Collins's story turns upon a couple of men falling violently in love with blind Miss Finch; but for ourselves we can get no further than pity, and a pity that is by no means akin to love. True, Miss Finch is represented as beautiful. But then naturally she was expressionless; and it seems to us that an infirmity like blindness should chill the passions to a temperature in which it would be impossible for love to spring up. It was not the mere difference of station that made the refined and susceptible Glaucus insensible to the beauties of the blind Nydia. Supposing Miss Finch's charms of mind and person all-sufficient in themselves to captivate our hearts, still the persistence with which her blindness is forced upon us, and subsequently the perpetual presence of the operator, would have been sufficient to disenchant us. Miss Finch's blindness is forced obtrusively upon us; and naturally so, because it is the very point on which everything is made to turn. And when once she is placed under treatment, Mr. Collins's genius revels in the indulgence of his peculiar bent. To do him justice he seems thoroughly to have mastered the technical details of his subject, and talks with all the minute volubility of garrulous science. We do not know that we are hyper-fantastical, but if our sentiment struggles against the idea of the examinations, consultations, and cases of surgical instruments, it is hopelessly killed when it comes to the question of bandages. And if Mr. Collins's heroine idealizes the surgical element in the novel, his hero embodies the medical. Mr. Oscar Dubourg is maltreated by some ruffians, who knock him on the head with a life-preserver. The consequence is that he becomes liable to epileptic fits. Bad things at best, these are very bad in his case, inasmuch as he is engaged to blind Miss Finch, and is passionately impatient to be wedded. The doctor pronounces his immediate marriage out of the question, and even shakes his head over the prospect of his ultimate cure. Is there no remedy, then? demands the distressed lover. There is one, it appears, yet one so terrible that most men, rather than submit to it, would go on suffering. The very simplicity of the prescription and the audacity of its consequences make us assume that Mr. Collins's medical science may be trusted here. The remedy is nitrate of silver. It infiltrates the veins, and, blending with the blood, acts on the epileptical tendencies; in fact, it has effects which are much the reverse of the Ethiopian changing his skin. At all events, under the treatment Mr. Oscar Dubourg turns all over to a permanent dull blue colour. Now this is decidedly novel, and in a sense interesting. But it appears to us that its interest is rather of a character that would achieve a success in the columns of the Lancet, did our distinguished medical contemporary publish a professional familiar. It is in a sense interesting; for Mr. Collins makes the most of his rather repulsive materials, and so far justifies his resort to them. The interest, such as it is, is kept alive by Miss Finch's fluctuations between light and darkness, and by her violent prejudices on the score of complexion. Oscar Dubourg is no sooner well launched on his medical course than he discovers to his horror that his mistress has the antipathy of the blind to anything dark. Were she once to detect the dyeing of his skin, her instincts would infallibly prove far too strong for her love. The consequence is, constant precautions against betrayal, and a series of dangerous mystifications. It sounds unnatural that so startling a secret could be possibly kept at all from a girl whose other senses were preternaturally sharpened by the loss of sight. It would have been altogether impossible had it not been for the extravagant circumstances in which Mr. Collins has placed her for his stage purposes. Be that as it may, the secret is kept, and plays into the hands of Oscar's twin brother when he falls in love with his brother's betrothed. Nugent is a strange mixture of impulse and generosity. He fights his passion for a long time before he yields to it. Then he becomes almost unnaturally a most scheming villain. But, recollecting that this pair of Dromios are identical in everything down to the tones of the voice, at least in everything except their characters and complexions, it is easy to see how ingeniously circumstances may be made to complicate themselves in the hands of a planner of labyrinths so experienced as Mr. Collins. We shall hint nothing as to how the story turns out; whether it leaves the lady in possession of her sight, or one of the brothers in possession of her; whether the curtain falls on revenge or on a general reconciliation. We shall only say that more than once Mr. Collins eludes the foresight which believes it has seized his scheme, and that his last scenes are among the most pleasing and powerful in his story.

We have said that Mr. Collins runs the lines of his story on the familiar model. There is the invariable personage who acts as annotator or chorus, and the book turns at last into the inevitable journal, although, singularly enough, not till the third volume. It is a Madame Pratolungo whom Mr. Collins has selected to tell us the story, and we recollect few personages in the range of his fantastical creations who can boast a more eccentric individuality, or one worse sustained. She is by birth and breeding a Frenchwoman, although, in spite of her protestations to the contrary, nature and Mr. Collins have made her essentially English. She is the widow of a Republican adventurer, and professes to have inherited her husband's principles. But the apostrophes to the Universal Republic, the affected invectives against the rich, which jar on us often at first as excessively out of place and character, gradually become rarer and almost vanish, until they reappear towards the close in an expiring flicker, a tardy tribute to consistency. Madame Pratolungo is in reality a frank, honest-hearted Englishwoman. Notwithstanding the French varnish which Mr. Collins rubs on, and the occasional twaddle he puts into her mouth, and in spite of her odd Republican antecedents, she is eminently practical in thought and action. The worst of it is that her twaddle takes the shape of humour, and Mr. Collins's strong side is certainly not the humorous. He sets about amusing us with the same conscientious conviction that he brings to the construction of his plot, and therefore his failure is not surprising. He seems to think that a joke is like a drama, and that its merit is to be judged by the number of repetitions, forgetting altogether that it is the same set of people who have to sit them out. We should be sorry to calculate how often he invites us to laugh at Madame Pratolungo's "poor papa," so brave and so impressionable—a scampish old roué, whose wonted fires lived in their ashes, and were always burning his daughter's fingers. Then there is the Reverend Finch, the heroine's father, so called systematically throughout the volumes, which leads us to surmise that our critical acumen must be at fault when we detect no joke in the omission of the Christian name. Mr. Finch's prolific wife is distinctly comic, but the comedy is of the sort in which Mr. Charles Reade indulged so generously in a recent work—comedy that may be classed in the midwifery department of this medical novel. Little Jicks, one of Mr. Finch's children, promised very well, but she was probably too light to suit a form of humour which generally reminds us of a bear dancing in sabots, and always coming down heavily in the same place. To sum up, we should say Poor Miss Finch ought to be popular with readers who appreciate ingenuity, are indifferent to poetry, and unsusceptible of the ludicrous. It is unquestionably clever in its way, and there are not times when omnivorous novel-readers can afford to neglect anything with substantial pretensions to cleverness.

MALLESON'S RECREATIONS OF AN INDIAN OFFICIAL.*

UNDER the title of Recreations of an Indian Official Colonel Malleison republishes a series of essays, the majority of which he says have appeared at various times in different periodicals, mostly in the Calcutta Review—a Review, we may observe, which is one of the few undertakings of the kind that have managed so far to survive the difficulties inherent in any literary enterprise conducted under the changeful conditions of Anglo-* Recreations of an Indian Official. By Lieutenant-Colonel G. B. Malleison, Guardian to H. H. the Maharaja of Mysore; Author of the "History of the French in India." London: Longmans & Co. 1872.

Indian life. Originally started, we believe, by Mr John Kaye, when a subaltern in the Bengal army, considerably more than thirty years ago, it has been maintained uninterruptedly ever since, sometimes prosperous, more often struggling, but usually containing articles of respectable ability, and often contributions which deserve a wider circulation than such a vehicle affords. In thus distinctly announcing the sources whence his volume has been derived, Colonel Malletson commendably departs from a practice now too common, of serving up a réchauffé of fugitive essays without any indication of the time or place of their first publication. Not, however, that such a procedure ever really imposes upon anybody, for the appearance of a volume of this sort at once excites the reader's suspicions, although it may be some time before doubts whether he has not seen the thing before become resolved into certainty, even if he should not be able to recollect distinctly the time and place where the first acquaintance was made. Colonel Malletson's action is the more praiseworthy in that it would probably have been quite a safe experiment to reprint essays from the Calcutta Review for English readers as if they were original.

Nearly one-half this volume consists, however, of three articles on the career of Lord Lawrence which appeared in Blackwood in 1869, shortly after that nobleman had resigned the Governor-Generalship of India. These deservedly attracted considerable attention at the time, and were well worth preserving in their present form, as being a well-written and interesting, and, we may add, the only accessible, account on record of that distinguished man's career. At the same time we are bound to add that this part of the book—and indeed the same flavour is apparent in the essays on Sir Bartle Frere and Sir Vincent Eyre—reminds us irresistibly of a Chancery suit affidavit, where every possible fact is cited in favour of the party whose case is advocated, and nothing whatever is admitted adverse to the interests of the suit. The painting is all light and no shade, and the paint is laid on too thick throughout. We have no desire to say anything which could tend to lessen the reputation of a statesman whose career was certainly among the most distinguished of those which have illustrated the history of British India; but if the plan set forth in Colonel Malletson's preface for writing contemporary biography be a valid one, at any rate let it be biography, and not mere panegyric.

The sort of treatment to which we refer, and which will make it necessary, whenever—it is to be hoped not till many years hence—Lord Lawrence's biography comes to be seriously written, to read this particular contribution with a careful commentary, pervades the whole essay so completely that it is impossible to give more than a few indications of it here. We may first notice, for example, the account at p. 17 of Mr. Lawrence's aid to the British cause when magistrate of Delhi during the Sutlej campaign of 1845-6. That great city, we are told, "the possession of which had so often been considered decisive of the fate of India—a city containing within its walls upwards of 150,000 inhabitants, more than half of whom were Mahomedans; a portion of it occupied by the titular King, the descendant of Baber and of Akbar, and by his dissolute Court—was as quiet and secure as any part of India, though scarcely two hundred miles from the seat of war;" which satisfactory result, we are given to understand, was due to Mr. Lawrence's well-known fearlessness and decision of character, which overawed the people. But it was just this peculiarity of the city that would account for its behaviour at that particular crisis. The Mahomedans and Sikhs have been bitter enemies for ages, alternately persecuting each other as they got the chance; and although no doubt in a general way the people of Delhi—Mahomedans or not—as of all other parts of India, would have been pleased to see their masters get a fall, and would have liked a state of excitement and eventual possibilities to replace the dull monotony of our rule, it is not at all probable that they were disposed to do anything to help their hereditary foes, the Sikhs, in getting the upper hand, whose first step in such an event would certainly have been to march upon Delhi, and commence an open persecution of the Mahomedan religion there. Besides, there was no precedent at that time for supposing that advantage would be taken of foreign wars to create intestine disturbances. Had our army on the Sutlej been crushed, a state of general turbulence might have supervened on the disaster; but the general attitude of the people during the war was simply one of expectancy, and we suspect that Delhi would have remained perfectly quiet even if the most incompetent civilian in the country had been in charge of it. Lord Lawrence's character for firmness and courage does not need bolstering up by such far-fetched evidence.

Again, when on the annexation of the Punjab a Board of Administration was formed for its government, and Mr. John Lawrence, who was then Commissioner of the trans-Sutlej States, which formed a portion of the territory subject to this new body, was called up to a seat in it, his brother, Sir Henry, being President, Colonel Malletson tells us (p. 41) that "he had not asked for a seat at the Board," which is very likely, and also that "he had expressed a desire to be allowed to retain his old post as Commissioner of the trans-Sutlej territory; but he was informed that his services were required for the Punjab, and, with the devotion to duty that characterized him, he submitted." As to this we must observe that, if Mr. Lawrence really showed this coyness to undertake higher responsibilities, it was not in the least like him to do so, and was certainly not a thing to praise. Promotion from lower to higher duties is what every deserving Indian civilian looks forward to as an ordinary course—much more a civilian of eminent ability, who would certainly prefer a share in directing the administration of a new country to the subordinate part of carrying out as an executive officer the plans of others; while, we suspect, Lord Lawrence himself would be the first to repudiate any claim to exhibiting devotion to duty when "submitting" to receive a higher appointment with higher pay.

As regards Mr. Lawrence's share in the government of the Punjab, first as member of the Board of Administration, afterwards as Chief Commissioner, or, in other words, sole Governor, it would be invidious to say a word in depreciation. But it is only due to others to point out what would hardly be inferred from Colonel Malletson's essay by a reader coming fresh to the subject, that the extraordinary vigour and success of the Government of the Punjab during the first years of the British occupation were due, first to Lord Dalhousie—his penetration in selecting the right men for employment there, in all grades and departments, and the personal attention and vigour he brought to the matter—and next, and mainly, to the great man who was the first head of the local Government. When Mr. John Lawrence succeeded his brother, Sir Henry, four years after the annexation of the country, the unique system of administration which made the Punjab the model province of India had become firmly established, the main difficulties of the task had been overcome, the frontier policy had been carried into force, and the great public works which Colonel Malletson speaks of as having been "nearly completed" during the government of the younger brother were projected and begun. In this successful and original administration the latter held no doubt an active and important share from the first; but we believe the facts in this case to be quite in accordance with the usage which would fairly bestow the main credit for success in any work on those who, being at the head of affairs, are responsible for results; while it may be fairly doubted whether the extraordinary vigour and devotion to duty which characterized the whole body of Punjab officials in those days would have existed in anything like the same degree but for the warm personal attachment towards himself which the great and good Sir Henry Lawrence inspired in all who came in contact with him.

The second essay in the volume is devoted to Sir John Lawrence's action during the mutiny, and it describes clearly and well behaviour which cannot be placed too prominently before the people of England. It would be difficult for any panegyrist to exaggerate the part taken in that crisis by the man to whom, before every one else, so far as it is possible to distribute the respective importance of shares in any complex event, the salvation is due of the British cause in India. In the face of that crisis the hardness which sometimes created needless friction in civil matters found its use, and when all men had to set their backs against the wall together, there was no room for personal prejudice to work. The judgment which did the right thing at the right time; the energy and directness of purpose; above all, the penetration and self-denial which led Sir John Lawrence to denude his province of troops and concentrate all efforts to recover Delhi, risking everything else to carry this point, the one point to be carried—conduct so plainly the best, yet needing so much courage to exhibit—render this government of the Punjab in 1857 one of the finest feats ever achieved by any Englishman. It is a pity, therefore, that Colonel Malletson should overstate even this case, which needed no undue advocacy, by denying that Sir John ever proposed the abandonment of Peshawar and the trans-Indus country. Unfortunately for this assertion, the original correspondence on the subject is published in the second volume of Sir John Kaye's History of the War, which appeared the year after this essay was published. But in fact Sir John Lawrence's reputation does not need bolstering up in this fashion; he, if any man, can afford to admit, after the event, that his opinion was mistaken, and probably he would be the first to say that it is fortunate his advice on this (at best) questionable point was not acted upon.

The same criticism must apply to the account given of Lord Lawrence's Viceroyalty. In defending every act of his government during the period, Colonel Malletson appears to be going out of the way to run a tilt against imaginary foes; for the number of those who deny all merit to Lord Lawrence's Indian administration must be very small indeed, and they cannot be worth answering. If you describe in glowing colours everything that a man does, and leave out all reference to what he leaves undone, the picture will be hardly a well-balanced or accurate one, while in thus speaking up to his brief Colonel Malletson gives the Governor-General credit for acts which, good or bad, were not his. Thus, where it is said (p. 196) that he directed the formation in the three Presidencies of Sanitary Commissions, we have to observe that the direction in this case came from the Secretary of State, and it was merely Sir John Lawrence's duty to carry out the instructions he received. We may add that these sanitary commissions received decent burial as soon as the sanitary service which had led to their formation. Colonel Malletson does good service when he explodes the fallacy, if indeed there are any fallacious believers in it, that the late Governor-General was deficient in private liberality; but when he talks about the financial management of this time, he opens up a subject upon which, whatever we think the less that is said the better. If, as we understand, there never was a Governor-General more honest or more economical, it must in fairness be added that he was equally liberal with the public purse, and the so-called liberality of the period appears to have consisted in increasing the public expenditure in every

It is of the Administration ever faster than the constantly increasing income. Colonel Malleon, indeed, talks about an excess of income over expenditure to the extent of six millions during the five years in question, if the "extraordinary expenditure" be deducted—this extraordinary expenditure being incurred for transports, for building the India Office, and various public buildings at Bombay, and for extensive new barracks. If the salaries of all public officials during the same time were to be deducted, as well as the cost of constructing roads, and the interest on guaranteed railways, the surplus would have been still more handsome. If once you begin with the juggle about ordinary and extraordinary expenditure, you may bring out any result you please. We remember to have read something about this kind of finance, and the manipulation of ordinary and extraordinary Budgets, among our neighbours on the other side of the Channel; and so far as we understand the general result of Lord Lawrence's financial administration, it was distinguished by the removal of the Income-tax, which was put on again immediately afterwards, and a general increase of salaries all over the country. Both measures may have been very proper in their way, only their financial aspect is hardly their most commendable. The fact is that of anything like intelligent finance in the proper sense during Lord Lawrence's Viceroyalty there is scarcely a trace perceptible; but it is not given to anybody to excel in everything, and it is no discredit to that distinguished man that he should not have excelled in a branch of government for which his official education had afforded no training.

There is one point more as to which we have to offer a remark. Colonel Malleon speaks (p. 209) of the unsatisfactory mode in which the cumbrous machine of Governor-General and Council worked during the five years of Sir John Lawrence's incumbency. The fact is, that the Supreme Council requires in the Governor-General rather a master than a colleague. It has, however, been too much the tendency of recent legislation to place the Viceroy and his councillors more on a level of equality.

This extract appears to combine a curiously distorted criticism with a distinct blunder as to facts. As a matter of fact, the relations of the Governor-General to his Council had been entirely unaffected by recent legislation, the law on the subject being in Sir John Lawrence's time precisely what it was in the days of Lord Cornwallis. In reality, the relations between the Governor-General and his Council depend on the man more than on the system. In Lord Dalhousie's time the Council deferred to the Governor-General, in Sir John Lawrence's time the Governor-General deferred to the Council. As to the nature of the machine, it might properly have been termed cumbrous in the days of the former, when all business was disposed of by the collective body, but the appellation is singularly inappropriate at the present time, when each member superintends a separate department, and nine-tenths of the business transacted never goes before the Council at all.

THE CUMBERLAND DIALECT.*

THE home love of people born among mountains or by a wild sea-shore is something quite special, and seems to infect even settlers who are not autochthonous. When a man has lived for a few years among the lakes and mountains of the North country or by the rugged Cornish coast, he has generally struck his roots deep into the soil; and he not only loves the place like a native, but is as much interested in the people as if he had known their homely ways and been used to their racy Doric from his earliest years. Perhaps his interest has even a more lively character, novelty lending its spur; and if his tastes lean towards literature and he has nothing else to do, he frequently amuses himself by getting up the whole subject of dialect, traditions, and local customs, till he makes himself as accurate as, and perhaps a great deal more profound than, those who have been born into familiarity and consequent uncritical acceptance. The railroad and the constant influx of visitors it brings are, however, fast destroying all the specialities of by-places. The Dolly Pentreaths and the Jonathan Ottleys—though the two were entirely dissimilar, and have only the common fact of local celebrity to connect them—are giving place, the one to a race of well-mannered, intelligible, be-credlined and be-chignened young Cornish women, who know the latest turns of fashion and the exact worth of money, and whose old creed of generous hospitality is lost in the new one of making a good harvest while the summer lasts and spoiling the Egyptian strangers with a will; while the self-taught men of the stamp of Jonathan Otley are becoming daily more rare as learning is more accessible by all, as travelling is an everyday matter even among the dale-dwellers, and as the education of a boy in accordance with present notions is regarded by parents as a profitable investment, which in time will make a better return than looking to the old ways.

But with much local picturesqueness, and some local virtues, we are bound to add that many local vices are also disappearing. In Cumberland and Westmoreland twenty or thirty years ago there was no more shame in a man's drunkenness, or in an unmarried woman's bearing a child, than if the one were a nobleman and the other a wife. On market nights the most respectable "staplers" of the district might be seen strolling about the towns, or going home dead-drunk in a cart, with out-cripples on offence. It was thought nothing of; it was a manly weakness, or rather strength of appetite, which had to be allowed for, like the "stap o' blue" in the randy songs of clapping and saving times. But, though drunkenness is still too common "out by yonder," it is decreasing in extent, and a scottish man is not as well looked on as a sober one. "Sittin' up," too, which is, in fact, going to bed with their clothes on, is not now the usual mode of courtship between respectable young people as it was a generation ago; and though we have no statistics before us, we should expect to find the number of illegitimate births lessened of late years, knowing as we do the improvement in public feeling, and the greater delicacy of manners in this respect. "Marry-meets" and "brideweives" have gone, with their coarse fun and questionable manners; they are "bails" now, and wedding-parties, as at other places; in fact, the whole life of the country is becoming tamer if one will, less coloured, less individual, but at the same time with more refinement if with more greed, more ambition of becoming like the rest of the kingdom if with less simple honesty and less sturdy independence. Oatmeal porridge and barley-meal porridge—"kittly slip-douns"—oat-cake, or "havre bread," coarse "Skiddaw-grey coats," "bedgowns," and many other old distinctions of food and clothing have gone with the rest; and the dale-folk now, at least the younger portion of them, dress as bravely in London "farlies" as their betters, and feed the pigs and milk the cows in hats and gowns that are the exact counterparts of those worn by their sisters in London and Liverpool. Even so late as thirty years ago some strange specimens of country "priests" were to be found in the remoter districts—men who, if not quite so fragrant as "t' Uldale priest," who used to go to Oadiback on Saturday nights "stripped to buff," and do his round of fighting like a man, or as old Lancaster of Thornthwaite, who was rarely seen sober, and after whose accidental death, when drunk, it was said that a footless glass and half-emptied bottle of gin were found stowed away beneath the desk of his pulpit, were yet eminently unfitted for their office. But the late Bishop (Percy) set himself to change all that, and required some sort of guarantee for at least decency in the spiritual pastors of the Dales. Odd stories are yet afloat here and there; but Cumberland and Westmoreland, once almost bywords for clerical indecency of habit, are now as correct and well served as any other English rural counties.

Mr. Richardson, of St. John's, Keswick, has just put out a pleasant little book of "Cumberland Talk," which has the advantage of being phonetically as true to the dialect and pronunciation, without being quite so unsightly, as some others. He, however, and Mr. Gibson, whose admirable book on the Folk Speech of Cumberland we reviewed some time back, both use accounts which give an un-English and difficult look to their pages; perhaps they are necessary, though the famous Borrowdale Letter has none of them, and other writers of the Cumberland dialect have done without them. But then the Borrowdale Letter is more crabbed in its spelling than is Cumberland Talk. Thus the former spells again "agyn," the latter "agyn"; home is "hyam" with the one, "hæmm" with the other, the Borrowdale Letter says "tyu" for too, Mr. Richardson "tau"; and these examples may stand as specimens of the difference in the orthography of the new and old styles; the old using y where the new employs an accent.

There are one or two good stories in Mr. Richardson's little book, though none perhaps so racy as those in Mr. Gibson's. "T' barrin' out" in the St. John's school during "Priest Wilson's" time is, we believe, a local epic quite authentic; the story of "Jemmy Stubbs' Grunstone" we have also heard, but we had forgotten who Jemmy Stubbs was, or, if he was at all; and his whereabouts "at t' boddom o' Skiddaw," if it was there, had also passed from our memory. The "Dalehead Park Boggle" is a well-known tradition; so is the "Armboth Boggle"; and the man would have been exceptionally bold twenty years ago who had braved the unknown terrors of either the one or the other. Perhaps by this time the superstition has disappeared. It is curious to note what kind of boggle this was; no white lady beautiful and mournful, no tricky elf mischievous and frolicsome, no gruesome ghost, no absolute shape at all, but a Germanized Rührhül kind of glamour more than a positive thing, and eminently rustic. "A girt lime an' mowd heap, 'at reah't clean across t' rwoad," that "went up heigher nor t' wo' o' teals side o' t' rwoad, an' slow't doon tull about hofs a yard lwe o't' udder," does not seem a very formidable kind of apparition; though it does pass away when, as the bold daleman says, he "went on tul't, an' thowt I wad set me feht on t' to see what it wa'." Another time, however, the boggle was more terrible, when it showed itself as a fire on the top of the Park, which "lowe't up sec a heat, an' sparks fell i' shoors o' aw sides on't"; but in neither case did it do more harm than "freeten" the narrator, and convince him of its existence.

A few well-known names come in among the narratives. "John Peel in his cwoat seesh gray," who lived over "Irby way," was one of those men of local celebrity who, had they lived in earlier times, would have become to a certain sense mythic after death. So would the champion wrestlers who used to go to Carlisle and throw all comers, the quarrymen on Homister Orag whose feats of strength sound almost superhuman to the softer Southern, the statesmen who lived as small Homeric kings in their dales; all of whom give a distinctive character to Cumberland and Westmoreland life of which Mr. Richardson might have availed himself more largely than he has done. We have good graphic bits, however. "Willie Cooband an' his Lawsuit" carries us back to the time when the road from Patterdale to Penrith by Ullswater was a rude track, exceedingly dangerous under Styebarrow. "Theer was nobbut just t' brenth of a car hack't oot o' t' cragg feace; an' if owt went ower t' edge it wad gang reet doon into Ullswater, an' waddent be worth laten oot agein," says Willie's biographer. "Auld Fwok an' Auld Times" dwells on that same theme of the bygone, and recalls what the old Lincolnshire farmer complained of, when he confessed that he was fairlie bet with all the whuzzen and the buzzen that was going on in the world, and the earth going round the sun on the top of it. We will give a sample of the old fellow's style:—

* Cumberland Talk, being Short Talks and Legends of the Dialect, by John Richardson, of St. John's, Keswick; John Gibson, of Carlisle; and G. Coward.

I dunnet know what this warld's gaan to git tel' efter a bit, I's seurr, for they gitten mowin' machines, an' reapin' machines, an' threshin' machines, an' sheep-dippin' things, an' I dunnet know what beside. Enny body 'at leaves a few years langer 'll see 'at theer 'ill nowder be mowers, nor shearers, nor soavers, nor owt else 'at's good for owt. Thur machine things come oot yan efter anudder 'at yan gits amakilly teann to them be degrees, or else I've oft thowt 'at if yan o' them auld fellows 'at deat about three scowre year sen could come back noo he wad gang clean crazy.

I wonder what Tim Crostet o' Wantnet wad think if he was to pop up some day, an' could see enny bit anafien thing drivin' away an' whuselen an' mowin' sebben or eight yacker in a day. Tim was yan o' t' best mowers 'at lver was 't this country. He use to mow wi' a sye 'at heid two yords o' edge, an' he could fell fower square yords lvery stroke. He use to tak fower yords o' breed an' a yerd forret lvery bat. Bit, what, theer neah sek fellows as Tim noo-a-days! He was afeen sixteen steann weight, aw beann an' sinny, an' as lish a buck. He could ha' hitch't ower a live bar't yat wi' t' ligger yan hand on t' top on 't, an' theer nut sa memny sixteen steann chaps 'at could deu that.

But would he have said "know"? Would it not have been "knew" or "ken"? And is not "divn't ken" more full-flavoured than even "dunnet know"? We do not always quite agree with Mr. Richardson's formulæ. In the "Barrin' out" he says, "we sidit t' scheull up as weel as we could"; we think the particle is wrongly placed for genuine Cumberland, and should say, "sidit oop t' scheull." But he has excellently true expressions. "An' Cumberland talk 'at's as rough as git oot" is a phrase which every one who knows the dialect will recognize. "His shoan war wholl't beath nibe an' heels" is also good; and there are many words, as "mainly-what"—"They use to mainly-what tak a nag up to trail them to t' edge"; "She was t' girtest as lver owt was," to express pleasure and pride; "It was a gay rough untidy swoart iv a hoose, when yan gat a fair leuk at it" for a rough rambling place—which are characteristically true and natural. As far as it goes, Cumberland Talk is good and pleasant; but Mr. Richardson had richer material than he has made use of. Perhaps he will gather up some of the unchronicled traditions still floating about the dales and fell sides, and give us a few more vivid pictures of a once special race, and of their manners, now rapidly passing into undistinguishable conformity with the rest of the world.

FRENCH LITERATURE

M. FRANK'S new volume* is an interesting contribution to the history of philosophy, both ethical and metaphysical. It forms a kind of gallery of portraits where the most antagonistic schools are represented, and where, from the middle ages to our own time, typical men find an appropriate place. Pope Sylvester II. opens the list, M. Renouvier closes it. Some of the characters sketched by M. Frank are already so well known that we need not say anything further about them; others are familiar only to persons who make philosophy their peculiar study, and perhaps the general reader who takes up the volume will find himself introduced for the first time to Levi ben Gerson and Pietro Pomponazzi. The former of these thinkers flourished during the fourteenth century, and is considered the greatest philosopher that Judaism can boast of next to Moses Maimonides. Spinoza evidently borrowed largely from his writings, Kepler speaks of him in terms of high commendation, and Pope Clement VI. caused one of his treatises to be translated into Latin. The chief aim of philosophy, according to Levi ben Gerson, as well as to most of his contemporaries, both Jews and Christians, was to reconcile faith with reason, and to show that the teaching of the Scriptures is in perfect harmony with that of Aristotle. So far the Jewish Rabbi differed from Pomponazzi, whose aim, as might be expected from a true Renaissance philosopher, was to establish the claims of reason on a ground of their own. In other respects—as, for instance, when discussing the origin of our ideas, the doctrines of Providence, free-will, prophecy, and miracles—Pomponazzi and Ben Gerson agree almost completely. They represent the transition from scholasticism to independent thought, and occupy in the history of philosophy a place which M. Frank has perhaps been the first to define satisfactorily.

Souvenirs et Portraits. Par Ad. Franck, de l'Institut. Paris: Didier.

The thirteenth and last volume of M. Sainte-Beuve's Nouveaux Lundis† is another series of portraits which cannot be suffered to pass unnoticed, although some of the chapters included in it are printed here for the third time. It would be a sad thought that the world has now seen the last of the productions of the omnis's versatile brain, were it not for our belief that many of his manuscript notes at present withheld from the public for obvious reasons will one day appear in print. In the mean-while we commend to notice the opening chapter of this volume, as a brief but most interesting piece of autobiography. We know not of course what may be the character of the forthcoming memoir announced from the pen of M. Levallois, but we imagine that several particulars connected with M. Sainte-Beuve's life might easily be extracted from the pages of the psychological novel Volupté, which he published about forty years ago. The thirteenth instalment of the Nouveaux Lundis contains essays on M. Ampère, Saint-Evremond, and Malherbe, besides the detailed account of General Jomini which has already been published separately, and a few minor fragments.

Under the title Souvenirs et Portraits‡ the editors of Lamartine's works have collected a number of autobiographical pieces which possess great interest, but which were entirely lost or délavés, as our neighbours would say, in the Cours de Littérature which he issued many years since. We remarked some time ago on the scattered materials from which a good memoir of the author of Jocelyn might easily be compiled, and we mentioned particularly the very collection which has now, we are glad to observe, been turned to excellent use. The Cours de Littérature itself, we always thought, was a failure. It looked too much like the speculation of a man driven to his last resources, and anxious to make money as speedily as he could; scissors and paste did more than half the work; and the only valuable part consisted of the souvenirs we are now noticing. The first volume (the whole work is to be completed in three duodecimos) gives us portraits of the public characters with whom Lamartine was acquainted in his youth; Chateaubriand, for instance, the De Maîtres, the society which used to assemble in Madame Récamier's drawing-room at the Abbaye-aux-bois, Talma, &c. In speaking of his intercourse with M. de Genoude, he brings in the striking, though rather repulsive, figure of Lamennais, and gives us many curious details respecting that writer, whose revolutionary tendencies had begun to frighten the Church even at a time when he was still the champion of Ultramontanism.

The numerous originals painted by M. de Lamartine, M. Franck, and M. Sainte-Beuve are well known, and even in the case of those who do not belong to the present generation, or to the one immediately preceding it, we still have the means of gathering from their writings some notion of what they must have been. The case is totally different with the personages crowded together in another gallery to which we would now draw the attention of our readers; we mean La Bruyère's inimitable chef-d'œuvre—Les Caractères et les Mœurs de ce Siècle.§ The sumptuous edition of that work just published by M. Lemerre affords us an opportunity of saying a few words about one of the most perfect and most amusing of the French classics. Here, too, we have to deal with a series of portraits; but who will venture to identify the Ménalques, the Théobaldes, the Onuphres, the Orontes, immortalized by La Bruyère? Solutions have often been suggested, and keys invented, all to no purpose. Yet it matters very little, we think, whether Ménalque was really the Marquis de Brancas, and Cliton "le gros Givry"; the essential quality of delineations like these is that they should supply correct representations of human nature, and not grotesque and impossible caricatures. One of the great merits of the French Theophrastus is that he never-yields to the temptation of exaggerating his sketches, and of frapper fort under the pretext of frapper juste. The best way of illustrating this remark is to take Balzac's description of the miser, as exemplified in his Père Goriot, or Jules Janin's character of the Bibliomaniac, and to compare either of these pieces with any of La Bruyère's portraits. The difference will be immediately perceptible. M. Charles Asselineau's notes, which terminate the second volume, show that he has studied profitably not only the old commentators, but also the recent ones, such as M. Edouard Fournier and M. Gustave Servois; and his analytical table is very useful. The only poor feature in this excellently edited work is the etching which professes to give us the likeness of La Bruyère; it seems to us a slovenly performance.

M. Lemerre's collection of French standard works is prepared on a rather extensive scale; it includes not only the authors generally acknowledged as classics, but also some of the most distinguished representatives of the Renaissance school. Thus we are informed that Agrippa d'Aubigné's vigorous and interesting productions are to appear in this series, and likewise the various members of the "Pléiade" who, under Ronsard's guidance, endeavoured three hundred years ago to reform the French language by casting it afresh in the mould of Greek and Latin antiquity. Two specimens of this new "bibliothèque de nos aïeux" are now before us. Let us first say a few words about Olivier * Nouveaux Lundis. Par C. A. Sainte-Beuve. Vol. 13. Paris: Lefevre.

† Souvenirs et Portraits. Par M. de Lamartine. Vol. 1. Paris and London: Hachette & Co.

‡ Les Caractères et les Mœurs de ce Siècle. Par La Bruyère; édition nouvelle revue et corrigée par son éditeur M. Lemerre. Paris: Lemerre.

de Magny and his Gaistes.* As the new editor remarks in his preface, Olivier did not officially form part of the "Fleud," but he was intimately connected with most of its members, and the true poetical genius which he displayed entitled him to a place amongst them far above that held by certain writers whose works were universally known and often extravagantly admired. The "gaistes" bear marks of that affectation, that signoriserie, which is so peculiarly characteristic of Ronsard and his followers; but they are worth reading, both from a philological and from a biographical point of view. The title they bear has misled many critics, and procured for them a reputation of licentiousness which they do not altogether deserve. Most of the pieces included in the collection may be regarded as historical documents illustrating the literary annals of the sixteenth century.

Jacques Tahureau, gentilhomme du Mans, is another remarkable writer belonging to the same epoch. His dialogues, carefully edited by M. F. Conscience†, are a satire directed against the vices of a nation which had allowed itself to be corrupted by the influence of Catherine de Medicis. The variety of subjects discussed in these colloquies reminds us at first of Montaigne's essays; but the author, instead of confining himself to general remarks, draws striking portraits of the persons by whom he is surrounded, and thus challenges a comparison rather with the Satire Ménippée and the Dictionnaire des Précieuses. The dialogues—two in number—are followed by a glossary.

Mlle. Clarisse Bader goes on with her history of the fair sex. After having studied her subject on the banks of the Ganges, and devoted a second volume to a survey of what the Old Testament tells us about the condition of women, she now takes us to ancient Greece‡, and endeavours to collect from the writings of Homer, the dramatists, the historians, and the monuments which crowd our museums, a few trustworthy data as to the domestic life of the old Hellenes. From a hint thrown out in one of the foot-notes we gather that she has had the benefit of M. Egger's advice and assistance in the composition of her book; she has certainly made the best use of this valuable help, and her reading seems to us as judicious as it is extensive.

The Chanson de Roland §, which has so long been erroneously ascribed to a trouvère of the name of Thurold of Théroalde, has already been edited several times, but never with the care, the learning, and the completeness displayed by M. Léon Gautier in the magnificent publication now before us. M. Francisque Michel was the first to draw general attention to the old poem which forms, so to say, the centre of all the romances composed on the subject of Charlemagne and his Court. M. Génin came next, and his edition, printed at the expense of the French Government, deserves mention here. Unfortunately, he too often committed himself to statements which were either historically or philosophically wrong, and he allowed his imagination to lead him astray. M. Sainte-Beuve said somewhere of him:—"C'est quand il est en pleines broussailles philologiques qu'il se met le plus à scintiller." This is perfectly true, and for a writer who professes to deal with subjects of mere erudition we know of no severer condemnation. It would be poor praise indeed to say that M. Gautier's Chanson de Roland is better than M. Génin's; unless some fortunate antiquary should one day happen to discover the missing manuscript of the poem which belonged in former days to the library of Peterborough Cathedral, we do not know what more can be done on behalf of the old chanson-de-geste. M. Gautier's edition comprises two large octavo volumes and a quarto supplement. In the first volume we have two hundred pages of prolegomena, giving a full account of all the circumstances connected with the origin, composition, authorship, and historical importance of the poem. We then have the text itself, accompanied by a translation in modern French, and illustrated by thirteen etchings. The second volume contains notes, various readings, a glossary, and a table. In the supplement we find a revised edition of the original, with corrections and emendations. It is singular that the best manuscript of the Chanson de Roland should be preserved in the Bodleian Library, and the fact that M. Gautier has now published a really critical edition of it ought to recommend his volumes more particularly to English readers.

The French generals who took part in the late war are naturally anxious to vindicate their reputation as military men against the criticisms to which it has been exposed, and to explain how plans of defence, laboriously discussed and deliberately adopted, failed so completely when they came to be applied. We have had already the narratives of General Chanzy and Faidherbe; now it is the turn of General d'Aurelle de Paladines. It will be remembered perhaps that M. de Freycinet, the delegate of the Minister of War, published some time ago a volume in which he endeavoured to apologise for the administrative acts of the Tours Committee. He showed what were the available resources of the country at the time when the Committee attempted to organise a system of national defence, and in explaining why, notwithstanding some partial successes, the final result was so deplorable, he tried to lay the fault upon the want of discipline of the soldiers and the incapacity of the generals. As for the former of these accusations, we have already seen that the Republican agitators did all they could during the reign of Napoleon III. to excite a spirit of insubordination among the troops; as for the latter, General d'Aurelle de Paladines has, we think, successfully refuted it, and he has moreover criticised with deserved severity the conduct of the Tours delegation. It seems to us clear that the affair of Beaune-la-Rolande, and the rout at Orléans on the 4th of December, are ascribable to the Minister of War; the disastrous expedition of General Bourbaki in the Eastern departments was also an idea of M. de Freycinet. General d'Aurelle de Paladines has completed his interesting volume by the addition of numerous documents and excellent maps.

M. Edgar Bourlouton* has been a prisoner of war in Germany. Instead of idling his time, like some of his fellow-sufferers, and brooding over disasters which he could not have prevented, he very wisely set to work to study as accurately as he could the nation whose energy had struck so severe a blow at the military reputation of France, and, "with an impartiality against which his patriotism vainly protested" (we quote M. Bourlouton's own words), he determined to find out why the Germans had been able to arrive at "freedom without revolution, and at equality without the intervention of the guillotine," whilst obtaining extraordinary political influence abroad. The volume before us is, on a small scale, a very complete and satisfactory account of the moral, religious, intellectual, political, and commercial state of Germany. M. Bourlouton judiciously recommends his fellow-countrymen to advance in the direction which their neighbours on the other side of the Rhine are following, if they would arrive at the same degree of prosperity. The campaign of 1870 is only a retaliation for the wrongs of 1806; but the French forget this, and, whilst declaiming against the cruelties of the Prussian soldiers, they are too apt to slur over the humiliation of Jena.

Scientific publications have not been so numerous this month as usual; but still we have a few items to notice. M. Louis Figuier, abandoning hazardous speculations about the state of man after death, has wisely returned to the task which he discharged so well—namely, that of a popular teacher and expounder of scientific doctrines. The fifteenth volume of the Année scientifique et industrielle † embraces the facts and discoveries which came to light during the first six months of 1870, and the last half of the following year. It would be a mistake to suppose that the terrible events of the late war arrested all scientific progress; the necessity of preparing the best means of offensive and defensive warfare, of multiplying to the greatest possible extent the means of giving surgical assistance to the wounded, and of providing for the comforts of large armies, has, on the contrary, told very conspicuously upon the development of applied science, and almost every section of M. Figuier's book treats of discoveries or improvements made with the view of minimizing the unfavourable chances of a military expedition. A distinct chapter is reserved as usual for the comptes-rendus both of the Academy and of other learned associations, and brief biographical sketches of savants lately deceased terminate the volume.

M. Dieulafoy, author of a recent instalment of the Bibliothèque des Merveilles ‡, has written a useful and accurate little volume on the various questions connected with precious stones. He begins by giving us a physical account of these substances; he tells us under what geological conditions they are found, and how they are affected by heat, light, and electricity. The ancients and the philosophers of the middle ages entertained the most absurd views about the nature and properties of precious stones. Some of these are noticed by M. Dieulafoy, after which, passing on to the domains of reality, he examines successively all the gems which nature produces, their mode of crystallization, their elements, &c. The artificial manufacture of diamonds and other stones is next considered, together with the means of distinguishing the true from the false; a section is reserved for a brief notice of the manner in which precious stones are cut, mounted, and engraved; and the whole concludes with a tabular summary of the facts enumerated by the author. A hundred and thirty vignettes illustrate the letterpress, not one of them, M. Dieulafoy assures us, being une gravure de fantaisie. On such a subject rigorous truthfulness is absolutely indispensable.

To the same class of books belongs M. Millet's Merveilles des fleuves et des ruisseaux §. It includes under its comprehensive title an account not only of hydrographical marvels, but of fishes, fresh-water beetles, and other insects, birds which build their nests on the banks of streams, &c.

* Les Gaistes d'Olivier de Magny; texte original avec notes. Par E. Courbet. Paris: Lemerre.

† Les Dialogues de Jacques Tahureau, gentilhomme du Mans; avec notes et index. Par F. Conscience. Paris: Lemerre.

‡ Le Femme grecque; étude de la vie antique. Par Mlle. Clarisse Bader. Paris: Didier.

§ La Chanson de Roland; texte critique, avec introduction, notes, etc. Par M. Léon Gautier. Tours: Mame.

¶ La Première Armée de la Loire. Par le général d'Aurelle de Paladines. Paris: Fleud.

* L'Allemagne contemporaine. Par Edgar Bourlouton. Paris: Germer Baillière.

† L'Année scientifique et industrielle. Par Louis Figuier. 15<sup>e</sup> année. Paris and London: Hachette & Co.

‡ Diamants et Pierres précieuses (Bibliothèque des Merveilles). Par Louis Dieulafoy. Paris and London: Hachette & Co.

§ Les Merveilles des fleuves et des ruisseaux. Par C. Millet. Paris and London: Hachette & Co.

URGENT APPEAR 2 11 55 AM 1954

THE

SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 854, Vol. 33.

March 9, 1872.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

PRINCE BISMARCK AND THE SCHOOL QUESTION.

PRINCE BISMARCK is fighting his great fight against the enemies of the German Empire with all his wonted energy and resolution. But he makes no attempt to conceal from himself or the world that he has a very difficult task before him. It might be thought that the Prince could have little difficulty with the King of PRUSSIA or with a Prussian Parliament in defending against all adversaries the great prize which it has cost Prussia so much to win, and that the KING especially would be the last man to take any course that could be prejudicial to the German EMPIRE. And yet the Bill for placing the inspection of schools in the hands of State officials, and taking it out of the hands of the clergy, only passed through the Lower House of the Prussian Parliament by a majority of twenty-six; its passage through the Upper House is exceedingly doubtful; the KING is at best very lukewarm in its favour, and the QUEEN is dead against it. The cause of all this opposition is very simple. The Ultramontane clergy are using their influence in the schools to thwart and, if possible, to break up the German Empire. Prince BISMARCK wishes to baffle their action by placing Catholic schools under State inspection. But Prussia is a land of religious equality. What is done to one sect must be done to all. Consequently, if the clergy of Catholic schools are deprived of the control of those schools, the Protestant clergy must equally be deprived of the control over their schools. There may possibly be some disaffection to Prussia among a fraction of the Hanoverian Protestant clergy, but the Protestant clergy of Prussia generally have no more wish to break up the German Empire than they have to bring the POPE to Berlin. And yet, because their theological enemies are using the control of the clergy over schools for purposes which the Protestant clergy regard with aversion, the Protestant clergy are to be ousted from the control of their schools. This would be, in their view, to give a very unfair and very unwise advantage to non-religious teaching in Germany. Exactly the same thing, it may be remembered, has for many years been going on in Ireland, where extreme Catholics and extreme Protestants have been equally hostile to the national system. The Pietist party in Prussia, as it is called, thus regards the measure proposed by Prince BISMARCK as hostile to it, and thinks that this hostility is entirely undeserved on its part. This party is very strong in the Prussian Upper House, the QUEEN is devoted to it, and the KING has always maintained very cordial relations with it. A party so powerful and so highly favoured does not like to see itself sacrificed on account of the faults of other people, and therefore it objects to Prince BISMARCK's Bill. There seems to be no doubt that it is sufficiently strong in the Upper House to throw out the Bill if it acts in conjunction with the Catholics, but it may give way at the last moment rather than run the great risk of depriving the KING of the services of Prince BISMARCK, and of giving a triumph to the enemies of Germany.

It is certain that Prince BISMARCK would not confront such an opposition, risk his whole political position, and thwart the wishes of the Court, unless he was thoroughly convinced that the point for which he is contending is of overwhelming importance. Why is it so important he avows without the slightest disguise. In the speech he has made this week in the Upper House, he has drawn attention to the fact that in old days there used to be no religious difficulties in Prussia. There was no antagonism with its position, and the State and the clergy were in harmony with each other. Why has this happy state of things been lost? The answer may be given in two words. Prussia has humiliated the Pope, and thus alienated the Catholics of the Continent, and thus alienated the seeking to avenge themselves by creating divisions in her midst. The miserable war of 1870 was in a great measure undertaken by France because the EMPEROR was pressed to risk everything against his better judgment by a clique who saw in the anticipated defeat of Prussia an Ultramontane victory. The victories of Prussia cost the POPE his temporal power, and gave the various schools of politicians opposed to the Papacy all the ascendancy of success. The sword of the flesh is for the moment lost to the POPE, and it is Prussia that has wrenched it out of his hands. If the POPE and his friends look round and see how they may regain what they have lost, they find that it is the German Empire that in every direction stands in their way. France might like to help them, but the heavy heel of the German is on the neck of France. Italy may be menaced and plotted against, but Italy goes on its way rejoicing, for the German Empire is its ally. Austria has as much as she can possibly do to hold her own, and in the hour of need she must lean on the German Empire for support. Theoretically there is of course no reason why the POPE should want the sword of temporal sovereignty to back his claims. Prince BISMARCK declares that with the merely spiritual claims of the POPE he has nothing to do. Catholics may, for all he cares, be good Catholics after such fashion as may please them. But all this is only theoretical. In real life it makes an immense difference what is the relation of the State to the Church, and if the State is the obedient instrument of the Church the spiritual power of the Church is immensely increased. To shut out all other forms of belief is the aim of every zealous ecclesiastical body, and this can only be done by the State placing its forces at the disposal of the Church. So long as great States like France and Austria were in a large measure controlled by the Church, it was not intolerable that the Church should be content with a bare position of equality in Prussia. But now that France and Austria are, for the moment at least, overshadowed by the German Empire, the notion of the State being used by the Church as its minister seems likely to die out of the minds of men. To avert this very probable phase of opinion it is in the eyes of Ultramontanes indispensable that, before the battle is wholly lost, the German Empire should be broken up; and they are therefore doing their utmost to bring about this chief aim of their endeavours, while Prince BISMARCK is doing his utmost to disappoint them.

The Ultramontane party have several modes of conducting their attack. They ally themselves with the Separatist party in North Germany. They strive to increase the disaffection of the South German Catholics. They manipulate the elections in the Rhenish provinces. They have even gone so far, Prince BISMARCK declares, as to agitate in favour of France. This certainly seems a strong measure if it is German priests who are addressing Germans, as Prince BISMARCK's words in the telegraphic summary would seem to imply. But it is not wholly unintelligible that the Ultramontanes should remind their more devoted adherents that France is, from an ecclesiastical point of view, their friend, and ought not to be pressed too hardly. France is to some extent suffering now for the misadventures of the Republican leaders of the 4th of September rather than for the faults of the EMPEROR, and it may sound a plausible theory to willing listeners that the part of the punishment of France which may be ascribed to the errors of the enemies of the Church should be omitted in dealing with a Power which is ready to be the friend and ally of the Church as soon as it can. But the great field of Ultramontane activity is Prussian Poland. They see there a fine opportunity of striking a blow deep into the side of the German Empire. They have been preparing the ground there with great care for many years. The late

Prussian Minister of Public Instruction was a great ally of theirs, and in order to promote the views of the Pietist party, to which he belonged, allowed very free action to the clergy generally, including the Catholic clergy of Poland. In order to keep their flocks free from the taint of Germanism, the Polish clergy have tried to confine the knowledge of the schoolchildren in Poland to Polish only, and whole villages which used to speak German have ceased to speak it. The idea of a Polish nationality, distinct in religion and language from Germany, is sedulously kept alive, and preparations are being quietly made for a great political stroke. Russia is trying to convince the Poles that it is entirely impossible they should ever be again an independent nation. They have only the choice between being Russianized and being Germanized, and they are urged to notice how much better it is for them to be Russians than Germans. The heads of the great Polish families in exile are said to be deaf to this appeal, and to maintain undiminished their deep distrust of Russia; but the appeal has not been without effect in humbler quarters. Russia is the only Power that, so far as can be seen at present, would have the slightest chance of opposing successfully the German Empire in arms, and Russia would start with a great advantage if Russian Poland was not only heartily with it, but would have a good chance of drawing Prussian Poland to follow in its steps. On the other hand, if the Papal party rendered, or contributed to render, this signal service to Russia, it might reasonably hope to make excellent terms for the Polish members of its religion. Russia and Ultramontaniam may be brought to work together, because each party has something to give which the other wants. This is no trifling or imaginary political danger, and it is not therefore surprising that Prince Bismarck should use his utmost influence, and boldly warn his countrymen in time, so that this danger may be warded off before it assumes more serious proportions than it presents as yet.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS AND THE PUBLIC BUSINESS.

THE Duke of Richmond lately renewed the periodical complaint of the unequal distribution of business between the two Houses of Parliament. The House of Lords has sometimes scarcely anything to do before Easter, and in the latter part of the Session its work is inconveniently crowded. Lord GRANVILLE could not dispute the Duke of Richmond's statements, but, as he justly remarked, a complaint which has been repeated during fifty years indicates an intrinsic difficulty in the removal of the alleged grievance. Lord SALISBURY suggested a novel and questionable plan of introducing Bills simultaneously in both Houses, but it is highly improbable that so anomalous a contrivance should be adopted. One obvious inconvenience would arise from the inevitable reference which would be made in either House to the debates which might be concurrently proceeding in the other, and in many instances the entire discussion would be terminated and rendered useless by a division in another Assembly. It is not desirable that measures which are doomed to defeat in the House of Commons should be passed by the House of Lords, and in many instances promoters, though they may have no hope of carrying their Bills through the House of Lords, are reasonably anxious to obtain and place on record the approval of the House of Commons. There are already too many facilities for collision between the two Houses, and the number would be greatly increased by the practice which Lord SALISBURY proposes. Lord GREY recommended a more modest innovation in the form of a Standing Order, by which the House of Commons should reserve to the ensuing Session the transmission to the House of Lords of a Bill which the peers would otherwise not be able fully to discuss. In the next Session, under Lord GERRARD's plan, a single vote taken without debate would suffice to send the Bill at once up to the House of Lords. It is scarcely worth while to discuss a project, however ingenious or equitable, which will never be approved by the House of Commons. The Lower House is not disposed to increase the power of the House of Lords by giving it a larger share in legislation. If the proposed Standing Order had been in force during the last three years, neither the Irish Church Bill nor the Irish Land Bill would have become law in the Sessions in which those measures were respectively introduced. The opponents of the Government in the House of Lords would have announced that there had not been sufficient opportunity of discussion, and they would have contended that the Standing Order dispensed with any necessity for pressure. In such cases the business would have been occupied with a troublesome agitation, and the great majority of the House of Commons would have been baffled and irritated. The complaint that the House of Lords has not sufficient time for discussion is not unfrequently exaggerated. The previous debates in the House of Commons have for the most part reduced the controversy to its essential issues; and the peers have the laudable habit of confining their debates within moderate limits. The rejection of the Ballot Bill was not attributable to any want of time for examining or amending its detailed provisions. The measure might perhaps be essentially faulty; but it was not the proper business of the House of Lords, even if a majority had been favourable to the principle of the Bill, to elaborate the machinery of elections. The suspension of the Army Purchase Bill was founded on the alleged incompleteness of the measure, and not on the late period at which it was introduced into the House of Lords.

Lord SALISBURY remarked that the HOME SECRETARY was unwilling to allow the Bills relating to his department to be introduced where he could himself have no opportunity of explaining them; but even if the Home Office were, as in the days of Lord LANSDOWNE or Lord MELBOURNE, administered by a peer, it would still be necessary to introduce contentious matters in the House of Commons. Since the first Reform Bill no Government has commanded a majority in the House of Lords, except during periods which collectively amount to less than a fourth of the interval. As all important legislation has gradually fallen into the hands of the Executive Government, it is unreasonable to expect that Liberal Ministers should produce measures to be rejected or remodelled by an adverse Assembly. Lord HALIFAX mentioned the case of a Scotch Education Bill which, after being largely altered by the House of Lords, was restored to its original shape by the Commons, and ultimately defeated when it was returned to the House of Lords. If similar experiments were repeated, they would often be followed by the same results; and it is not convenient that the Minister in charge of a Bill should be compelled to inform the House of Commons that he disapproves of some of its material provisions. It is indeed agreed on all hands that party measures should be first introduced in the House of Commons; but it becomes more and more difficult to distinguish between different kinds of legislation. It would have been impossible to foresee that the Contagious Diseases Act, providing merely sanitary regulations, would furnish a pretext for a popular and unscrupulous agitation. If the measure had originated in the House of Lords, the male and female agitators who have frightened the Government into submission would not have failed to denounce the peers as the enemies of freedom. It was said in the course of the discussion that the duty of the Upper House is rather to revise than to initiate legislation. There is no objection to a theory which, although it may conflict with constitutional doctrine, corresponds to practice and to the actual relation between the two Houses. The more powerful body necessarily takes the initiative, and the less ambitious function of revision devolves on the weaker branch of the Legislature. If the House of Lords wishes for a larger share in the conduct of business, it must accustom itself to support Lord GRANVILLE or any other Minister who may succeed him. A friendly majority would often strengthen the hands of the Government by a careful supervision of the details of a measure; but in any case it would be necessary to avoid any action which could excite the jealousy of the House of Commons, and the large class of Bills which involve questions of money would not be within the competence of the House of Lords.

The most important of the remaining legislative functions of the House of Lords are those which relate to the amendment of the law. The subject is withdrawn from the region of party by the inability of laymen to interfere in the special province of lawyers. The House of Commons has little capacity or inclination for dealing with schemes of law reform; and those of its members who understand the subject best are for the most part overwhelmed with professional engagements. The law lords have learning, experience, and leisure, and they are for the most part entirely disinterested. The differences of opinion which arise among them seldom coincide with party distinctions; nor are the professed supporters of the Government always the most easily satisfied with the proposals of its legal members. The Bills which the Home Office has undertaken to introduce for the constitution of a High Court of Judicature and a Court of Appeal will probably be founded on the Report of a Committee of which Lord CARRINGTON was a leading member; and the amendments which may be expected from Lord WILSON will not be hampered by any excessive partiality to a Liberal Government. Although it is by a kind of accident that the House of Lords has become charged with the amendment of the law, the lay members will be well advised in assisting to the utmost of their power the efforts of their professional colleagues. Practical services rendered to the community will outweigh theoretical arguments against hereditary legislation. Many of the powers and qualifications of all Assemblies, Governments, and other constituted authorities have been accidentally acquired. The House of Lords owes its existence to the fact that its original members were, independently of any legal or corporate privileges, the most powerful persons in the country. As other classes have gradually become important, the House of Lords has in some degree changed its character; but it still includes a large proportion of the leaders of social life, and as long as other institutions remained unchanged, its members would lose scarcely any of the power which they possess if they ceased to form a branch of the Legislature. It is perfectly natural that the most energetic of the peers should chafe at the restraints which are imposed on their conscious ability to serve the country; but when their chances of office and their numerous opportunities of exercising influence are taken into calculation, they have little reason to complain of disabilities which are inseparable from their position. Occasional remonstrances against the enforced inaction of the House in the earlier part of the Session only give occasion for demonstrations that the arrangement of business is natural and inevitable. In the present year there is reason to suppose that the peers will have abundant opportunity of discussing the Ballot Bill; and it may be hoped that they will not be tempted into any rash exercise of power. Their most prudent leaders will undoubtedly deprecate any attempt to overrule the deliberate and repeated decision of the House of Commons. According to the rules of political action, the Opposition in the House of Lords is bound to act in concert with the representatives of the party in the House of Commons; and neither Mr. DISRAELI nor his principal allies have thought it expedient to attempt to defeat the measure. Many peers disapprove of secret voting; and some of them may doubt whether the country at large really cares for a change which has after many years received the unanimous support of the Liberal party; but it is not desirable to shift the issue to a contest between the two Houses on a matter which directly and primarily affects only the constitution of the House of Commons.

THE ATTACK ON THE EDUCATION ACT.

MR. DIXON and Mr. RICHARD between them made the most of the case against the Education Act. The division of labour between the first two speakers undoubtedly saved the time of the House, and it had the further result—not perhaps foreseen by either mover or seconder—of showing that after all Mr. DIXON does not attach much value to the argument against the 25th clause which alone has given any real strength to the assault. "If," he said, "I have at various times denounced the large building grants that have arisen out of the period of grace, the increase—nearly fifty per cent.—of the annual grants to the public elementary schools, and the payment of fees to Denominational schools, it is not because I think those measures have affected the question of religious equality." Mr. DIXON may have other reasons for disliking these features in the Act; but his motion would certainly not have obtained ninety-four votes had the theoretical objections on which he dwelt in his speech been all that were entertained by his supporters. The agitation against the 25th clause of the Act is a sectarian agitation or it is nothing. The only excuse for the language that has been used against Mr. FORSTER, and for the ostentatious martyrdom courted by several of the agitators, is that they have persuaded themselves that the principle of religious equality is somehow at stake. A man would not refuse to pay a school rate because he thought that by the adoption of a different machinery a better school might be obtained for the same money. He would do his best to get the Act altered, but in the interval he would go on paying cheerfully for such a school as it gave him. When therefore Mr. DIXON dissociates himself to some extent from the Nonconformist opposition to the Act, he weakens to that extent his own case. If his dislike to the Act were based on religious principle, he would of course be bound to oppose it in season and out of season; but, if he merely thinks it imperfect and timid, he is surely bound, after it has been welcomed by so many genuine friends of education, and has been passed by such large Parliamentary majorities, to wait until the event has justified his forebodings before endeavouring to throw the country back into the educational chaos which existed before 1870.

Mr. DENNIS's condemnation of the Education Act reduces itself to this—that it allows the Denominational system to coexist with a National system. Against this permission he urges three principal objections—first, that under the Denominational system the spending of large amounts of public money is entrusted to irresponsible managers; secondly, that the Denominational system creates dissatisfaction in the teachers; and, thirdly, that large as the sum entrusted to irresponsible managers is, it is still totally insufficient for the purpose in view. Let us assume that these three charges are true, and see how far they support the inference Mr. DIXON draws from them. By irresponsible managers is meant managers appointed by the subscribers to the school fund, and not by the ratepayers of the district. If Mr. DIXON's desire were simply to see the money entrusted to school managers spent as grudgingly as possible, his preference for ratepayers over voluntary subscribers would be quite intelligible. But this is not his object. He has a genuine zeal for education, though not, as it seems to us, a zeal according to knowledge, and he hopes to see a time when the amount of expenditure on schools and schoolmasters will be very much greater than it is now. Mr. DIXON's theory, we suppose, is that the ratepayers will be anxious to make their school a thoroughly good one, while the subscribers will be content so long as the religion they themselves profess is taught in the school. According to this view, Denominational zeal for the secular part of education is altogether feigned. The clergy and such of the laity as subscribe to Church schools are in their hearts indifferent to the children learning arithmetic or geography; all they care for is that they shall be taught the Church Catechism. This theory is opposed to a large number of recorded facts. One of the causes which did most to produce the Revised Code was the eagerness of voluntary school managers to carry children further in secular subjects than it was possible for them to go with profit in the short time they were at school. Mr. DIXON speaks as though the importance attached to the three R's in English elementary schools were attributable to the Denominational system. The truth is, that the prominence now given to the rudiments is due to a victory of the Educational Department over the Denominationalists. The clergy were more ambitious than "My Lords," and in their desire to push forward a few clever children, they too much neglected the many backward children. If Mr. DIXON expects that a School Board in a rural district will have a higher ideal of education than the parson and his friends, he is certain to be terribly disappointed. The difference between the two, left to themselves, would be that the latter might neglect the rudiments in the supposed interest of more advanced studies, while the former would neglect them in the supposed interest of economy. Under the Education Act, however, neither are left to themselves. Both are subjected to the same check, and provided with the same inducements. Both have to submit to Government inspection. Both hope to obtain a Government grant, dependent on the results of that inspection. We contend therefore that, even if the managers of voluntary schools were fairly chargeable with being content with giving the minimum of secular instruction which will entitle them to a share in the Parliamentary grant, they are no worse in this respect than the majority of managers elected by the ratepayers, and that in the latter case, at least as much as in the former, the only real security against acquiescence in this low standard will be the supervision of the Education Department. And, supposing the two sets of managers to stand on the same footing in this respect, the Denominational system has the advantage of giving the public a large amount of money, freely contributed for educational purposes, in place of leaving the whole sum required to be wrung from careless or hostile local authorities.

The complaint of the schoolmasters, which forms the second head of Mr. DIXON's case, is twofold; that they are dependent, and that they are badly paid. They are the servants, they say, of the clergy, or, as one of them told Mr. DIXON, they are "anything between a gravedigger and a parson." All, however, that this grievance amounts to is that schoolmasters are the servants of those who appoint them—a painful position possibly, but one not peculiar to schoolmasters; nor, unless Mr. DIXON proposes to make schoolmasters irremovable by School Boards, will such of them as may hereafter exchange dependence on the clergy for dependence on the representatives of the ratepayers have any cause to congratulate themselves. They may no longer be anything between a gravedigger and a parson, but they will not gain much by becoming anything between a beadle and an Inspector of Nuisances. If they hope to get a larger salary, their calculations are equally faulty. It is not probable that the Education Department will so far interfere with the scholastic labour market as to fix a minimum standard of pay for schoolmasters, and without this a School Board composed of small farmers will hardly pay their teachers better than the clergy have done. Nor is it clear how they would have the means to do so even if they wished it. Mr. Dixon expressly exempts the managers of voluntary schools from the charge of wilfully underpaying schoolmasters, and indeed it must be obvious that in the prospect of an increased Government grant they have a strong inducement to get as good a man for the post as they can command. The reason why the salary of the teacher is too low is that the school fund is insufficient for the burdens laid upon it. But Mr. Dixon can hardly suppose that ratepayers will necessarily be more liberal than voluntary subscribers. The Education Department will have power to prescribe certain necessary outlays, but it will not be able to insist upon a poor and unwilling parish bringing its school up to a level which, as Mr. Dixon sorrowfully admits, has not yet been reached by the most successful schools in England. Whatever force there is in the argument derived from the present insufficiency of school funds tells against the universal substitution of rate-supported for voluntary schools. As Mr. Forster said on Tuesday, the parson and the squire "will very often manage schools in a country district more liberally, and make them more efficient, than would the recalcitrant farmers who are forced to pay the rate."

There is no need to criticize Mr. Richard's speech at any length, because the Nonconformist objections to the Education Act have again and again been considered in this journal. Mr. Richard repeats the assertion that to pay Denominational school managers for giving secular instruction is the same thing as subsidizing schools. If so, to buy gas from private gas works set up for the supply of a church would be subsidizing the Establishment. We question, however, whether the most rigid Dissenter would scruple at lighting his shop or his chapel from this source if it happened to be more convenient than manufacturing gas for himself. Mr. Richard's general charge, that the Education Act makes use of machinery supplied by the Church of England for the diffusion of elementary education, may be disposed of by the admission that it is true. The machinery was there, and, being there, it would have been folly, and worse than folly, in the authors of the Act not to make use of it. They were bound to take care that this machinery was not abused to purposes of proselytism, and this they believe has been done by a time-table conscience clause. If this precaution can be shown to be insufficient, if it can be proved that children are subjected, directly or indirectly, to religious teaching of which their parents disapprove, and that the Education Act provides no real redress, and no effective means of preventing a recurrence of the evil, then no doubt the machinery supplied by the Church of England must be cast aside. Till then, to rely solely on rates, to the exclusion of an existing denominational zeal, would be deliberately to ignore an auxiliary of immense value.

But little was said on Tuesday as to the feature in the Education Act which is really most open to criticism. The agitation against the 25th clause has thrown into the background the objection against the permission to teach religion in School Board schools. Judging from the small minority which Mr. AUBERON HERBERT found to support him on Thursday in condemning the similar permission contained in the Scotch Education Act, Mr. RICHARD was well advised in passing lightly over this portion of his brief. The doubts we expressed in 1870 upon the working of this provision in the English Act have not been removed by anything that has happened since; but in Scotland, where the voluntary machinery for teaching religion is far less complete than in England, the argument for allowing the community to do so if it chooses, subject to adequate provisions for protecting the rights of minorities, is of course proportionately stronger.

THE TICHBORNE CASE.

THE TICHBORNE Case has come to an end at last, abruptly, but not unexpectedly. It is true that the Claimant was cheered by the crowd outside the Court up to Friday last, but this probably expressed the popular appreciation of the audacity of his persistence rather than faith in his case. The Tichborne Bonds never recovered the shock which they received from the ATTORNEY-GENERAL's able and exhaustive speech. A careful examination of the plaintiff's own evidence showed that he had utterly failed to make good his claim. The burden of proof was upon him, and he broke down under it. It would have been monstrous if the title and estates of an ancient family could have been carried off on such flimsy and insufficient testimony as was offered on his behalf. On Monday the Claimant called a meeting of his backers, which was interrupted by a message that the Jury had suggested that the case should be stopped. As, one by one, his supporters withdrew, he was heard to be repeating, "All will be settled on Wednesday," and on Wednesday night he was lodged in Newgate, on the Judge's warrant for perjury. Whether he is a perjurer or not we will not say. He is unquestionably, as far as the evidence goes, an impostor, but perhaps he is a monomaniac. The mad doctors have another glorious opportunity of vindicating the innocence of crime, and although THOMAS CASTRO is not a murderer, his wickedness is not to be disparaged. His attempt to seize upon the name and estates of the TICHBORNES, and to stab the reputation of at least one of the members of that family in the most cruel and infamous manner, was in its way quite as bad as any murder. Some worthy people seem to have been rather startled, and perhaps shocked, when the ATTORNEY-GENERAL sought out a few strong words in order to describe the Claimant; but it is clear that either he is ROGER TICHBORNE or what Sir JOHN COLERIDGE described him as being; and it had become necessary that this issue should be set forth very plainly and distinctly. In most civil suits there is no villany on either side, but only prejudice or misapprehension; and there is usually a point at which a compromise is possible. But in this instance there was no room for any middle course. A feeling of misplaced sympathy and false tenderness for the Claimant had apparently taken possession even of some of those who did not believe in him; and there was a disposition to give him the benefit of any doubt, whereas justice and common sense alike required that this benefit should go to the other side. We do not mean to say that the jury were subject to this feeling, but it was conspicuous in the remarks which were made on the subject in society; and the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, who had no other means of gauging the sentiments of the jury, was bound to clear it away, if possible. Whether the Claimant took any of his various advisers and backers into his full confidence is a question upon which some light may perhaps be thrown by the criminal proceedings which have now been commenced. It is scarcely possible to doubt that some of his associates must have known, not only that he was quite scoundrel enough to be an impostor, for that of course they all knew after a little while, but that he was actually an impostor. The deception began in 1865, and was maintained for seven years; and if during the whole of that time TOM CASTRO kept his secret to himself, and made everybody else his dupes, he must be a man of preternatural astuteness and strength of mind. In the course of those years the case passed through the hands of several attorneys, who successively threw it up; but as Chief Justice ROVILL remarked, there is no "privilege" to prevent an attorney from exposing the criminal proceedings of a client. Even the seal of the confessional is not recognized to that extent; and if any attorneys labour under a delusion on this point, it is a pity they cannot be undeceived by some sharp process. Knowing a man to be engaged in an abominable fraud, and keeping his secret for him, is, in effect, simply abetting his villany, and either is, or should be, a criminal act.

The most obvious remark which is suggested by this trial is, that the finish of it should naturally have been the beginning. As soon as it was quite certain that ROGER had a number of indelible marks on his body which were not on the body of the Claimant, there was of course an end of the case. If it had been the other way, if the Claimant had been tattooed, and ROGER had not, that would not have been conclusive, although it would have raised a nice question as to the age of the marks, for they might have been put on after ROGER went away. But a man cannot be untattooed, except by a process of burning or scarification which tells its own tale. In the Roman case to which allusion has more than once been made, when an impostor pretended to be QUINTILIUS, the Emperor, knowing that QUINTILIUS spoke Greek fluently, examined the man to his Greek, and, as he could not speak a word of that language, gave judgment against him. A similar test would have gone against the Tichborne Claimant, for French was almost like ROGER's native tongue, and the Claimant does not know a word of the language, and cannot even pronounce the name of ROGER's mother correctly, calling it Faustine instead of Félicité. It is possible, however, for a person utterly to forget a language, as was admitted in this case, although there was an obvious absurdity in offering, or at least admitting, evidence on such a question. A Polish lady asserted that she had ceased to be able to speak Polish, but no proof was given that she had ever been able to speak it; and besides, if she chose to persist in saying that she could not speak it now, it is difficult to see how the truth as to her knowledge of Polish could be ascertained. Of course the loss of a language is quite possible, but it is highly improbable, especially in ROGER's case; ROGER spoke French perfectly at twenty-four years of age, when he disappeared, and we are asked to believe that he lost not only the words, but the accent, of the language in twelve years. Whatever changes may take place in the mind, manners, speech, or looks of any one, the changes of which the body is susceptible are limited. A man may grow continually fatter, his hair may fade, his expression may alter, but after a certain age he cannot grow taller, nor can his head grow larger, nor can his ears change their shape. Apart from the tattoo marks, the Claimant appears to be an inch or more taller than ROGER; his head is much bigger, so that he can but just get on a helmet which was too loose for ROGER; and his ears are large and pendulous, while ROGER's ears were thin and adhering to the head. If these differences could have been proved at the outset, no amount of curious knowledge on the Claimant's part as to the affairs of the TIGHBORNE family, or of evidence as to a general resemblance between him and ROGER, could have affected the conclusion that, whatever likeness there might be, he certainly was not ROGER. When a man asserts that he is a certain person, the first and most natural step in an inquiry as to identity would seem to be to impound his body, ascertain what sort of a man he is, and then compare him with what is known of the person he professes to be. If the Claimant had been ROGER, he would no doubt at the outset have offered himself for examination. Another point which must strike every one in regard to the inquiry is that Mr. HOLMES, Mrs. JURY, and other persons, who could have thrown light on many points, should have been present and should never have been examined. The interposition of a Judge in the management of a case must necessarily be guarded, but it is possible that the English plan of regarding a trial as a game of skill between counsel, with the Judge as umpire, may be carried too far.

However paradoxical it may appear, nothing at first told so much in the Claimant's favour as that he was in several important points utterly unlike ROGER. ROGER spoke French, and he could not. ROGER was thin, and he was a gross mountain of a man, a FALSTAFF, or DANIEL LAMBERT. How, said shallow, superficial people, should a man so very unlike ROGER ever dare to personate him? He must be really ROGER, or he would never have dreamt of such a thing. In the first place, there is no reason to suppose that when he went into the affair he intended to keep up the personation. If anybody is responsible for this imposture it is the crazy old lady whose death was perhaps hastened by a dawning sense of the mischief which her malicious perversity and folly had brought upon her family. The wonder is, not that a ROGER turned up in 1866, but that, as BAIGENT said, there had not been a crop of ROGERS long before. The Dowager offered her own fortune, with the chance of the family estates, as a bid for a pretender. If the Claimant when in Australia formed the impression that she wanted some one to come forward and personate ROGER, and that from spite, self-interest, or some other reason, she would at once identify him no matter what he looked like, he would have been fully justified by the Dowager's letters in coming to that conclusion. In any case he probably imagined that he would get a good sum out of the old lady, and that he could then retire from the affair if he chose. When he fell in with retainers of the family who supported and assisted his case, the chances of a successful imposition drew him gradually further along a path from which there was at last no retreat; it was almost safer to go on than to go back. It is probable that his resemblance to ROGER was closer than the ATTORNEY-GENERAL was disposed to admit. Even the photographs show a certain similarity in the lackadaisical eyes and general expression of the face. The Claimant is in manner and appearance neither such a blackguardly ruffian on the one hand, nor ROGER, on the other, such a pleasant gentleman, as has been assumed. ROGER had some generous instincts and respectable qualities, but he did not produce an agreeable impression on those who knew him. When General COSTANCE described him as a wretched, unwholesome, dirty-looking little fellow, he was perhaps not far wrong. He had taken to drinking before he left England, and people who allowed for that and for twelve years' knocking about in Australia may be excused if they thought it quite possible that the Claimant might be him. Nothing can be more absurd than to attribute "gentlemanly demeanour" to CASTRO, as we suppose we must call him; but he has undoubtedly that kind of cleverness which shows itself in ready social assimilation. At Wagga-Wagga he was at first a "very dirty butcher," but he is said to have gradually improved in appearance, and a similar improvement is reported to have taken place since he came to England. The combination of a certain likeness to ROGER in expression with a marked unlikeness in other respects really helped his case. If a thin man exactly like ROGER had appeared, the comparison would have been more rigid and exacting; it was the stoutness which threw observers off their guard, and carried them into the region of imagination, where they could form their own ideas as to what ROGER, after thirteen years of a hard and dissolute life, "among the "savages," as the Dowager said, would look like. The manner in which evidence as to identity was got up might have supplied Sir G. C. LEWIS, had he lived, with a supplementary chapter for his book on the influence of authority on the formation of opinion. The process of identification appears to have been pretty much this—that the Claimant identified a number of persons from information about themselves previously pumped out of them by his adherents, and that those persons were then led to suppose that they had identified him. One fool, or dupe, makes many, and when a little knot of witnesses had thus been got together, others were ready to adopt their convictions. One peculiarity of this case has been the application of the principle of limited liability to a speculation in law. It is impossible to suppose that the members of Parliament and others who subscribed funds for the plaintiff merely backed a rogue on the chance of his winning. They must have had the ends of justice in view, and their own feelings will no doubt prompt them to offer a handsome contribution to the expenses of the much-injured heir.

MR. GOLDWIN SMITH ON ENGLISH INSTITUTIONS.

MR. GOLDWIN SMITH is always an eloquent writer, and an article which he has published in the Fortnightly Review illustrates the undoubted proposition that anger is the most eloquent of passions. The sustained indignation of his invective against existing English institutions could only have been made more impressive by the introduction of some gradation or variety into his universal censure. An historical scholar, who is also an earnest revolutionary politician, may with perfect sincerity extend to the ancestors or predecessors of the present peers the animosity which is provoked by the Conservative tendencies of the House of Lords; but the ordinary reader has not sufficient imagination or energy to direct his antipathy at the same moment against the courtiers of HENRY VIII. and the aristocrats of the present day. A numerous party which shares Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH's hostility to the Church Establishment will find it difficult to resent the expulsion from the House of Lords of the abbots, "who were elected for life, and sometimes by merit, so that they formed, comparatively speaking, a democratic element." To Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH the peers of the sixteenth century are still hateful as "knaves and sycophants, steeped in public rapine and judicial murder"; and he is shocked because "the lovers of ELIZABETH, one of them notoriously the murderer of his wife, and in every respect a most abandoned scoundrel, were received into a 'temple of honour,' in which the men who saved the nation, the DRAKES, and RALEIGHS, and WALSINGHAMS, found no place." It is perfectly true that LEICESTER was not an exemplary character; but CECIL, who contributed to the task of saving the nation, was certainly not a lover of ELIZABETH, and any miscarriage in the distribution of honours by the Tudor Sovereigns happened a long time ago. Sympathy with Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH's wrath is almost exhausted before it arrives at the titled capitalists of the present day, who are supposed to be the latest and basest of all the component parts of the peerage. "After a temporary antagonism caused by the Corn Laws, and a certain amount of coy resistance on social grounds, the capitalists have been recognized by the landowners, and in their turn are decking themselves with the titles of feudal barons, ordering Norman pedigrees with their equipages and liveries, doubling the crush and deliquescence at St. James's, and thinking it part of their right as millionaires to make public honour and national government their family property, and to hand them down with the other fruits of successful speculation to their aristocratically educated sons." Ambition may partake of the nature either of virtue or of vice; but if the desire of hereditary rank implies a wish to convert public honour into family property, any effort to acquire political eminence might with equal justice be stigmatized as an attempt to make public honour and national government a personal property. It may perhaps seem an evasion of the real issue to comment on the want of proportion and reticence which weakens the force of Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH's fierce attack on the House of Lords; but literary criticism, if it is sound, often indicates defects of substance which account for errors or peculiarities of style. Indiscriminate denunciation of an "historical accident" which has made or modified history for several centuries is by its own violence convicted of exaggeration, and at least of partial injustice. There are, in truth, no historical accidents, and the description of any institution as an unaccountable anomaly would be a confession of ignorance.

The object of Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH's essay is to urge upon the party of movement the concentration of their efforts on the destruction of the House of Lords and of the Church Establishment. He is perfectly right in holding that it is a mistake to attack Christianity as well as the Church, and to assail in the first instance the throne, which he regards as the strength and support of oligarchy. With hostility to religion it is evident that Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH has no sympathy; but in recommending the postponement of agitation for a republic, he only points out that, "if you attack the monarchy, you give battle to your opponents on a field of their own choosing." "On this subject true policy seems to point to silence and patience, a patience which will probably not be overtaken when the House of Lords and the Privileged Church are gone." No reasoning can be more candid; but the threatening promise of POLYPHEMUS to ULYSSES can scarcely be described as silence, and patience is perhaps not the most prominent of Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH's controversial qualities. If the fall of the peerage and of the Church involves, as is indeed probable, the destruction of the throne, Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH would seem to be giving battle to his opponents on a field of their own choosing. He can scarcely blame them for profiting in argument by his own voluntary admissions. His own scheme of political and social reform is intelligible and comprehensive. After the abolition of the House of Lords, the Church, and the Crown, the confiscation of the increase of the value of land, and the prohibition or discouragement of hereditary wealth, Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH proposes the election by universal suffrage of local Legislatures, which are in their turn to elect a Central Parliament. The Executive Power is to be vested in a Ministry or Council of State, to be appointed at certain intervals by the Parliament. In this manner he expects by some unexplained process to put an end to government by party. His project differs from the American system by dispensing with the Federal House of Representatives, with the Senates of the several States, and with the President elected by universal suffrage. The proposed Constitution may perhaps be as plausible as any democratic scheme of the same kind; and if it promoted, as Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH anticipates, patriotic feeling and national unity, it would so far be highly beneficial; but the whole fabric of legislation and government is essentially American, in spite of detailed modifications, and an America without an unlimited supply of land is an experiment which has not yet been tried.

The temper in which Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH deals with existing institutions is not calculated to produce implicit confidence in the soundness of his judgment. His assertion that the overthrow of the French Republic by LOUIS NAPOLEON in 1852 was nearly contemporaneous with the Sheffield outrages of 1866 or 1867 shows that indignation tends to confuse chronology. A description of the State Church which would have done credit to the combined genius of JUVENAL and COBBETT deserves to be quoted at length:—"With the House of Lords would go, too, the State Church, the religious organ and the most miserable slave of political reaction, whose political course through Tudor persecutions of Nonconformists, Stuart conspiracies against liberty, English Restoration St. Bartholomews, Scotch Restoration torture chambers, Five Mile Acts, Conventicle Acts, promulgations of passive obedience, temporary rebellions when JAMES and JEFFREYS, instead of merely bathing in the blood of peasants, proceeded to touch Church pence, relapsed into passive obedience and conspiracies against liberty as soon as the Church pence were safe, SACHEVEREL, High Church riots and burning of meeting-houses, Acts to prevent Dissenters from educating their children carried by the aid of the most Christian BOLLINGBROKE, civil wars and foreign invasions of the country instigated by persons who were drinking in the PRETENDERS in Oxford common rooms while their peasant dupes were agonising on Culloden Heath,

"preachings of American and French wars, defilements of GEORGE III., and support of Government by Privilege and Catholic exclusion, is certainly the meanest episode in the annals of Christendom, and perhaps as mean as any in the annals of mankind. It is one course of opposition to progress, justice, and humanity—one series of servile alliances with powers of evil, with murderous tyrants, infamous favourites, profligate intriguers, buttresses supporting the Church from without, devout members of the Hellfire Club, practical atheists, and political sharpers down to the present hour." The passage is a masterpiece of vituperative rhetoric, and the reference to one class of supposed allies of the Church will be recognized as the private mark of the master. The defect of this kind of composition is that it is equally applicable to any party or cause. A Tory with Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH's command of passionate language could compose an effective supplement to the Anti-Jacobin in denunciation of Liberalism or Dissent. It would be as easy to assert that Fox perpetrated the September massacre as to state that the Highland Jacobite clans were the dupes of Oxford parsons; "Restoration St. Bartholomews" would have been in the highest degree censurable if only they had occurred. Like all sweeping satirists Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH excludes from consideration the virtues and the services of the objects of his animosity. The obscure and ill-paid toil of a laborious and beneficent clergy in towns and country districts, the civilization which is maintained and propagated by their efforts and example and by the efforts and example of their families, is entirely forgotten by their angry and contemptuous censor. In its corporate capacity the clerical body is perhaps narrow and timid, but it now exercises little political or collective power. It is in the parishes of England that the justification of the English Establishment is to be found, and it is everywhere but in the region in which the Church really exists that reformers go to look for it. The experience of other countries shows that it is not easy to constitute a body of clergy who shall be gentlemen before they are priests. Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH truly asserts that many Ritualists are disaffected to the Establishment, but he can scarcely sympathize with their tendencies or their motives.

The political revolution which Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH proposes would have the designed result of subverting the present system of society. Whether it would promote national unity is at least doubtful. Many of the changes which he advocates have been long since effected in France, which is nevertheless distracted by the endless struggles of irreconcilable factions. There is in France no House of Lords; and there is a peasant clergy which, if it were deprived of its meagre pittance from the State, would become, if possible, more abjectly devoted than at present to an extranational allegiance. The land is held by peasants in small portions, the artisans possess the right of universal suffrage; and both classes are inveterately hostile to all whom they suppose to be possessed of wealth or privilege. The worship of equality is not accompanied by love of freedom; and, in the absence of any other kind of superiority, the agents of the Government of the day exercise almost undisputed power. In Spain also universal suffrage has created a Government of military and Parliamentary adventurers who supplant each other incessantly in office. The gravest statesmen of the Continent habitually speak with admiring envy of those institutions which inspire Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH with unqualified hatred. That such a man should propound such doctrines with declamatory and intolerant vehemence is undoubtedly a proof of the insecurity of the English Constitution, but not of its inherent unsoundness.

FRANCE.

FORTUNE has dealt a blow at M. THIERS from an unexpected quarter. He has had his share of troubles since the day when he accepted the task of reorganising France; but amidst all his cares he has hitherto been happy in his Finance Minister. M. FOURIER-QUARRAS had unusual qualifications for the post he has just resigned. He is a man of ability, so much so indeed as to have attracted a special compliment from the German Government, which had had some means of testing his qualifications. He is a Protestant, and as the policy of France will probably be Protestant as long as M. THIERS is President, no matter who may be the Finance Minister, it is perhaps as well that the officer who is to construct the Budgets should be a believer in the principle which underlies them. And notwithstanding that there is consideration, he has always been willing to give the President the first place in every financial debate, and to see his own proposals altered or abandoned whenever it suited M. THIERS's purpose. It is no wonder that M. THIERS has clung fondly to such a real treasure among Ministers. Yet even his zeal in support of convenient friends has been worn out by the part which M. POUYER-QUERTIER has taken in the trial of M. JANVIER DE LA MOTTE. M. THIERS is too old a servant of the State to be very much shocked at any disclosures as to the misappropriation of Government money. But M. JANVIER DE LA MOTTE's case was peculiarly flagrant, and the present is a peculiarly inconvenient time for the Government to be committed to anything which looks like condonation of the Empire. M. THIERS has all but quarrelled with the Right, and the Left is hotly opposed to corruption, not so much perhaps because it is corruption as because it was especially prevalent under NAPOLEON III.; consequently the Left, which is all that M. THIERS now has to lean on, would have been sure to attack the Government if it had sheltered an Imperialist prefect, and M. POUYER-QUERTIER did everything in his power to shelter M. JANVIER DE LA MOTTE. From his own point of view, it was scarcely more than an act of simple justice to do so. M. POUYER-QUERTIER is evidently a believer in the leading principle of Imperialist finance. That principle may be succinctly described as the provision of secret service money under other names. Budgets had to be constructed in such a way as to be popular, and popularity could only be secured by the excision of disagreeable items. But under the Second Empire the necessities represented by these disagreeable items had to be met in one way or another. NAPOLEON III. could not be allowed to make a progress through his dominions without spontaneous exhibitions of devotion, and during the later years of his reign spontaneous loyalty was a very costly product. It was impossible to allow money paid for cheers or addresses to figure in the Prefect's accounts under their proper titles. Yet, as the money had to be got out of the taxpayers by one pretence or another, there was no choice but to manufacture fictitious creditors, or to exaggerate the claims of real creditors. M. JANVIER DE LA MOTTE only did what every Imperial agent, from the highest to the lowest, was doing in his proper sphere. M. POUYER-QUERTIER is not an Imperialist agent; but he appears to recognize in these devices the common practice of all Governments. The immaculate Republic has the same wants as the anything but immaculate Empire, and they must be met in the same way. M. POUYER-QUERTIER's indignation at the unjust persecution to which M. JANVIER DE LA MOTTE has been subjected seems to have carried him beyond all regard for Ministerial decorum. He was not content with testifying to such facts as he supposed to be favourable to the accused, nor even with declaring that all that had been done was within the limits of allowable financial manœuvring. He denounced the MINISTER OF JUSTICE for instituting the prosecution, and the Judge for entertaining it, and erected the Ministry of Finance into a universal protectorate of financial scandals. It was clear that after this M. THIERS must consent to lose either M. POUYER-QUERTIER or M. DUBAÏ. If the consent of the Minister of Finance is to be required before a defaulting prefect can be brought to trial, and that Minister avows that to obtain money for one purpose and spend it on another for which it never could have been obtained is a perfectly legitimate proceeding, the custody of the scales would become something worse than a sinecure. For a short time, indeed, it was thought possible that the acquittal of M. JANVIER DE LA MOTTE would have enabled M. POUYER-QUERTIER to hold his own against his colleague. But such a solution of the difficulty would have plunged M. THIERS into danger out of which even his tact and energy would have found it hard to open a way. The corruption of the Empire has been the favourite text of the Republican Opposition for years past, and they could not, with any consistency, support a President who by the mouth of his Minister of Finance declared this corruption to be normal and necessary. The Right might not have disliked to see the Republic identify itself with the Empire as regards its financial morality, but it would certainly have turned the incident to account at some future time. Even the proved Protectionist convictions of M. POUYER-QUERTIER could not weigh down such drawbacks as these. His resignation was accepted, if not demanded, and the graver interests that have lately occupied the Assembly have been put aside for the pleasanter excitement of a Ministerial crisis.

Even before M. POUYER-QUERTIER's appearance at Rouen there were signs that the quarrel between the Government and the majority in the Assembly was cooling down. The combatants are too necessary to one another to allow the condict to be carried on & outrage. The last thing the monarchical party can wish is to have the embarrassment of governing France suddenly thrown on its hands. The last thing that M. THIERS can wish is to have to govern France without the aid of that Conservative feeling which alone enables him to keep the Left in check, and to invest his administration with the steady and business-like aspect dear to capitalists and creditors. It seems to be understood that if M. THIERS accepts the modifications which have been introduced into M. LEFRANC's Press Bill by the Committee of the Assembly, and abstains from any attempt to give the Republic a more permanent character, nothing more will be heard of the monarchical Manifesto, or the Letter of Adhesion. M. THIERS is probably a genuine believer in the essentially provisional character of a Government which was created to treat with an enemy in possession for the liberation of its own territory, and his desire to hurry forward the definitive proclamation of the Republic will not survive the corresponding anxiety on the part of the Right to hurry forward the definitive proclamation of the monarchy. The events of the last few weeks must have convinced the more rational members of the Right that they made a false move in abandoning their attitude of reserve. Some of them may now regret that they did not adopt a bolder policy a year ago, and identify the return of peace with the restoration of the Monarchy. But granting that it would have been wise to make the attempt then—a concession in which an unbiassed observer will hardly concur—it does not follow that it would be wise to make it now. The monarchical sentiment may have been stronger in France in 1871 than it was in 1872, but as the tide was not taken at its flood, the more prudent course is to wait till the ebb is past. In France there is always a fair chance that the Government for the time being will do something to discredit itself, and delay has, as regards the monarchists, the further advantage that one serious hindrance to their success may be taken out of the way before the time for action arrives. The Count of CHAMBORD may die or abdicate, and either of these events would be an inestimable advantage to the cause which he represents. The ethics of assassination have not yet sanctioned the removal of a prince by his partisans on the ground of impracticability; but there is a bare possibility that the Count of CHAMBORD, who seems to share with PIUS IX. the advantage of having a profound faith in his own pretensions, may be convinced that the cause of Divine Right may be better promoted by having the prince next in succession on the throne than by keeping the prince in possession an exile.

Meanwhile, amidst embarrassments of every kind, France keeps true to her determination to pay off the Germans at the earliest possible date. A further instalment of the indemnity has been forthcoming nearly two months before the appointed time, and perhaps nothing but the feeling of the Government that an immediate emancipation from the burden might not in the present state of France prove an unmixed good, prevents the later stages of the process from following each other with yet greater rapidity. But a patriotic Frenchman, eager as he may be to see his country freed from the disgrace of foreign occupation, may still remember that the term of the indemnity is also the term of the Provisional Government. When the obligation to the foreigner has been discharged, a constitutional settlement can hardly be put off. A longer delay may perhaps be useful in helping the majority of the nation to know their own minds.

MR. LOWE AND THE INCOME-TAX DEPUTATION.

MR. LOWE is perhaps as zealous an economist as Mr. BRIGHT; but, not being yet relieved from the responsibilities of office, he cannot deal so summarily with the proposal for mutilating the Income-tax. Three years ago Mr. BRIGHT was a member of a Government which obtained from the House of Commons a revenue of nearly seventy millions, but he now recurs to his former opinion that no Government ought to be tolerated which cannot do its work cheaper. Seventy millions is undoubtedly a large sum; but general propositions about the expenditure required by the necessities of the country are simply worthless. About two-fifths of the total outlay is appropriated to the payment of interest on the Debt; and certainly Mr. BRIGHT would not approve of any attempt to tamper with the national credit. Some politicians are of opinion that efforts ought to be made for the reduction of the Debt; but there are no funds by which the operation could be effected, unless a surplus income is provided by taxation. It is universally admitted that the cost of administration necessarily increases as the activity of Government extends into new departments; and the augmentation of prices and wages which is principally due to large importations of gold makes every public and private operation more expensive. Mr. BRIGHT would probably confine his plans of retrenchment chiefly or wholly to the military and naval establishments; but, if he had been in office during the last Session, he would have supported the Bill for the abolition of purchase, which will ultimately cost several millions. The scale of the national defences must be determined by other considerations than those of their absolute cost. The country is rich enough to maintain whatever force may be required for its safety and welfare; and if its wealth were quadrupled, it ought not to pay for a superfluous ship or regiment. Mr. BRIGHT's answer to the deputation which requested him to oppose the Income-tax had the not inconsiderable merit of evading a troublesome and unseasonable discussion. In anything which could be said against the tax he was perfectly willing to concur; but his economical doctrines were equally applicable to any other tax; and he specially included in his condemnation the duties on tea, sugar, and coffee. It was not to be expected that the author of the phrase of "a free breakfast-table" would modify the opinions which he has often expressed. Even if the expenditure were reduced by two millions, the majority of Mr. BRIGHT's political allies would probably insist on the maintenance of the Income-tax as an important source of revenue, although some of them might endeavour to render its incidence more partial and unequal.

The deputation which waited on Mr. LOWE on Wednesday professed to recommend the abolition of Schedule D, or of the tax on the profits of trades and professions; but several of the speakers, with more regard to justice, proposed that the Income-tax itself should be removed; and one of them, who as a Birmingham alderman must be a constituent of Mr. BRIGHT's, censured the Government for lifting taxation from the working classes and laying it on the shoulders of the middle-class. Colonel BARTLELOT, whose speech is not reported, must as a county member and landed proprietor have found himself in unaccustomed company; nor can it be supposed that he desired to exempt traders and professional men from the tax at the expense of landowners and farmers. If Colonel BARTLELOT renews in the present Session his annual motion for the repeal of the Malt-tax, he will furnish an additional argument against the proposal of the recent deputation. Mr. LOWE's answer was straightforward and candid, and, as might have been expected, it was not encouraging. Unlike Mr. BRIGHT, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, who scrutinizes every item of the national expenditure, sees little possibility of retrenchment, and though he dislikes the Income-tax, he considers that it must stand or fall as a whole. He reminded the deputation that the alternative taxes which might be suggested were the same which have in recent years been abolished to the general satisfaction. "There were the duties on fire insurance, soap, beer, glass, windows, and other things"; but he reasonably took it for granted that any such imposts would be thought more objectionable than the Income-tax. Some part of the present agitation must be attributed to the injudicious zeal of those who assess the Income-tax. Mr. LOWE declined to make himself responsible for the acts of the independent local Commissioners, and he intimated his willingness to undertake the assessment and collection of the tax through the officers of the revenue. The change would be a great improvement on the present practice, and there seems no reason why Mr. LOWE should not introduce a Bill for the purpose. One of the arguments by which he justified the maintenance of Schedule D was perhaps too subtle to be appreciated by his audience. If the origin rather than the receipt of income is taken into consideration, the abolition of Schedule D would, according to Mr. LOWE, involve the exemption of the fundholders, who contribute 700,000*l.* to the tax. The Loan Acts contained clauses to the effect that the fundholders shall not be liable to any Parliamentary tax whatever, but Sir ROBERT PEEL invented a distinction, described by Mr. LOWE as metaphysical, between the origin of the income and the actual receipt. The fundholder is taxed, not in his special capacity, but as the recipient of income which the State declines to trace to its source, though it intercepts it at the Bank of England. If there were no stronger reason against the abolition of Schedule D, it would be competent to Parliament to open its eyes in one case and to shut them in another; nor would it be difficult to contend that the exemption of profits was justified by some other pretext than an investigation of their source. The fundholders are not in a position to declare that, in Mr. LOWE's words, they will not be a single penny.

The real objection to the removal of the tax on earnings is that an undue privilege would be arbitrarily conferred on a large part of the wealth of the country. If Schedule D produces 3,000,000*l.* it follows that the income which it affects must be at least 150,000,000*l.*; and, with due allowance for imperfect returns, the amount may be confidently estimated at more than 150,000,000*l.* No sound economist has at any time admitted that, as long as a tax is placed on any kind of income, this vast amount should be capriciously exempted from contribution. The Income Tax Association itself makes an exemption, to the detriment of shareholders in Joint-stock Companies, although they are traders in precisely the same sense as private speculators who pursue similar branches of industry. Mr. HUBBARD formerly attempted to claim exemption for private traders, on the ground of their personal exertions; but every firm must be managed either by proprietors or by paid agents; and if the owner of the business thinks fit to perform the duty which he might devolve on a deputy, the amount which he saves is as fairly liable to taxation as the salary which a substitute would receive. A far more plausible pretext for exemption is founded on the uncertainty or short duration of commercial, and much more of professional, incomes; but the apparent inequality is effectually corrected by the co-extensive existence of the tax and of the income on which it is levied. A pound of income enjoyed for ever pays a perpetual annuity of sixpence, which may be capitalized into a charge of fifteen or sixteen shillings. A pound of income enjoyed for three years at the same rate pays first and last no more than eighteen-pence. It must be allowed that the calculation is deranged by changes in the percentage of the tax, and for that reason a judicious financier will abstain from raising the rate to cover temporary demands. The whole amount of income which is taxed under Schedule D is not less permanent than interest or rent; and any of the great professions, taken separately, produces a perpetual revenue which, together with the tax, is distributed among successive practitioners. It is not the business of financiers to assume the functions of a petty Providence by correcting the inequalities of fortune. The owners of property are richer than those who earn an equal income in exactly the same proportion before and after the payment of a uniform tax on both heads of revenue. It is true, that as a general rule, taxes are more burdensome to the poor than to the rich; but the same comparative disadvantage attaches to all their pecuniary relations. A capitalist may be better able than a lawyer or a doctor to spare sixpence in the pound of his income; but he can also afford better to pay his butcher or his wine merchant. Mr. LOWE or his predecessors merely take things as they find them, without attempting to reform the world.

It is highly improbable that at any future time the recipients of income will be exempted from a special and direct contribution to the national revenue. Free breakfast-tables, or the open ports which attract the fancy of sanguine politicians, imply the imposition or maintenance of a charge upon incomes; and although it is possible that future Parliaments may establish an arbitrary distinction, the property which is the endowment of traders and professional men ought to be taxed at the same rate as the residue which is enjoyed by sinecure owners. The practical inference from the discontent which has lately revived among a portion of the industrial classes is that the assessment should be managed with all possible regard to the feelings of the taxpayer, and that the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER should, if possible, keep the percentage low. Little was heard of the pressure of the tax as long as it was limited to fourpence in the pound; and Mr. LOWE may thank his own second or third thoughts as to last year's Budget for the pleasure of his interview with the recent deputation. It is satisfactory to observe that the Government has profited by the criticisms which were provoked by its imposition of the cost of abolishing purchase on the payers of Income-tax. Mr. CARDWELL announces that the three and a half millions which he requires for district barracks are to be raised by terminable annuities; and, although a simple loan might have been preferable in principle, the provision of capital to meet a charge properly belonging to capital account is a laudable innovation or return to sound practice. If it is found practicable in the present year to make any remission, Mr. LOWE could not employ a surplussage less than in the removal of the twopence added last year to the Income-tax.

LEGAL EDUCATION.

ALTHOUGH Sir GEORGE J. STUART, Bart., is establishing a School of Law at the University of London, a majority in the House of Commons, the Government of which by the successful leadership is sure to be in one form or other a successful one. The question whether it is desirable that barristers and solicitors should be educated together has been left in abeyance, and an opportunity has been given to the Inns of Court to supersede the necessity of a new school of law by improving the school of law which they have now in existence. But already the main point, that of compulsory examination for all persons wishing to become barristers, has been secured, and the SOLICITOR-GENERAL announced on behalf of the Inns of Court that they were ready to deal with the whole subject of legal education in the most wide and liberal manner possible. If they carry out their present intentions in a satisfactory manner, there really is nothing more to be done. They have ample funds, and they are under the guidance of men who know what legal education ought to mean and what is the best mode of providing it. Their action is infinitely preferable to that of a new body less independent and more liable to be acted on by the influence of the Government of the day or by the currents of unenlightened popular opinion. But, as those who spoke for them in the House frankly owned, their present resolve to make their system of legal education worthy of them has been in a great measure the fruit of the movement set on foot by Sir ROUNDELL PALMER and his friends; and, if they succeed, Sir ROUNDELL PALMER will have succeeded also. It may now be assumed that the Inns of Court will endeavour to set up as good a school of law as they can devise; and the only points to be considered are what is the best school of law that can be set up, and what would be the general effects of an improved system of legal education.

The Inns of Court have had for many years what may be termed a school of law. They have had a body of readers who have given public lectures and held private classes; and studentships and exhibitions have been freely given to successful students. But the success of the system has been impeded by the absence of any necessity to pass an examination being imposed on those who wished to be called to the Bar, and by the existence of a belief, shared by many of the most eminent men at the Bar, that men who wanted to learn as much as they could while students rather lost than gained time by availing themselves of professorial teaching. Still the system has done a very great deal of good. It has been under the superintendence, first, of Lord WESTBURY, and then of Sir EDWARD RYAN, and their superintendence has been exercised with much care and practical wisdom. They have secured an ample amount of private teaching in the details of various branches of the law, while they have allowed the readers perfect liberty in the choice and range of the subjects of the public lectures; thus permitting a teacher interested in his subject to be always moving forward, and to give to his lectures at least that merit of being full of novelty and freshness to himself, the absence of which must make all public teaching unutterably dull to hearers of every age and class. The students who attend need not attend unless they like, but they attend in very considerable numbers, and show by the interest they take, and by the kindly understanding they preserve with the lecturer, that they are getting what they consider worth having. It must be remembered that legal students consist of very different sorts of persons, and there is one large class to whom the education provided by the Inns of Court is of great value, and it is a class for whom the Inns of Court are bound to take thought with peculiar care. We make all who wish to practise at the Bar in very various parts of the British Empire come here to be called. If a Hindoo wishes to practise as a barrister at Calcutta, if a Frenchman wishes to practise at Mauritius, or a Dutchman to practise at the Cape, they must all come and be called in England. But these are only extreme samples of a class. There are a great many persons who wish to be called who do not go to any University, and they feel in a great degree what those coming from remote dependencies feel in a still greater degree—the advantage of having a centre of legal instruction, something to do that they must do, some one to address whose business it is to advise and aid them, and the pleasure of learning what they must learn under the guidance of a teacher who knows what they have got to know, who can appreciate their difficulties, and who cheers them by constantly inspiring the thought that what seems dull and uninteresting to them is of perpetual and unmistakable interest to a person who is further advanced in the subject than they are.

The Inns of Court, however, cannot possibly supply more than one school of law out of many. Different Universities and colleges are all engaged in teaching law with great success and industry. At Oxford and Cambridge law is taught under advantages which the Inns of Court can scarcely rival. At a certain number of fellowships are already given to men eminent in Law and History, and the number is likely to be increased. There are offices far beyond any that the Inns of Court can offer. Those, too, who have been sent to a University would, for various reasons, after they have made up their minds to go to the Bar, rather study law at their University than elsewhere, and so they often come up to London having little to learn from a school of law. All the professorial teaching and all the teaching that any school of law can give to students is only preparatory to the real learning of their business. They must go into the chambers of working lawyers and attend courts of law assiduously in order to learn that for which they hope to get paid in after life. All study in the way of reading text-books and attending lectures is only preparatory to the learning that teaches a man how to be useful to a client. But the difference between going into chambers or courts, according as a man has or has not previously made himself master of some of the general principles of law, is enormous. Thousands of pounds are every year wasted in fees for permission to attend chambers by those who do not know enough beforehand to understand what is going on there. The primary function of the Inns of Court as a school of law is to provide for those not trained at Universities that preparatory education which is or may be provided at Universities. The SOLICITOR-GENERAL announced that the Inns of Court are going to get the very best instruction that money can buy; but, although it is of the first importance to get the very best instruction possible, yet in any case the main work of the school of law established by the Inns of Court must be to give, in common with other schools of law, the best preparatory instruction it can to those who, thus qualified, will be able to make good use of practical training. The number of men who have gone through this preparatory instruction and who will leave their practical training to come and hear lectures must necessarily be exceedingly small. A man who has mastered the general principles of Equity under a system of preparatory instruction, and is at work in chambers learning practice from a leading junior to whom he has paid a hundred guineas, will not cut up an afternoon by going to hear a public lecture on the principles of Equity delivered by the ablest lecturer the Inns of Court could select. It is, however, possible that the Inns of Court might enter usefully on a field which would have attractions even for those who have gone through sufficient preparatory instruction. This is the field of what is known in France as "Comparative Legislation." Those who have mastered some of the general principles of English law, and know something also of Roman law, would probably think it worth while to pursue, under competent guidance, the interesting questions raised by a discussion of the various modes in which the same legal problems have been solved or encountered in different ages and in different countries.

The uses of legal education are, up to a certain point, very obvious. It is an excellent thing that an examination should stand in the way of those who are utterly incompetent, and who yet may hold important public appointments simply because they are barristers. It is only right that men of different nationalities, brought here whether they like it or not to pass a long time in England before they are called, should have a public body to welcome, guide, and instruct them. It is a great gain to the more advanced and zealous students that they should begin the practical training for their profession only after they have learnt a good deal from books and lectures. But the question may be asked, and was discussed in the House of Commons, what further good legal education would do; and the point raised for assertion and negation was, that a higher legal education would make English law more scientific. It is not very easy to see what is meant by this. It seems more true and ample to say that a good legal education would lead to those improvements of the law which come, in one way or other, from lawyers being able to look at law in different aspects. Legal education may in one sense be easily too scientific. It may go too far into the minutiae of Roman law; it may be too much a reproduction of the thoughts and mannerisms of foreign jurists. One of the most disheartening facts of legal education is that what is called scientific law, limited as it is in quantity, is seldom written in intelligible English. What is wanted is that the scientific lawyer should take hold of the principles, not the minute details, of Roman law, or the principles set forth in the works of foreign jurists, and should ask himself what is plain English, technical terms apart, these principles come to; and he will find a very large number of instances find that his familiar English law embodies the same principles. This process of discovery, accompanied, of course, by the parallel process of discovering where English law has not the same principles embodied in it, and why it has not, is perhaps what is properly meant by the scientific study of English law, and no doubt it is a useful process. But the law itself will be improved principally by the improvement of the profession, which determines its character and a large portion of its contents. Legal education can do much towards such an improvement. It can make a lawyer know various branches of law in a general way, and one great obstacle in the way of the improvement of the law has been that Chancery men know nothing but Equity, Common lawyers nothing but the Common Law, and so forth. Legal education, too, if good, can teach lawyers the habit of setting out from principles, and considering how they apply to the facts before them, before reference is made to precedents. The judgment of a great judge always reads as if it were nothing but the perfection of common sense, sharpened by experience and knowledge; and legal education can do something towards making lawyers generally think in a humble way as great lawyers have thought in an eminent way. Whether codification is or is not likely to be a fruit of the improvement of English legal education is a doubtful point, and one perhaps not very important at present. In any case, before either the form or substance of English law receives any great change, there is a preliminary task to be accomplished—that of making lawyers have an idea of law as a whole, a habit of being guided by principles, and a perception of what are the main problems of law, together with some knowledge of how these problems have under various systems been practically solved. When this preliminary work has been accomplished, it will be time enough to talk about a code.

THE STORY OF THE TICHBORNE CASE.

THE Claimant in the Tichborne case has submitted to a non-suit in his action against the Tichborne family, and although he is technically at liberty to reopen the question on payment of the expenses of the suit just closed, the intimation of the jury that they had heard sufficient evidence practically amounts to a verdict against him. The testimony produced during a protracted trial of 103 days would fill a moderate-sized library, but we will endeavour to compress it into a brief and connected narrative, with a view to illustrate the origin and development of what appears to be one of the most daring and extraordinary impostures which have ever been brought to light.

First, there is what a dramatist would call the prologue of the play. The Tichbornes are an old and distinguished family. If you turn to any guide-book of Hampshire you will find that Tichborne Park is supposed to have been in the hands of Tichbornes from before the Conquest; the baronetcy dates from the reign of James I. The estates are valued at some 24,000*l.* a year, though at present heavily mortgaged. In 1854 Sir Edward, who had added the name of Doughty to that of Tichborne, was still alive; but he had no son, and Mr. James Tichborne was his heir. Mr. James Tichborne had married a daughter of Mr. Seymour, who had been born and brought up in France, and who was essentially a Frenchwoman. The marriage was not a very happy one. Mr. Tichborne was apparently a warm-hearted, generous man, but violent in temper; his wife was flighty and eccentric, and inspired by a feeling of intense suspicion and hostility towards her husband's family. Their eldest son, Roger, inherited some of the peculiarities of both parents. He was shy, whimsical, and impulsive, of weak character and moderate intelligence; he had been educated in a loose, patchwork kind of way—first under French tutors, then for three years with the Jesuits at Stonyhurst; and afterwards he had been for three years in the army. In appearance he was slight and somewhat insignificant. Without being a student, he was fond of reading, and had a good stock of general information. His letters show that, when travelling, he liked to look up the history of any place he visited. He spoke French better than English, but he wrote a very fair English letter, and had some knowledge of Latin and natural science. Stonyhurst probably did a good deal to polish him up; but his broken English and certain oddities of manner exposed him to some ridicule when he joined his regiment, the Carabiniers. He was a tempting subject for little jokes, which were sometimes carried too far; but, on the whole, he seems to have been pronounced a good fellow by his companions, and to have passed muster as an efficient, though not a smart, officer. When stationed with his regiment in Ireland, and also during his visits to England, he went a good deal into society, and knew how to bear himself like a gentleman. The domestic storms amid which he had been brought up had left a painful impression on his mind, and he was more at home at his uncle's, with Lady Doughty and his cousin Kate, than with his own parents. He was, after his father, the next heir to the baronetcy, and Sir Edward took a paternal interest in him; but when it was discovered that the cousinly regard between Roger and his daughter was passing into something deeper—at least on Roger's part—Sir Edward strongly discouraged it. He objected to the marriage of cousins, and besides, Roger's character was not yet quite settled enough for him to have full confidence in it. He was young, and certain bad habits, such as drinking too much, might pass away or might be confirmed. It was arranged after a time that if at the end of a year or two there were no other objections to a marriage, that of cousinship should not be pressed. Sir Edward and Lady Doughty showed the utmost affection for their nephew, yet he could not but feel that, even though they might consent to the match, they would prefer that it should not take place. It was under the influence of this disappointment that he threw up his commission and resolved to visit South America. He parted on good terms with all the family, wrote to his mother, aunts, and other friends from different points on his journey, and pressed them to write in reply. He looked forward to returning after a year or two, and desired to have his name put up at the Travellers' Club. He had arrived at Valparaiso in June 1853, had made an expedition to the Cordilleras, and visited Santiago, Buenos Ayres, and other places. From Buenos Ayres he wrote on February 20, 1854, to an intimate friend, Vincent Gosford, still harping on Kate Doughty, deploring the discord in his own home, and congratulating himself on being out of the way for a time now that Sir Edward was dead and that his father had succeeded him. Except for his fears of his cousin's marriage, he wrote in good spirits, and as if enjoying the independence and variety of his life abroad. On March 12 he wrote to Lady Doughty from Monte Video in a similar strain. He was going to Rio, thence up the Amazon, and then to Jamaica and Mexico. He was most anxious for letters, and gave repeated directions where they were to be addressed to him. On April 20 he embarked at Rio in the Bella for New York. Six days afterwards a long-boat, bottom upwards, marked on the stern, in yellow letters, "Bella, of Liverpool," was picked up at sea by a passing vessel, which also, near the same place, fell in with some broken spars, a round-house, and some straw bedding. The owners of the Bella had no doubt that she was lost, with all on board; the underwriters paid the insurance; Roger Tichborne's will was duly proved, and on his father's death, the inheritance passed to his younger brother, Alfred, who also dying in the beginning of 1866, left a posthumous son to enjoy the baronetcy and estates.

Years had passed over without anything occurring to disturb the belief that Roger had perished in the Bella. The Dowager, Roger's mother, was the only person who refused to accept this conclusion. She had, as she said, "a settled presentiment" that he must somehow have been saved, and that she should see him again. She was constantly talking of him, and even started inquiries about him in Australia. Once she questioned a sailor who came begging to Tichborne Park, and who was ready enough to say that he had been in Australia, and had heard of the crew of a ship having been picked up at sea and brought to Melbourne, and that he rather thought the name of the ship was the Bella. After her husband's death she became more anxious and excited on the subject. She advertised for Roger, or for any information as to the crew of the Bella, in the Times and in various Australian and colonial papers. It became a kind of standing joke in the servants' hall, and among the people round Tichborne Park. More than once there was a report that Roger had been found, but nothing ever came of it. She began advertising at least as early as 1863. The advertisements caused a good deal of talk, of course; they were copied into many papers, and gave rise to innumerable paragraphs. In 1865 the Dowager had got into communication with Mr. Cubitt, who had a Missing Friends' Agency in Sydney, and who readily undertook to find the missing man if he was to be found at all. He advertised on his own account in the Australian papers, giving the Dowager's description, only somehow leaving out the word "thin." By a remarkable coincidence, he had no sooner taken the job in hand than an old friend of his at Wagga-Wagga wrote to say that he had "spotted" the man; and immediately the Claimant appears upon the stage. Mr. Gibbs, Cubitt's correspondent at Wagga-Wagga, had there made the acquaintance of a slaughterman who went by the name of Tom Castro, and whose pipe he one day observed bore the initials, scratched on it with a knife, "R. C. T." Mrs. Gibbs had previously called her husband's attention to the advertisements for Roger Charles Tichborne, and Gibbs at once put the two things together. Castro had about the same time been in the habit of cutting the same initials on mantel-pieces and every bit of wood that came in his way. He, too, had previously seen one of the advertisements. A Hampshire man had shown it to him, and may possibly have added some remarks of his own, either as to the old Dowager's notorious craziness on this subject, or as to Castro's likeness in expression or feature to the missing Roger. Castro, having placarded his initials in this conspicuous manner, affected to be very much annoyed that Gibbs should have "spotted" him, but allowed himself to be persuaded that he had better surrender his secret and go back to his mother. It is clear from the correspondence which has been produced in this case that the Dowager communicated a good deal of information about Roger to Cubitt, through whom it may have reached Castro, and also that Castro at first went altogether astray in his demonstration of his identity with Roger. To convince the Dowager, he mentioned two circumstances known only to her and to himself—"the brown mark on my side, and the card case at Brighton." But, as it happened, the brown mark was Castro's exclusive property, Roger never having had anything like it; and as for the card case—referring apparently to a well-known trial for cheating at cards, with which Roger had nothing whatever to do—the Dowager entreates that nothing more may be said about it, as it would turn every one against him. In another letter he asked after Roger's grandfather, who died before he was born. He also said that he had been educated by the Jesuits in Paris, instead of Stonyhurst, and that he had been a private in the Guards for a fortnight. The correspondence shows that the Dowager was constantly pointing out mistakes of this kind; and yet that she was at the same time determined to accept Castro as her son. "You do not tell anything at all about my son," she wrote to Cubitt, "and I hardly know anything at all about the person you suppose to be my son"; yet in the same envelope she encloses a letter to the supposed son, taking him to her heart as her "dearest and beloved Roger," and begging him to come to her. While he is making up his mind, not without much hesitation, whether he should accept her invitation, it may be worth while to observe what sort of reputation, as appears from the evidence taken by the Australian Commission, Tom Castro at this period enjoyed among those who knew him.

He had been for some time at Wagga-Wagga, and was allowed to be a good slaughterman. He was fond of "blowing" or boasting about himself, declaring at one time that his mother was a duchess, and at another time that he was a peer of the realm. Occasionally men came to Wagga-Wagga who had known Castro in other parts. It appears that he had led a wandering and uneasy life, alternating between stock-riding, butchering, and horse-stealing. In Gippsland "he had bought some horses that turned out to be stolen, and he was afraid he could not find the party he bought them of." At Reedy Creek he got into another scrape with horses. Down to this time he was known as Arthur Orton, but he appeared at Wagga-Wagga as Castro. Two of his mates had been hanged; another had been shot by the police; "Ballarat Harry" had been murdered by a friend of his own and Castro's after spending an evening with the latter. A lady, satirically called "Gentle Annie," was also a member of this agreeable society, and lived with Castro before he married. Before 1859 he went by the name of Arthur Orton, Arthur the Butcher, or Big Arthur, and afterwards as Thomas Castro, with a short interval when he borrowed Morgan's name. These circumstances were partially known at Wagga-Wagga, and Castro was naturally annoyed when allusion was made to them. In 1865 his bragging about his family appears to have become more definite and systematic, and he began writing and cutting out the initials "R. C. T." At the time he fell in with Gibbs he was very hard pushed for money. While the Dowager was writing over about the 15,000*l.* a year awaiting her son in England, Castro was begging for a few shillings to save him from destitution. Roger had left a good balance at Glyn's and credit at another house, but Castro could think of no means of procuring a little money except by abject appeals to Gibbs's compassion. If Gibbs could not give him money, would he at least speak to one of the storekeepers to let him have necessities for the house? "I expect," he says, "Mrs. Castro to be confined before Saturday. And believe me Sir I am more like a Manick than a B of B K to think that I should have a child born in such a hovel."

Notwithstanding his desperate circumstances, Castro was in no hurry to accept the Dowager's pressing invitations to help himself to 15,000*l.* a year down, with half as much again in reversion. It was clear from her letters that she was determined to be convinced that he was her son, and that his absurd blunders about the family and about the principal incidents of Roger's career did not disturb her. It is possible that her extraordinary eagerness to adopt a man whom she had never seen, and about whom she knew absolutely nothing, for all information had been withheld, may have suggested a suspicion that she wanted the heir for some purpose of her own and did not care who played the part. "Let him come; I will identify him and it will be all right"—this was the gist of her letters, and a strong desire was also expressed that the discovery of the heir should be kept secret from the family. As she was in this mood, and evidently not disposed to stick at trifles, the Claimant had perhaps some reason to complain that she would not recognize his handwriting at once as that of Roger. "You have caused a deal of trouble," he says, by not identifying the writing; and he hints that unless she does so at once he will stay where he is:—"But it matters not. Has have no wish to leave a country where I enjoy good health I have grow very stout." While in this hesitating mood, he somehow falls in with Guilfoyle, who had been gardener at Tichborne Park, and with Bogle, valet of the late Sir Edward Doughty. From them he might of course learn all about the Dowager's peculiarities, her craze about Roger, her visits to the grounds round Tichborne Park on dark nights with a lantern to guide the long-lost heir if he happened to be there, the lamp set in the window, and the other gossip of the servants' hall. If there was any resemblance between Castro and Roger it would also be remarked. Castro's hesitation is now gradually dissipated. On September 2, 1866, accompanied by his wife and child, and by Bogle, he sailed from Sydney to Panama on his way to England. At Panama he dallied awhile; then he went to New York, where there was another delay, and at last he started for England. Here again, however, he preferred the tedious route by the Thames to the Victoria Docks at Poplar. He arrives on the afternoon of Christmas Day, and almost immediately he hurries off to Weymouth. Muffled up in a large pea-coat, with a wrapper round the lower part of his face, and a peaked cap overshadowing the upper part, he enters the "Hobbs" public-house, makes his way to the bar-parlour like an old acquaintance, and over a glass of cherry questions the landlady about the Ortons. He tries to see one of Arthur Orton's married sisters that night, but she is out; and early next morning, without waiting for breakfast, he is off again to the neighbourhood of Weymouth. He picks up all the information he can get about the Ortons, and sends a letter under an assumed name to one of the married sisters. Afterwards he sent them photographs of himself and of his wife and child as portraits of Arthur Orton and his family, and he also supplied the sisters and a brother with money. The Dowager was impatiently expecting him in Paris, but he was in no hurry to go to her. He avoided all Roger's relatives, and went to Gravesend to be out of their way. Next we have a glimpse of him, under the name of Taylor, hidden in his big muffler and peaked cap, driving round Tichborne Park and studying a catalogue of pictures in the house, with Bogle in attendance. Bogle refreshes his recollection of the house by a visit to it. It was necessary to have an attorney, and, passing by all the legal advisers in any way connected with the Tichborne family, he took one who was introduced to him by a gentleman whom he is said to have met in a billiard-room at London Bridge. At last he felt equal to confronting the Dowager. He reached Paris, accompanied by the attorney and the "mutual friend," at nine o'clock at night, but deferred his visit to his mother till next day. But next day he was so overcome with emotion that he had to send for her to come to him. He then, it is alleged, went to bed, where he anxiously awaited her. It is obvious that bed-curtains, blankets, and the dingy light of a Parisian bedroom are not favourable to the distinct recognition of a doubtful face. We do not know exactly what took place at the interview, but the result was that the Dowager agreed to recognize him. There were many old friends of Roger's in Paris, but none were sent for except Chatillon, who at once pronounced him to be an impostor.

Returning to London, the Claimant began to get up his case. If he had been under the impression that on his identification by the Dowager he would at once step into the enjoyment of a handsome fortune, he discovered his mistake. He must make good his claim at law, and it was necessary to collect evidence. We have seen what blunders he committed about the family affairs in Australia, before he met Bogle. At Wagga-Wagga he had given Gibbs directions to prepare a will disposing of the Tichborne property, not one item of which was stated correctly. The Dowager's Christian names were wrongly given, and the names both of persons and places had nothing whatever to do with the Tichbornes, but oddly enough were associated with Arthur Orton's career. When in London he wrote to Mr. Henry Seymour as "My Dear Uncle," spelling the name "Seymore." Mr. Seymour was, in fact, Roger's uncle, but the relationship was never alluded to between them, the Dowager, Roger's mother and Mr. Seymour's half-sister, having been an illegitimate child. Some of his relations having with great difficulty obtained interviews with him, he took his uncle Nangle's butler, a young man, for his uncle, who is an elderly gentleman; mistook his cousin Kate for another cousin, calling Kate Lucy, and Lucy Kate. On many points, however, he showed an intimate knowledge of the Tichborne affairs, and as time went on he began to talk more freely about them. It happens that there is a great stock of information about the family which is easily accessible. It is an old family with a history, and there is a great deal about it in County Histories, Baronetries, and similar works. There is Roger's will at Doctors' Commons. There have been administrations and various suits in Chancery, and the documents are open to inspection on payment of a small fee. It is certain that Roger kept a diary, and was very particular about preserving accounts and letters; and the Dowager herself was a mine of information. Bogle also knew, as a servant knows, the private history of the family in our own day. Rous, the landlord of the "Swan" at Alresford, had been a clerk to Dunn and Hopkins, the attorneys to the late baronet; and the Claimant quickly established a good understanding with Rous, although it afterwards broke down. With his scraps of information picked up from the Chancery papers and from talk with Rous and Bogle, Hopkins was next angled for and hooked. Then there was Balgent, who at first declared the Claimant to be an impostor, and who suddenly discovered that he was the real man. The adhesion of Miss Braine, who had been Miss Doughty's governess, and of Moore, Roger's servant in South America, were not obtained till 1868. On the 12th of March the Dowager, who had been for some time restless and disturbed, died suddenly. This was so far a loss to the Claimant that it deprived him of the pecuniary help which he had obtained from the old lady, but on the other hand it rendered it impossible that his chief witness should turn against him; and when the Dowager died, she knew nothing of the Wagga-Wagga will, and other remarkable circumstances in the Claimant's career.

Tichborne Park was in 1866, as now, let to Colonel Lushington, and it was in every way a good haul when the Colonel was landed. The Colonel, who had never seen Roger, was mainly induced by the Claimant's recognition of the Dowager's picture, and a stuffed cock pheasant alleged to have been sent home by Roger from South America, and by his intimation that the backs of some mistakes would prove to be gold if scratched. The Claimant had, however, seen the Dowager, and had studied a catalogue of the pictures; the pheasant had not been sent home from America, but was an English bird; and the miniatures had been framed by Baigent, who appears to have mentioned it. Towards the end of February an important auxiliary arrived—this was Carter, an old trooper of the Carabineers, who was henceforward always in attendance on the Claimant. A few weeks later Carter is reinforced by another old soldier who had been Roger's regimental servant—McCann. Previously the Claimant had either shirked or blundered about military matters, and Baigent had never even heard him make an allusion of any kind to his connexion with the army. But now he plunged boldly into Roger's military history, and converted military witnesses by his wonderful knowledge of minute incidents. There were old stories about a horse that killed a trooper, about another trooper who got drunk, about the practical jokes played off on poor Roger, such as "chucking all the things" out of his window and sending a donkey clattering into his bedroom, which he took for the devil; about the two dogs Spring and Piecrust, Mrs. Hay's crow, and so on. He has names, dates, and incidents at his fingers' ends. At first he begins with the privates. Carter spends a day at Sandhurst, standing beer to his former comrades, gossiping with them about old days, and preparing them for a meeting with the Claimant. Separate interviews were arranged; the Claimant received each man as an old friend, went through the familiar stories, hobbled about the room to show that he was in-kneed, and made the most of his assumed French accent. Next there was an expedition to Colchester, with similar proceedings, and after that visits to various barracks in the North of England. Carter was an active missionary; there was plenty of beer flowing, and an occasional distribution of half-crowns. One man brought over another, and the Claimant collected not only witnesses, but information. When he found he had got a good hold on the privates, he tackled the officers, and won over four or five, who had no idea how the twigs had been limed for them. The interviews were always pre-arranged.

As the ball rolled, it gathered bulk. The affidavits of the witnesses who were first secured proved a fruitful nest-egg. They were cleverly concocted and then circulated among people whom it was desired to catch. They were drawn up so as to fasten upon Roger several of the Claimant's peculiarities of expression or feature, and, being unconsciously accepted as evidence of what Roger was like, facilitated the recognition of the Claimant, who was found of course to be very like himself. Then there were little "test" incidents ingeniously contrived. When the Claimant went to Burton Constable, Sir Talbot Constable the first day could not recognize him. The next day the Claimant fired off one or two stories, possibly acquired in the interval from servants or others, about having played in private theatricals at Burton, and handed the wine round when a servant was tipsy, and about an old hedge being cut down; and Sir Talbot gave in. Mr. Biddulph, a second cousin of Roger's, is the only member of the family, with the exception of the Dowager, who has recognized him; and Biddulph has confessed that his opinion was influenced by a story about two death's-head pipes, which might have been known to many persons in the Tichborne household. Colonel Sawyer similarly succumbed to the Claimant's recollection of the Carabineers having been landed at Herne Bay from Dublin. This fact had been got from the War Office. At a railway station the Claimant captured Mr. and Mrs. Deane by going up to them and addressing them by name. They had the instant before been pointed out to him by one of his inseparable attendants. Mrs. Sherstone knew him at once because she has such a faculty for recognizing faces. Mrs. Hussey, who danced with Roger once at a servants' ball when she was fourteen years old, was confident as to his looks twenty years afterwards.

A great body of evidence was thus collected by the end of 1867. There was a sort of grand rehearsal in the examination before Mr. Roupell at the Law Institute; and then the Claimant had four years more to get up more facts, and to study his part, as the actors say. It is true he recollected a great deal of loose odds and ends of information when in the witness-box, but, considering the time he had had for preparation, there was nothing surprising in this. Indeed, the most remarkable feature in the whole affair is that he did not attempt to learn more; to get up a little French, for example, a few facts about Paris and Stonyhurst, some notion of cavalry drill, and so on. His memory, like his French accent, was capricious—sometimes very strong, at other times a blank. He had a distinct recollection of his pipes, of the number on a trooper's horse, of the stag's head and mauve stripes on his shirts and handkerchiefs; but he could remember scarcely anything about his life at Paris, or at Stonyhurst, and only such incidents in his military career as were the common gossip of the barrack-yard. He confounded a troop and a squadron, and did not know the difference between close and open order, or what telling off and proving meant, and he thought the Carabineers were a thousand strong. He had never heard of Lord Fitzroy Somerset. Roger had some knowledge of Latin, and the Claimant thought Cæsar was in Greek. He was sure he learned Hebrew at Stonyhurst, where no Hebrew was taught. Roger was fond of music and could play the horn; the Claimant, when shown some music, and asked why the horn was written in such a key and the pianoforte in three flats, said it was because the horn could not get down to the flats. The Claimant pronounced the Dowager's name Felicite. The letters of Roger and the Claimant in handwriting, composition, and grammar are as different as letters can be. His story of the shipwreck of the Bella, and his escape with eight others in a boat, was absurd and contradictory. No survivor of the Bella has ever turned up. Neither the captain nor any of the crew of the vessel which he said picked them up can be discovered. First he said it was the Oprey, a Scotch schooner, then the Themia, and then again he tried back to another Oprey. The Chili Commission proved that, whereas Tichborne was not known, Arthur Orton was known to the people whom the Claimant had mentioned as his friends at Melipilla. The Chili Commission taken in connexion with the Australian Commission and other evidence would seem to point to the Claimant as being Arthur Orton, but who he is of no practical importance if he is not Roger.

As to Roger's appearance at the time he left England there is a substantial agreement in the different portraits. His friends generally describe him as a slight, dark, pale man, with a soft melancholy eye, with thin, straight, very dark brown, almost black, hair, and with large and rather bony hands. His mother adds some flattering but fanciful touches, that he was tall and had blue eyes. General Custance's picture is in another style:—"A little, wretched, unwholesome-looking young man, about 5 ft. 6 in., or at most 5 ft. 7 in., very pale, thin, and dirty-looking, and apparently not likely to grow." The General's picture is perhaps too harsh, but we suspect it is nearer the truth than the more complimentary likeness. Roger was rather a weak, insignificant youth. When he first joined the regiment he was so under-sized and odd-looking, and talked so curiously in his French way, that the Colonel thought he must have come to see the cook, and directed an orderly to conduct him to the kitchen. He had to explain that he had come to see the Colonel and not the cook. It is possible that there really was a stronger resemblance in expression, if not in feature, between Roger and the Claimant than the counsel for the defence were willing to admit. But the physical evidence against the Claimant was overwhelming. It is possible that a man might increase in bulk, so that, having been once slender as Roger, he should become gross and ponderous as the Claimant; but the latter is an inch or more taller than Roger, who was twenty-four when he left England—an age at which men cease to grow in height. His head is larger; Roger's helmet, which was too loose for him, and had to be padded with a newspaper, was a painfully tight fit for the Claimant. Roger's hair was straight and lank; the Claimant's is curly. Roger's ears adhered to the side of his head; the Claimant's ears are dependent and free, with large lobes. Apart from the disputed scars on the Claimant's left foot, he has no marks of having been bled at all; but Roger was frequently bled on account of asthma. Roger's arm was elaborately tattooed, first by a sailor, who pricked out the emblems of Faith, Hope, and Charity, and afterwards by Lord Bellew, a schoolfellow, who added a cable and "R. C. T." On neither of the Claimant's arms are there any tattoo marks, though there is a mark at the wrist which it has been suggested might be a tattoo of "A. O." burned out. It will occur to every one that if the Court could have insisted upon beginning with a physical examination of the Claimant there would at once have been an end of the case, and that three instead of one hundred and three days would then have been sufficient to dispose of it. As it was, the jury could come to no other conclusion than that the claim had broken down, while the Judge had no alternative but to commit Thomas Castro to Newgate.

NEWSPAPER DECORUM.

WE are, as is well known, an admirable people; and, if we have a strong point, it is the deep respect which we always entertain for that great safeguard of public morality which we call decorum, and which our French friends, by a slight perversion of the meaning of the word, describe as cant. As it is undeniable that we possess this virtue, by whatever name it may be called, we are of course quite right in giving heaven thanks for it as often and as publicly as possible. A man may sometimes be excused for hiding his light under a bushel, because a judicious display of modesty is frequently the best mode of extorting praise from our neighbours; but if as a nation we do not blow our own trumpet, we may be quite certain that nobody will take the trouble to blow it for us. Let us therefore rejoice with all due complacency that we are not as the Americans. Their newspapers pander to the curiosity of the many-headed beast by trespassing on the privacies of life, and publishing to all the world details which are rightly excluded from our admirable press. It should be our proud boast that our journals, like our novels, may be read from the top of the first column to the foot of the last—always excepting certain advertisements—without calling up a blush to the cheeks of virgins or boys, and without unnecessarily dragging into daylight matters which are not of public right. The British press should be, and of course it is, in this as in every other respect, the pride and envy of the world. But at the same time, for, alas! there are "buts" to every positive assertion—it must not be forgotten that even Englishmen are men. Newspapers must be more or less amusing, and cannot entirely deprive themselves of that great source of amusement which is derived from our criminal jurisprudence. The publicity of our trials is, we believe, one of the numerous palladiums of our liberties; and the more public they are, the more thoroughly, of course, will our liberties be secured. But, independently of constitutional considerations, no philanthropist could wish to set down materially the reports which rivet the attention of a whole nation. It is undoubtedly a pity that there should be murders, adulteries, and disputes as to the ownership of large property; but as human nature is constituted we may be pretty certain that there will be an abundant supply of such incidents; and perhaps people who delight to trace the natural chemistry by which some good is distilled from the greatest evils will regard the pleasure given to the public as some set-off against the injury inflicted upon individuals. Compare, for example, the pleasure caused by the feuilleton in a French newspaper with the pleasure given by a really good crime in England. The fiction endeavours to interest people by glowing pictures of imaginary vice; and it possibly succeeds in amusing, if not in instructing, a large number of intelligent persons. The fact, on the other hand, may be far less artistically composed, and may be deficient in many elements of dramatic interest. But the magic of reality invests the dull, blundering criminal with a charm absolutely unrivalled by the most vivid hero of fiction. The most thrilling narrative of Balzac or Sue or Dumas, to say nothing of their humbler British imitators, is wearisome if set beside the true story of some flesh-and-blood ruffian with just enough originality to knock out somebody's brains on a slightly new plan. His performance gives pleasure to thousands of breakfast-tables, and provides entertaining reading on Sunday mornings for hundreds of thousands of intelligent working-men. Dickens was a popular writer, but he never commanded an audience to be compared in numbers with those which have hung over the minutest details of the deeds of our great practical artists in crime, nor did his readers follow his most thrilling narratives with the same absorbing interest. The novelist, it is true, has the advantage in the long run; but whilst, if we may so speak, the scent of blood is yet fresh or the mystery still unravelled, the worker in fact hopelessly distances the worker in fiction. And, therefore, if we consider the quantity without paying too much attention to the quality of the emotion, it is perhaps disputable whether the pleasure which, thanks to the newspapers, is the indirect result of a great crime does not frequently outweigh the pain which is its immediate consequence. We leave some inferences from this fact to be considered by utilitarian moralists, and are content with observing that our unrivalled system of reporting trials may be regarded as in some degree compensating our newspapers for the bonds of decorum which elsewhere restrain their energies. It would be wrong for them to regale their readers by imaginary vice; but they are both discharging a great public duty and appealing to a stronger interest when they give the fullest details of a real atrocity.

There are, however, certain limits, not altogether easy of definition, within which their energies should be restrained. It has been felt, for example, that matters occasionally transpire in the Divorce Court upon which it is not desirable to afford the widest possible publicity; and we are glad that reticence in such matters is more generally practised than of old. There is another class of cases in which our laudable practice produces individual hardships too great to be compensated even by the public amusement. When, for example, an attempt is made to extort money by threats of exposing the past circumstances of a woman's life, the public may possibly enjoy the scandal; but it is an enjoyment of which anybody with a relic of manly feeling would be heartily ashamed, and certainly it is not one which he would accept at the price of being made more or less the accomplice of the extortioner. The public interest is not that wings should be given to the scandal, but that it should be kept within the narrowest possible limits compatible with the ends of justice. Even if the alleged facts are true, or partly true, the public has no claim to know them. It seems monstrous enough that the whole newspaper-reading population should be invited to discuss whether or not a woman has always led a virtuous life. It is all the harder because, even if the accusation be utterly false, there is always a chance that some of the mud so thrown may stick. Cases of intolerable hardship frequently occur where the vilest accusations are made against character which, from their very nature, are incapable of being decisively answered. The question is simply whether A. is guilty of some infamous vice or B. is a perjurer; and very often no testimony is available except that of the accuser and the accused. People to whom the characters are well known may form some probable conjectures; but the general public, to whom A. and B. are nothing but A. and B., can only make a guess in the dark. In all such cases it would seem plain enough that every care should be taken not to give premature or unnecessary publicity to the accusation. The pain inflicted is in any case enormous: it may be inflicted on a perfectly innocent person; and, moreover, it may operate in favour of the worst criminals. A villain who attempts to extort money by a false accusation—a crime which is frequently more morally detestable than even a murder—counts upon the unwillingness of his victim to have a public inquiry which will be painful, whatever its ultimate results. To give unnecessary publicity to the inquiry is therefore to put a new weapon into the hands of the vilest of human beings, and to enable them to give another turn of the screw to the person under torture. We fully believe that many a sensitive woman would rather buy off a villain at any price than submit to the misery of having it published in every newspaper in England that an imputation had been made upon her virtue. We should not favour a man who could make such an imputation unnecessarily, even if it were true; still less should we help him to trade upon it; and, as no punishment could be too severe for the abandoned scoundrel who would try to trade upon a false imputation, no care can be too great to avoid putting additional weapons into his hands.

For these tolerably obvious reasons, we have been very unpleasantly impressed by a case to which we shall not refer more particularly; though, from the care taken by the leaders of public opinion, we cannot suppose that many of our readers are ignorant of its savoury details. It has, however, revealed a state of the law and of the press to which attention may properly be called. In the first place, it seems that it is possible for a man to go before a magistrate, and without reference to any legal proceedings, to make a declaration quite promiscuously to certain facts which would be destructive of a lady's character. This appears to us to be a very singular arrangement. At the simple cost of liability to a prosecution, which in many cases may be a very remote risk, a man may gratify his malice or his avarice by putting upon record, with or without provocation, a solemn declaration that a woman is unchaste. We are quite unable to see what end can be served by allowing a certain official stamp to be placed upon the gravest accusations which, even if true, do not form part of any judicial proceedings. There are circumstances under which it may be necessary to take a man's evidence on such matters; but that he should be allowed to volunteer such a statement without rhyme or reason, just because he likes to make it, is opposed to all one's ordinary notions of English justice. So far as appears, we may any of us now walk off to the nearest police-court, and make a solemn exposure of the worst things we choose to say about our neighbours' lives, to which they can only reply by bringing an action for libel against us. But this evil is comparatively small in itself; as it does not appear that the declaration so made would necessarily be known to many people. We provide any intending extortioner of hushmoney with a convenient mode of recording his calumnies, but we do not give him the widest possible circulation. That kind office has been on the present occasion undertaken by the Times, which, in the case to which we refer, publishes at length the declaration in question. Surely this, if we put the best construction upon it, is a very cruel oversight. It may gratify the prurient tastes of some readers to know precisely what is the imputation which has been made upon a lady's character, but meanwhile it is placing her in a most painful position without the smallest necessity. It is giving every possible publicity and currency to an accusation which may turn out to be entirely false, but which, meanwhile, may probably make upon many people an impression hard to be removed, even by the clearest refutation. Of the merits of the particular case we can, of course, say nothing. It matters nothing for our present purpose who may be in the right as to the facts. But, according to the present system, it seems that a sufficiently unscrupulous man, who sees his way to concocting a tolerably coherent story against a woman, may threaten her with making a declaration before a magistrate, which will be published to the whole world and read on half the breakfast-tables of the United Kingdom before she has had any opportunity of making a defence. Without wishing to deprive anybody of a harmless amusement, we may safely say that this is a means of offence which can obviously be turned to the worst purposes, and we regret that a leading newspaper should by any inadvertence permit its columns to be made in any degree subservient to it. We indeed are sufficiently prudish to be very little edified by the completeness with which the evidence in the case has been reported by the press generally. The declaration seems to be a wanton aggravation of the evil; but that is a detail. If a man make a grievous imputation upon a woman's character, it is highly desirable that he should be punished if it is false, and a certain amount of publicity is necessary. But surely it is a case of all others where, under any circumstances, the publicity should be restrained within the narrowest limits. To give all the details of the accusation at full length can serve no possible purpose that we see, except gratifying a prurient curiosity. It is an unmanly action to take away a woman's character without imperative necessity, and those who spread the accusation as widely as possible are substantially allies of the man who originated it.

THE CATHOLIC MOVEMENT IN BAVARIA.

FOR many reasons, with which our readers will by this time be familiar, the Catholic reaction against the Vatican Council finds its head-quarter in Bavaria. As a writer in the Allgemeine Zeitung the other day observed:—"The movement has no longer to seek for its natural centre; it has already found it in the Bavarian capital. Here for the moment it stands before the doors of a Church corresponding to its requirements within the State. It rests with the Government to open those doors: it was prudent not to do so earlier, but to keep them shut any longer would show a want of insight." In Austria, for some unexplained reason, the Government appears to have betrayed this want of insight, if we may credit a recent announcement that no civil validity will be accorded to the acts of Old Catholic priests. On the other hand, in Prussia, Prince Bismarck, who has never proved himself a religious partisan, and has certainly manifested no hostility to the Roman Catholic Church as such, has been forced by political exigencies into an intestine conflict with Ultramontanism, and there, as in Bavaria, the opposite party in the Church have every likelihood of being allowed fair play. The autograph letter of congratulation sent to Dr. Dollinger last week on the occasion of his seventy-third birthday may be taken to indicate the friendly feeling entertained for him by his Sovereign; and the overflowing attendance at his lectures on the Reunion of the Churches, now in course of delivery at Munich, to which we shall have to refer again presently, sufficiently testifies to his continued influence and popularity. There is, however, further evidence of a more precise and statistical kind to the advance of the movement in the country, which is worth recording. The general establishment of Committees, and, wherever required, of religious congregations (Gemeinde) of Old Catholics, was the twofold object of the organization set on foot by the Munich Congress of last September. And the latter part of the programme was of course sure to be the most difficult in itself to carry out, while moreover it necessarily in each instance presupposes the former. These ecclesiastical communities, with a local home and a regular pastorate, could not in Germany be organized without the sanction of the Government; and there would be no means, nor indeed any adequate ground, for taking such a step in the absence of a considerable body of warm adherents of the movement. It is just in this crucial point, however, that it has attained a great and probably unexpected success. Let us mention a few examples.

At Cologne, as our readers are already aware, two churches have been placed at the disposal of the Old Catholics, who have obtained one at Bonn also. But to come to Bavaria. Congregations have, it appears, been formed at Nuremberg and Ratisbon, two of the principal cities, and the latter the see of the most violent of the German infallibilist bishops. At Amberg, in the centre of what is considered a peculiarly Ultramontane province, the burial of an Old Catholic citizen, Zunner by name, solemnized by Professor Friedrich, was attended by an immense concourse of all classes, while the address got up by the clergy as a counter demonstration was very scantily signed, and chiefly by persons who were evidently not accustomed to write their names. The country people are always held up by the Ultramontane organs as the firmest pillars of Papal orthodoxy; but at the villages of Tegernsee, Grating, and Sachseum, the discourses of the Alt-katholik leaders were received with enthusiastic tokens of sympathy. More important is the recent establishment of an Old Catholic congregation with a regular pastor at Kempten, a town of 2,000 inhabitants, in the heart of a district where the resistance of the people to the new dogma seems to be both general and of a very determined character. At Munich the pastoral charge has been entrusted by the Local Committee to a priest named Haasler, formerly chaplain at Ziegenhals, as the needs of the congregation had quite outgrown the zealous but necessarily irregular ministrations of Dr. Friedrich and others, who could not devote their whole time to the work. A request has also been preferred for the use of a second church within the city, as the little chapel on the banks of the Isar, which has been occupied for the last four months, is greatly overcrowded on all Sundays and festivals, besides the inconvenience of its remote situation, though no obstacles of weather or distance have at all cooled the zeal of the increasing band of worshippers. At Mering and Kirfersfelden, the parish priests who, together with their people, have openly repudiated the new dogmas, remain in undisputed possession of their churches and endowments, but the "New Catholics," as they are now called in Germany, are allowed the use of the church at certain hours. It is impossible to measure the full strength and extent of the opposition in Munich till the use of some large church in the city is secured to them, and, after the express declarations of the Government assuring them of the fullest recognition and protection by the State, as Catholics, it can hardly be doubted that so reasonable a demand will be speedily complied with. Already two of the most powerful corporations in the State—the University and the magistracy—are acknowledged representatives of the Opposition. It is of course freely objected by the adverse party that, after all, the movement is no more than a tempest in a teacup, and will be powerless, as Dr. Newman said some years ago of the Tractarian movement in England, to stir the huge inert mass of the Church and the dead weight of compact obstruction presented by the hierarchy. But to this there is the obvious reply that, to adopt the phrase of an intelligent observer on the spot, "the vast net in which the movement is intended to be stifled in the bud has a good many holes in it." There are, he adds, and his statement is no doubt true beyond the limits of Bavaria, abundant symptoms of a forced and unnatural acquiescence among the general body, who as yet make no outward sign of dissent. And we may add that there are not wanting signs of an equally unwilling and merely formal and provisional submission among the bishops of the minority, who have managed somehow or other to patch up their quarrel with Rome for the present. The sole consideration which exercised any control over the headstrong obstinacy of the dominant faction at the Vatican Synod, but which also again and again induced the bishops of the Opposition to hold their hand, was the dread of schism. And from the first the keener and bolder spirits in the minority perceived that to this, if they were in earnest, it must come at last unless the Curia would yield. Even during the early months of the Council Dr. Friedrich had plainly told his friends in Rome that it would not be the first or the second time a schism had been found the only remedy for the wounds of the Church, and that if the contest against Curialism and Jesuitism was really to be carried on, a temporary schism was the inevitable result. To this it has already come in Germany, and the example seems not unlikely to be followed elsewhere.

They, however, they defend the policy of a temporary schism, the Alt-katholiken have always professed their interest in the cause of Christian union, and their conviction that it would in the long run be promoted rather than endangered by the present struggle. And in this sense we interpret the remarkable series of lectures which Dr. Döllinger has for some weeks past been engaged in delivering at Munich, an English translation of which, as we are glad to observe, is advertised to appear shortly by Messrs. Rivingtons. They have been addressed on successive Wednesdays to an unusually numerous audience in the great hall of the Museum, and are pretty fully reported every week in the Allgemeine Zeitung. A very brief notice of the main points touched upon is all we can find room for here. The opening lecture gives minute statistics of the present divisions of the Christian world, with an account of the numbers and leading characteristics of the various component elements of which it is made up. In his second address the lecturer gives a similar analysis of the condition and prospects of the different sections of the heathen world, and of the missionary enterprises, both Catholic and Protestant, for their conversion, which he regards as at best very partial and unsatisfactory, and that in great measure owing to the disunion among Christians. He therefore concludes by entreating all who love the name of Christ to pray daily for an outpouring of the spirit of Peace, that a new Pentecost of harmony and enlightenment may be celebrated throughout Christendom. In the third lecture Dr. Döllinger returns to the religious controversies among Christians, with the aim of discriminating disputes about essential dogmas from disputes about matters of opinion, and he dwells at some length on the great schism of so many centuries standing between the Eastern and Western Churches. The fourth lecture, which must have been peculiarly interesting to such an audience, contains a vivid sketch of the German Reformation, and does ample justice to the "surpassing greatness of mind and marvellous many-sidedness of Luther, which made him the man of his age and his people." The split between the adherents of the old and new learning only widened with time, and it was not till the end of the seventeenth century that the centrifugal force of the Protestant movement had spent itself, and men on both sides began in earnest to look about them for the means of reconciliation. The fifth lecture is devoted to a review of the principal attempts which have been made in that direction, especially those connected with the names of Calixtus, Grotius, Bossuet, and Leibnitz, and the irenic policy of Innocent XI. The lecturer speaks hopefully of the future, and observes that, wherever he looks, and especially in Germany and England, he sees signs of a reaction towards unity. A sixth and last lecture is promised to be delivered on Wednesday next, with immediate reference to the religious phenomena of England. We are not, it must be remembered, engaged now in reviewing Dr. Döllinger's lectures, but are simply calling attention to them, and to the impression they are producing in Germany, in connexion with the movement of which he is the acknowledged leader. One rather important corollary would seem to follow naturally, if not necessarily, from the line of argument pursued, and is indeed expressly affirmed by other writers on the same side. The view is evidently spreading among the theologians of the party that none of the mediæval Councils, held after the division of East and West had been consummated, can be regarded as Ecumenical in the strict sense of the word, and that the Christian Church can only be reunited on the basis of the faith previously agreed upon, which must form the starting-point for any future developments. This is expressly stated in Professor Friedrich's Tagebuch, and is said to be maintained or certainly implied in the language of some leading bishops of the minority—Archbishop Kenrick for one. We are not of course concerned here to discuss the theological merits of the question. But it is obvious on the face of it what a powerful solvent the acceptance of such a principle would apply to a great deal of the popular belief and practice of Roman Catholic countries. And it is in such popular traditions, far more than in their dogmatic standards, that the chief grounds of antagonism between rival religious communions are usually to be sought.

IMPERIALISM WHITEWASHED.

IMPERIALISM has been put on its trial at Rouen in the person of the Count Janvier de la Motte, ex-Prefect of the Eure, and has been—shall we say honourably?—acquitted. We do not fancy that M. Thiers and his Republic will have much reason to congratulate themselves on the result of this experiment. M. Thiers, who boasted the other day of his years and experience, should certainly know his countrymen by this time. It may be assumed that he had a purpose in bringing a representative scamp of the Empire to the bar of public opinion, and that purpose can scarcely have been other than to discredit Imperial institutions. He bestowed himself in the midst of more important business to distract the defaulting official in his Swiss exile, and reclaim him for French justice in virtue of extradition treaties. He excluded him in an eight months' confinement while preparing the process that was to ensure his condemnation. He arraigned him at last on a series of apparently most damaging charges; conjured up a formidable cloud of highly respectable witnesses; flooded the full light of publicity upon a variety of scandalous and mischievous facts; naturally court the darkness. Enough has been advanced on all hands to cover with disgrace the official and moral character of the Emperor, according to our narrow legal notions. Yet M. de la Motte has been unanimously acquitted by the jury amidst general applause.

and leaves the Court "without a stain upon his character." We do not say that political opponents will fail to hold him up to contempt and execration, or to draw political lessons and moral warnings from his story. Very likely there will be social precursors and Pharisees to brand him as a representative of the sinners who have called down judgment on France. But there is not the least reason to suppose that he will in any way lose caste in consequence of the recent unpleasant disclosures. It is sufficiently clear that those who used to admire and associate with him, in spite of the immorality he paraded, will continue to hold him in as high esteem as ever; that misdemeanours which our criminal judges call by ugly names will be cancelled by a set-off of his brilliant gifts and his official merits; in short, that his public errors will be condoned, as inherent to a system that suits the people, while they throw his personal virtues into brighter relief. M. Janvier de la Motte evidently expected as much, and bore himself accordingly. Eight months of prison following on official destitution and exile had neither broken his spirit nor made his conscience unduly sensitive. At the bar of Rouen he carried himself erect as in the halls of his official residence at Evreux, and the prisoner preserved all the dignity of the Prefect. He knows his countrymen better than the veteran statesman who provisionally regulates their destinies. He has been moving with the age ever since he entered public life. He served his apprenticeship to statesmanship in the school of the Empire. The Empire made it its business to study the masses whom it ruled, to promote their prosperity, to pander to their weaknesses, to distract their fancies—at once to serve, to guide, and to dazzle them. M. de la Motte knew very well that he was not an ordinary culprit. Slightly to parody words placed on a memorable occasion in the mouth of his late master, he represents a system and a cause, a success and a defeat. M. Thiers's Government singled him out for exposure and retribution as representing resuscitated Imperialism. He was sensible of the honour, and accepted the challenge. He had a right to be proud of the implied distinction. Whether he had done all that he was charged with, or the half of it, he had only strained his powers within the limits of a judicious discretion, and acted as the most energetic and able of his confrères. So, in fact, said no less a personage than M. Thiers's Minister of Finance, and we at least are quite ready to believe it. M. de la Motte comprehended instinctively the principles of Imperialism, and had all the qualities to put them in successful practice. He entered on his political apprenticeship in the sub-Prefecture of Dieppe. Even in that modest station he found means of recommending himself to those whose business it was to develop serviceable talent. His first promotion fully justified the good opinion of his superiors, and procured him yet higher preferment. Although not a Prefecture of the first or second rank, the Eure was an important and delicate post. It contained a large and unusually intelligent Liberal element strongly disaffected to the Empire, and was moreover exceptionally exposed to Bourbon and Orleanist influences. An Imperial prefect had no need to make enemies in the Eure. He was sure to find hostile critics in abundance. The various ingenious methods of cooking official accounts would of course remain strictly family secrets, and the Conseil Général that passed the bills would be composed of staunch partisans of the ruling powers; but the outlay generally, the pomp, parade, and costly festivities, would be matter of public observation, while private irregularities far less flagrant than those imputed to M. de la Motte would be discussed and exaggerated by the gossip of a provincial town. Yet, such as he was, M. de la Motte gained an extraordinary popularity, and even the recent disclosures do not seem in any degree to have alienated the sympathies of his late subjects. We are told that he was regarded as a victim and a martyr—the victim of his own brilliant qualities and genial vices, a martyr to the political strategy of a precocious Government. The leading magnates of the department, cited as witnesses against him, seldom missed an opportunity of putting in a good word in his favour, and now that he is restored to liberty, they will no doubt associate with him on the old friendly terms. So we may fairly come to the conclusion that, according to French ideas, M. de la Motte is a model magistrate, and we may draw the inevitable conclusion as to the form of government that is best suited to his country.

It is a strange picture that we get of society in the department of the Eure under Imperial institutions and M. Janvier de la Motte. Work and waste went hand in hand at the Prefecture, and energy continually exerting itself could afford to indulge in occasional excess. The model prefect is represented as showing a sublime disregard for decency, worthy of the most autocratic voluptuary that ever filled a throne. His amours are described as promiscuous and ostentatious. Not content with perpetual visits to the capital, where he was as conspicuous in certain circles as any patron of the opera balls, he established in the Prefecture ornaments of the Parisian stage and ballet, and played the Don Juan in Evreux as well. As for his debts, they were on the scale that might have been expected from his magnificent tastes and extravagant pleasures. He owed money everywhere, and borrowed down to the most paltry sums in the most unlikely quarters. He dealt with the public funds as freely as if they had been his own. He himself pleads guilty to what we should call falsifying his accounts in all manner of ways; or, rather he avows it, for he admits no guilt in the matter. It was all an understood thing. He was supporting the dignity of the Empire, and studying the interests of the department, in the exercise of his official duties.

Levish display tended to secure public contentment and the stability of the dynasty; gold sown broadcast in works of public utility returned twentyfold to the department. And from the point of view that was justified by precedent and prevailing practice, it may be admitted that there is much in what he alleges. He was absolutely free from prejudice in the choice of his means, and something less than accurate in financial details; but, broadly speaking, he justified the confidence of his superiors. He spent freely, for the public as well as for himself; certainly he saved nothing. He developed the riches of his province, and converted the fluctuating mass of its sentiment to Imperialism. He appears to have been as generous to the poor as to himself, although he is accused of having borrowed from them in a time of dire necessity. He opened roads and built bridges that raised the value of land; he promoted the agricultural and horticultural exhibitions that have made the fortunes of farmers and gardeners in the Eure. He conciliated the aristocracy, created loyal enthusiasm among the people, preserved the public tranquillity, and pleased all parties. If every agent of the Bonapartes had carried out the Imperial programme with equal judgment, the Emperor might probably now have had a roof over his head at St. Cloud, instead of languishing in exile at Ohlschurst. For M. de la Motte was a man of indefatigable spirit as well as of iron frame. He went about his official business with even greater energy than about his pleasures. If he delighted in dissipation, it never dulled his faculties or interfered with his doing his master's work. He was a thoroughly enlightened administrator, and it was not only in moral questions that he set alight store by old-fashioned ideas. He had the reverential confidence of the rural mayors and the peasants; he won the respectful consideration of the commercial centres. He was half-fellow well-met alike with long-descended nobles, self-made men, and rustic clodhoppers, preserving all the time his own dignity and that of his master. For, with all his urbanity, M. de la Motte stood no nonsense. He suppressed journals, repressed the factions, put the maires and curés in training, and taught them, with their flocks and their villages, to answer the word of command with servile obedience. It would seem that the French like this sort of thing. They feel gratitude as well as respect for the man who can drive a team so queer with a hand at once firm and gentle; who will let them have their heads so long as they keep his road, but holds them well together in spite of themselves, and will suffer them neither to bolt nor to stumble.

Adroit, able, and brilliant as he was, surely M. de la Motte's official career would have been an impossibility in any country but France. The most painful and significant part of the story is the general tone of morality which it shows. No wonder that his "indiscretions" are regarded with leniency, when so many people of all ranks were found to make themselves his accomplices. For in every case where he confesses to a fabrication of accounts one or more persons besides himself were in the secret. Some of them were subordinate officials, whose careers might have been blighted by a single word from their master. It is natural, perhaps, that they should not have presumed to a virtue greater than his, but it is significant at the same time that he should have dared to admit so many of them to his secrets. It showed that neither he nor they believed he was placing himself in their power. Moreover, many of his accomplices were men of independent position. Yet they, no less than errant aeronauts, conservators of botanical gardens, and managers of theatres, all consented to forward the Prefect's designs on the purse which it was his business to protect. There were besides a perfect host of farmers, tradespeople, carriers, gardeners, common labourers, who were made privy to as many misdemeanours, and became parties to what we should regard as criminal offences in obedience to his simple order. We have no means of judging how far M. de la Motte may have corrupted society, or how far the easy tone of society carried M. de la Motte into pushing his moral liberty to license. We may reasonably suppose that a department is not to be utterly demoralized in a few years, and that he found in the Eure a soil exceptionally favourable to the growth of the seed he sowed. We may presume that this sort of thing has been going on generally over France during the two decades of the Empire. Of such men were the Empire, and such were its morals. M. Thiers has chosen to bring it to the bar of opinion, and opinion seems to pronounce decidedly in its favour.

INFANT LIFE PROTECTION.

THE practice which is commonly called baby-farming was investigated last Session by a Committee of the House of Commons, which produced a blue-book of formidable size; and Mr. Charley, who was an active member of that Committee, has introduced a Bill founded on its recommendations, which is as innocent as any child, and promises to introduce a Bill on the cognate subject of bastardy, which is perhaps questionable. We must allow that Mr. Charley can quote evidence from the blue-book in support of an alteration of the law of bastardy, but there would be little difficulty in producing evidence on the other side. The Treasurer of the Foundling Hospital thinks that magistrates have been rather too stringent in the proof they have required of the liability of the father of a bastard; but lawyers who practice before magistrates know that the odds are in favour of an affiliation summons succeeding. Cases frequently occur of married men who have lived many years without reproach being called upon to most charges of this kind. There is a man's oath against a girl's, and there is also the requirement of corroboration of the girl in some material particular by another witness, which the law imposes and which magistrates are often inclined to fritter away. It is possible that the champions of woman's rights may take this matter up, and ally themselves with Mr. Charley; and if by such a combination of force the present bastardy law should be relaxed, the consequences to mankind will be serious. Respectability will be no protection whatever against these allegations, for when a girl resolves on perjury, she usually selects a victim who can pay.

The Bill for the better protection of infant life provides that a baby-farmer must take out a licence, which may be granted by a magistrate on a certificate to be given by a magistrate, minister of religion, or medical practitioner. The certificate must state that the person signing it has "personally investigated" the character and fitness of the applicant. We do not perhaps quite understand what is meant by "personally investigating" a woman's character, but if we do, we should think that men in general would feel disposed to decline the duty, particularly if, under Mr. Charley's other Bill, there might be a temptation to the woman to allege that during the process of investigation she became a mother. The Bill for protecting infants is a poor little Bill, and it was feebly introduced. There is to be no charge for the licence to keep a baby-farm, because, as Mr. Charley says, the exaction of a fee might tend to deprive the children of "many little luxuries," which he seems to suppose they usually enjoy. The Bill is not to apply to "homes or public orphanages established for the protection of infants," although we do not see how any distinction is to be drawn between a "home" and an ordinary baby-farm, where of course the comforts of a home are provided. Mr. Squeers said of Dotheboys Hall, "the fact is it ain't a hall," and probably nobody who sent a child there supposed that it was. When "the comforts of a home" are offered at a cheap advertising school, we understand what is meant. Any keeper of a baby-farm may call it a "home," and the statement that it "protected" infants as effectually as Mr. Charley's Bill would not perhaps be easy to refute. If any child dies in a licensed baby-farm, there must be a medical certificate that the death arose from "natural causes," or an inquest must be held. But in truth the causes of death at these receptacles are almost always "natural." The child is separated from its mother and kept in bad air on insufficient food, and a large percentage of children so treated die. The baby-farmers know their business far too well to accelerate incautiously the operation of the "natural" causes which tend to remove natural children from a world where their presence is inconvenient. Of course, if the babies are made to partake too largely of the "little luxury" which is vulgarly called "quietness," a coroner's inquest may help to bring the baby-farmer to deserved punishment. But we hardly see how the State can enforce the adequate feeding of nobody's children, except by feeding them itself, which would amount to an encouragement of illegitimate intercourse of the sexes. The House of Commons not inappropriately discussed on the same day with this Bill the question whether the mixing of water with milk should be punished as adulteration. Unless Government is to appoint inspectors of pap-boats we fear that Mr. Charley's well-meant efforts will be ineffectual. It appears from the evidence taken by the Committee that there are in all parts of London a large number of private houses used as lying-in establishments where women are confined. When the infants are born some few of them may be taken away by their mothers; but if they are to be "adopted," as is usually the case, the owner of the establishment receives for the adoption a sum of money, sometimes as little as 5*l.*, sometimes as much as 50*l.* or 100*l.*, according to the means of the person who goes to be confined. The infant is then removed to the worst class of baby-farming houses under an arrangement with the lying-in establishments, by which the owners of the baby-farming houses are remunerated, either by a small round sum which is totally inadequate to the permanent maintenance of the child, or by a small weekly payment which is supposed to cover all expenses. In the former case there is obviously every inducement to get rid of the child; and even in the latter case, unless the mother should come to look after it, which she seldom does, improper and insufficient food, opiates, drugs, crowded rooms, bad air, want of cleanliness, and wilful neglect are sure to be followed in a few months by diarrhoea, convulsions, and wasting away. This is the substance of the description given of baby-farming in the Report. The children born in lying-in establishments and removed to baby-farms are usually illegitimate. The burden of supporting these children may be imposed upon the father, or the mother, or the community. Make the father pay by all means if you can catch him. But if you press upon the mothers they will be irresistibly tempted to relieve themselves by falsely affiliating their children upon men who are able to maintain them. The third alternative is opposed by prevailing feeling; and yet if we cannot make up our minds to maintain bastards, it is idle to complain that they are allowed to starve. The objection to any effectual measure would be something similar in character to that which has been urged against the Contagious Diseases Act. It would be said that the State was encouraging immorality. But if an effectual measure cannot be passed, that is no reason why Mr. Charley should propose a measure which must necessarily be ineffectual. The Committee recommended a compulsory registration of all births and deaths, and we are told that the Government contemplated introducing a measure with that object. Supposing it to be enacted and enforced, the children must, on failure of their parents' means, be supported either at parochial or national expense. At present no account is taken of these children, and 70, 80, or even 90 per cent. of them die from crime or neglect. Crime, however, is rare, while neglect is almost invariable; and from the two causes bastards are, as a witness puts it broadly, "killed off" before they are a year old. The Committee further recommended an inspection of lying-in establishments; but Mr. Charley tells us that so much difficulty existed in framing a provision for that purpose, that it had been determined not to embody that recommendation in the Bill. He did not explain what the difficulty was, and we should think that such a measure might reasonably accompany that for compulsory registration. If it is intended that illegitimate children shall continue to be "killed off" quickly, Mr. Charley's pretence of doing something may usefully conceal a determination to do nothing.

"The Christian, the philanthropist, and the legislator" are supposed by Mr. Charley to concur in desiring that he should interfere to prevent the "wanton destruction" of infant life. It appears, however, that the mere fact that children are hand-nursed instead of breast-nursed, will, unless great care be taken, raise the death-rate even in well-conducted homes to forty per cent. and upwards. We are told in the Report that "the children of wet-nurses, almost all of whom are single women, are usually put out to some dry-nurse for hire, and, in that case, scarcely any of them are known to live long." This remarkable statement is born out by evidence which deserves the attention of the Christian and the philanthropist as well as of Mr. Charley and other legislators. We all know that among people who can afford to pay for anything they desire to have, wet-nurses are sometimes in demand, and this Report shows that the supply can only be obtained by resorting to single women who have children. A married woman will not in general put another person's child in place of her own for any reward that can be offered, because this is in effect giving to the stranger a large, and to her own offspring a small, chance of life. In London, said a witness before the Committee, nearly all illegitimate children are put out to nurse, because if a mother has her child to nurse she can hardly get her own living. It appears that of children put out to nurse nearly half die under good treatment, and therefore Mr. Charley's Bill could at the most only affect the possibility of life of the other half. It is to be hoped that Christians and philanthropists will be able to reconcile themselves to the small results of Mr. Charley's labours. Perhaps if a Conservative Government were to be formed, it might appoint Mr. Charley to the office of Inspector-General of pap-boats under his own Bill.

RECRUITING

FROM a Report on recruiting just issued, and the recent debate in the House of Commons on the same subject, we glean many interesting facts and obtain much food for thought. A successful method of recruiting is the basis of every military system, for, however excellent may be the organization of an army, it avails nothing unless there be an adequate number of men to organize. Neither in Prussia nor in France is there any difficulty on this point; the former, by means of universal liability to service, and the latter, by conscription with substitutes, is able at all times to obtain the supply of men required. Both systems possess the advantages of simplicity, of economy, and of the certainty that there will never be any lack of recruits to complete the establishments fixed upon. In other respects there is a great difference between the two systems. That of Prussia tends to increase the respectability of the army and to raise the status of the soldier; that of France on the contrary degrades the profession of arms. It is objected to the Prussian method that it involves an oppressive personal tax, and interferes with the productive industry of the country. In France matters are even worse; for the conscription is not only a personal tax, but one which, like misfortune, is blind in its incidence, while by the admission of substitutes the poor are placed at a great disadvantage as compared with the rich. The latter pays merely a fine easily borne, the former contributes his all—namely, his labour. So strongly are the objections to both methods of recruiting felt in England, that although the voluntary system has always been more or less a failure, we still obstinately adhere to our old practice. This practice is simply that the State goes into the labour-market, and competes with other employers. It has been shown by a contemporary that the voluntary system, even when bolstered up by high bounties graduated according to the necessities of the moment, had scarcely ever succeeded in completing our establishment, and it may reasonably be anticipated that the abolition of bounties will tend to check any sudden supply of men. Nevertheless it is decided that voluntary enlistment shall have a further trial. Mr. Cardwell is confident as to the result, and is sanguine as to the effects which will be produced by localization, improvements in the condition of the soldier, and the holding out of prizes. It is probable that even the partial system of localization which is to be instituted will accomplish something, for it will bring the recruiter into closer contact with sources of supply which have not yet been tapped; and it is to be remembered that it will add but little to the small inducements to enlist. It is certainly time that some steps should be taken without delay, for our present position is as follows. Notwithstanding that we accept boys for men's work, and take men as short as five feet five inches in height, the cavalry, engineers, and infantry are only nearly complete, and in the artillery there is a deficiency of some 1,783 gunners. Various explanations are offered for this unsatisfactory state of things, such as the augmentation commenced eighteen months ago, and the present great demand for labour. Still, be the causes what they may, the ugly fact remains that the supply falls even now short of the demand. The Inspector-General of Recruiting himself confesses that "at present the supply of men has not been quite sufficient," and that increased difficulty is to be apprehended in the future. He reckons the number of recruits now required as 10 per cent. on the establishment, and estimates that, owing to the transfer of long service men to the Reserve, the percentage will gradually increase, till in 1876, when the six-years' men will begin to obtain their discharge, it will amount to fifteen. According to this calculation, the demand will four years hence be half as large again as it is at present. We fancy that the estimate of ten per cent. is unduly low, and we would suggest both that the maximum of demand will not have been reached till all the twelve-years' men shall have been discharged, and that if ten per cent. of recruits are required yearly when men enlist for twelve years, nearly double that number will be necessary when the army is almost exclusively composed of six-years' men. It might be imagined that in proportion as the Reserve increases the active army may be reduced. A little consideration, however, will show that this is a fallacy. Reserve men will not be as efficient as those who have served upwards of three years with the colours without intermission. Nor can we ever reckon on obtaining, when we want them, all those borne on the rolls of the Reserve. It is obvious that unless high inducements are held out to tempt members of the Army Reserve to complete their Reserve service, no man will obey the summons to the colours unless it suits him to do so. How, for instance, is a Reserve man who originally enlisted in Cork, was passed into the Reserve in London, and subsequently settled in Tipperary, to be caught? What is there to prevent a man from emigrating should the fancy seize him? In last Monday's debate Mr. Holmes argued in favour of reducing the period of service from six to three years, and suggested that the army should consist of 83,000 men with the colours, 60,000 in the first reserve, and 50,000 in the second reserve. He forgot, apparently, that the annual percentage of recruits would thereby be raised from ten to over thirty, and that we should require each year about 25,000 men, whereas the Inspector-General of Recruiting informs us that "an annual average of from 20,000 to 21,000 is more than has been hitherto obtained." Besides, though an infantry soldier learns his drill in a few months, he cannot be considered as thoroughly trained till he has served three years. According to Mr. Holmes, therefore, as soon as he became valuable he would be passed into the Reserve. In three years his military habits would not have become fixed, his military knowledge would not have been converted into an instinct, and after a few months of civil life he would sink to a level of efficiency but little superior to that of a Militiaman.

But, after all, the pressing question is this:—We cannot get a sufficient number of recruits even now, when our demands are moderate; what additional inducements shall we hold out when our demands increase? and we have seen that they must increase. The Inspector-General confesses that by the abolition of bounty the inducements to enlist are in one respect less than they were. We consider the abolition of bounty a proper and judicious measure, but still, as a matter of fact, the inducement to enlist has been diminished by the amount of that bounty. Again, the soldier has now no right to serve long enough to obtain a pension, and, save in rare instances, he will not be permitted to make the army his profession for life. The Inspector-General institutes a comparison between the position of the man retiring after twenty-one years' service on a pension of a shilling a day, and the position of the man who, after six years' service, is passed into the Reserve with an allowance of 7*l.* a year for six years. The present value of the pension is from 33*l.* to 34*l.* 10*s.*, while that of the Reserve pay is 28*l.* 8*s.*, showing a balance in favour of the former of from 4*l.* 12*s.* to 6*l.* 2*s.* On the other hand he places the advantage of knowing that the short-service man can, if he likes, retire after six years. This is hardly a fair way of putting it, for as a rule he must retire, or the supply to the Reserve would fail. For our own part we very much doubt whether short service is an inducement. There are two classes of men who enlist. One consists of thoughtless lads, who never ask or think at the time about the duration of their engagement. To them short service is no inducement. The other class is made up of men who, enlisting deliberately and from a liking for soldiering, seek to make the army a profession and provision for life. To such men short service is positively distasteful. We are told that the average age of recruits is nineteen, and that it cannot be raised, because after that age men have settled down in some occupation. But take the recruit who, enlisting at nineteen, passes into the Reserve at twenty-five. He has forgotten his former trade or occupation; he is too old to learn it again; his habits are unsettled; and employers will not care to engage him because of his periodical absence at training. Great inducements are, according to the Inspector-General, offered by the promise that a discharged soldier of good character will, if able to pass an examination, be selected for a clerkship in the War Office in preference to other candidates. He also dwells upon the fact that men of the Reserve will, if qualified, be appointed Post Office messengers in country districts. Now the number of annual vacancies at the War Office is very limited, and the remuneration of a Post Office messenger is not excessive. Still, if a beginning were made, and a large number of discharged soldiers were at once gazetted to these appointments, a beneficial influence on recruiting would no doubt be the result. But the question arises, would not the public service suffer if a considerable number of War Office clerks and Post Office messengers were suddenly recalled to the ranks? Were a national emergency to take place, the work in Pall Mall and the operations in the Post Office would certainly not be diminished; yet it is precisely at such a time that the Reserve men would be required with the colours. It seems questionable whether appointments under Government should be given to the soldier until after the completion of his Reserve service. Schooling is also brought forward as an inducement to enlist. Unfortunately those who most require education generally care least for it, while those who do not require it are able to do better for themselves elsewhere than in the army.

The Inspector-General, after exhausting his list of inducements, suggests two notable expedients for facilitating recruiting. One is that magistrates, the clergy, and the gentry generally should set forth the advantages of a short military training. Nothing could be more desirable, if we may assume their readiness to act as amateur recruiting sergeants. The other expedient is that loafers, if not actually tainted with crime, should be persuaded to join the regular army, where discipline and the removal from former influences would in many cases reform them. He does not state how such men are to be persuaded, and we must say we doubt the advisableness of lowering the tone of the army by making it a reformatory for vagabonds. We observe that the hope of obtaining a commission is not included among the list of inducements. The omission is creditable alike to the good sense and the honesty of the Inspector-General; for, at the present rate of officer's pay, a commission is not looked on by soldiers as a prize. Throughout the whole Report runs a vein of apology and foreboding. The apologetic tone is particularly discernible when the Inspector-General speaks of the Militia in connexion with recruiting. In one part of his Report he observes that the practice of the Militia and army recruiting side by side, the Militia recruit receiving a bounty and the army recruit none, is injurious to recruiting. In another passage, however, he combats this idea, and expresses a belief that as the Militiaman will probably be allowed after one training to volunteer into the Line, the Militia enrolments will help Line enlistments. To us it seems more reasonable to expect that direct enlistment for the Line will be enormously diminished, and that few men will enter the army save through the Militia. Were the bounty abolished for the Militia all rivalry with the army would cease; for, as a general rule, each would attract a distinct class of recruits. To make the Militia a mere passage into the army is not beneficial to the latter, and cannot fail to destroy both the efficiency and the esprit de corps of the former. Perhaps, however, the weakest point in Mr. Cardwell's scheme is the impossibility of reconciling short enlistments with Indian service. The India Office and Indian Government will never consent to incur the expense of relieving regiments oftener than every ten years. Even if the period of Indian service were reduced to five years and three-quarters, every man in the regiment would have to be enlisted the day before the regiment started, and to be discharged the day after its return, for the voyage out and back would occupy three months. If therefore the present system is to be persevered in, it is difficult to see how we are to escape the necessity of re-establishing the local European army—a proceeding on many grounds to be deprecated. Bearing in mind the large force kept up in India, we do not understand how it will be possible to carry out even Mr. Cardwell's present plans, much less to reduce the period of service to three years. An obvious solution of the difficulty would of course be to adopt the system of universal liability to military service; but for such a radical change the country is not yet ripe.

THE DEBATES IN THE SWISS STÄNDERATH.

WE venture to hope that we have made some small contribution to political knowledge by our attempts to give English readers some idea of the questions involved in the present reconstruction of the Swiss Federal Constitution. But it is a work which has been in some respects carried on under difficulties. It is not easy to record and comment on the proceedings of two bodies which are sitting at the same time. Add to this that there seems to be some mysterious difficulty in forwarding the debates from Switzerland to England. The official paper, the Bundesblatt or Feuille Fédérale, travels with perfect ease and regularity, but the Bulletin, which contains the debates of the Assembly, comes, as far as our experience goes, in a way like the eccentric orbit of a comet—one sheet in French, another in German, the French and German sheets in no way following or tallying with one another, and the variety being further improved by this or that sheet not coming at all. Under these circumstances it is sometimes a little hard to follow the thread of a debate, or even to know to what conclusion the House has come. Nevertheless we have done our best, and we believe that on most points we have been able to give a fairly correct account of what has happened. And we feel sure that, in doing so, we have done some service to those political thinkers who have eyes keen enough to see that the amount of political instruction to be gained from the history of a country is not always in exact proportion to the extent of its area, and that a high degree of moral greatness may be found in States which make no pretensions to physical bigness.

The Ständerath or Senate has now brought the main stage of its labours to an end, and the present business of the Houses is that of discussing one another's amendments. Our former articles have been concerned with the debates in the Nationalrath or House of Representatives. We will now attempt a sketch of the fate of the different proposals which have gone up from them to the Ständerath. One branch however of the proposed changes we purposely lay aside. The "unification" of several branches of law throughout the Confederation, and the extended powers which it is most wisely proposed to give to the Bundesgericht or Federal Court, deserve to be treated separately, from the technical point of view of a lawyer, and we therefore reserve them. Another point also of a technical kind is the change which is proposed in the military arrangements of the Confederation. This, like most of the other proposed changes, is a change in a centralizing direction, lessening the power of the Cantons and increasing the power of the Confederation. As such it was strongly opposed by the supporters of Cantonal rights. An outsider is perhaps hardly qualified to judge between the actual and the proposed system; what mainly concerns the political student is that on neither side does there seem any disposition to forsake the distinguishing character of Switzerland in the face of other nations, and to substitute a standing for a national army. Putting aside therefore these more purely technical matters, legal and military, we will attempt to sketch what the Ständerath has done in matters more strictly political. On the whole it may be said to have adopted the proposals of the Nationalrath with some modifications. Both Houses therefore are committed, though not quite in the same degree, to what is called the Unitarian policy, to the increase of the powers of the League at the expense of those of the Cantons. But in the Ständerath, as in the Nationalrath, some of the proposed changes have been carried by the smallest possible majorities, and it must be remembered that they still await the affirming or rejecting vote of the Cantons and of the people. As we have throughout not concealed our own sympathies with the Federalist side, we are perhaps hardly fair judges when we say that the balance of eloquence and argument seems to us to be on the Federalist side. The famous James Fazy of Geneva, a man who has in his time done much good and much mischief, but who at any rate is entitled to honour as one of the chief authors of the Federal Constitution of 1848, has stood boldly forward to defend what is largely his own work. And he has met with a powerful antagonist in a member of the Federal Judicature, Dr. Blumer of Glarus, the constitutional historian of the primitive democracies. And the Federal councillor Dubs, using, like President Welti, the power which the Constitution gives him of speaking and making motions in either House of the Assembly, shone forth once at least as the chief orator of the debate. Our last piece of news is that this distinguished man is so dissatisfied with the course which things are taking that he has determined altogether to withdraw from his place in the Federal Government. He has offered his resignation to the Federal Assembly, but they have declined to accept it. It remains to be seen what will be done at the next election of Federal Councillors, but we trust that Dr. Dubs may be led to think again before he deprives his country of his services.

Passing by the military debates, the first question of much interest out of the country which came before the Ständerath is the question of education. It will be remembered that the Nationalrath rejected some of the fiercer proposals of its own members, and passed a resolution which we gave on a former occasion* in the French version, and which the ups and downs of our information have now given us an opportunity of quoting in the German:—

Die Kantone sorgen für obligatorischen und unentgeltlichen Primarunterricht.

Der Bund kann über das Minimum der Anforderung an die Primarschule gesetzliche Bestimmungen erlassen.

The Committee of the Ständerath proposed to accept the clauses as sent up by the Nationalrath, only leaving out the word "unentgeltlichen"; but the House threw out both clauses altogether, a vote which, if sustained, will leave primary education to the Cantons, only giving power to the League to found other institutions for the higher education ("andere höhere Unterrichtsanstalten"), besides the Polytechnic School, which is, and the Federal University, which some day may be.

A point on which we believe we have not touched before is the restrictions on the practice of the Liberal professions which have hitherto existed among the Cantons. A lawyer or physician authorised to practise in one Canton cannot practise in another, except when he is allowed by Concordats between the Cantons. Lawyers, however, of any Canton may naturally practise in the Federal Court at Bern. Some of the proposals in the Nationalrath went towards making these professions absolutely free throughout the Confederation. But the resolution which has been come to by both Houses still leaves to the Cantons the power of licensing, entrusting it to Federal legislation to deal with the question of making the cantonal licences good throughout the Confederation. Medicine, it is plain, must be the same everywhere; a man who is a competent physician at Geneva cannot be incompetent at Rorschach, and it was remarked in the course of debate that the restrictions on the practice of medicine tended to discourage the special study of particular branches of medical science. With regard to the lawyers, it has hitherto been argued that, as the laws of each Canton differ, a man who was learned in the law of one Canton might know nothing of the law of another. But, if the law is to be so largely unified as is now proposed, this difficulty will be pretty well taken away.

A curious question arose about gaming-houses and lotteries. Is their prohibition a constitutional matter? One would certainly be inclined to say, No; but then comes in the peculiarity of the Federal system, that, if a single refractory Canton chooses to tolerate establishments which are felt to be a shame to the whole country, it is only by dealing with it as a constitutional matter that the Confederation can put a stop to the evil. The gaming-house of Saxon in Wallis—in defence of which it has been ingeniously argued that only foreigners ruin themselves in it, while the natives gain by the foreigners coming—can therefore be got rid of only by the somewhat cumbrous process of a constitutional amendment. No new gaming-houses are to be allowed; no new leases may be granted to old ones; and lotteries are made subject to Federal legislation.

One of the points which in both Houses called for the longest debates and drew forth the greatest number of proposed amendments was the question of the Ohngeld, a tax which some Cantons lay on wine and other drinks coming from other Cantons. Such a tax certainly seems to contradict one of the main principles of the Constitution, which abolishes all duties between one Canton and another, and removes its custom-houses to the frontier of the Confederation. The division on this point being mainly geographical, a question between the Cantons which grow wine and those which do not, some cross divisions naturally took place; and in the Ständerath M. Fazy was able to twit his opponents from the greater Cantons with being less zealous than usual in the cause of unification when unification touched their particular local interests. The end of the debate was that, after the Nationalrath had refused the immediate abolition of the Ohngeld, the Ständerath added a clause for its abolition without any indemnity at the end of fifteen years. Several members however strongly objected to a compromise which they spoke of as being no abolition, but rather a re-enactment with greater authority.

We will not dwell on a crowd of financial questions which have no great interest out of the country, but will rather pass to the debate in the Ständerath on the great question of Niederlassung or Etablissement. We explained the points at issue, and gave the result of the deliberations of the Nationalrath, in a former article.* The clauses as voted by the Ständerath differ in some points from the form in which they were sent up by the Nationalrath, but at this distance the differences hardly seem to be differences of principle. They admit the piroque to an equality with the hereditary member of the Gemeinde in all points, except any share in the enjoyment or control of the corporate property of the Gemeinde. In itself there is nothing to be said against this; it is no more than saying that Port Meadow at Oxford, the common property of the freemen of that city, should not be confiscated to the behoof of people who are not freemen. But when we remember how much wider the range of communal life is in Switzerland than anything at all answering to it in England, and how much larger is the—at least proportional—amount of communal property, it would not have seemed unreasonable if the Ständerath had adopted the proposal which we mentioned before as having been made in the Nationalrath, and which was again made in the Ständerath, according to which communal property would have to be honestly applied to public purposes, and not dealt with as a private hereditary estate. The whole communal system was strongly denounced by M. Fazy as the real hindrance to progress, and he did not scruple to liken some of the existing Gemeinden to the ancient oligarchies. M. Fazy no doubt spoke in the Romance tongue of his own Canton, but we are driven to quote him in a German version:—

Nicht die Kantone, wohl aber die Gemeinden, sind das Hindernis zur freien Niederlassung. Sie bilden einen Staat im Staat und ist der alte Adel dort noch vorhanden, alle Misbräuche sind dort noch in Kraft.

In many cases this is no doubt historically true; the Roman patriciate itself was probably in its first beginning a Bürgergemeinde.

When the Ständerath reached the dangerous ground of constitutional controversy, its debates seem to have been somewhat less fierce than those of the Nationalrath. The House rejected a proposal to make the observance of Sunday obligatory by an article of the Federal Constitution. It may be remembered that in the old provision of the Constitution which shut out the Jesuits from the territory of the Confederation, a clause was added by the Nationalrath forbidding the foundation of new, or the restoration of dissolved, monasteries. In the discussion of this question in the Ständerath we again remark the union of most opposite parties in the defence of local rights against the spirit which is anxious to press its own particular opinions on all mankind. Herr Lusser of Uri spoke as a man of Uri, and a Catholic whose religious insulted, and whose religious liberty was infringed, by the proposed restriction. He proposed to strike out, not only the new provision against monasteries, but the old provision against Jesuits. From the other end of the Confederation comes the voice of M. Fazy in favour of things as they are. Jesuits he knows to be politically mischievous, and he will keep them out of the whole land. Of monasteries of other orders he has no experience. It is for each Canton to judge of them according to its own experience, not for the Confederation to enforce a common rule upon all the Cantons, to the infringement of their local sovereignty. This union of men reaching the same conclusion by widely different arguments carried the day, and the clause against the monasteries was struck out.

On the great questions of Initiation, Veto, and Referendum, proposals much the same as those sent up from the Nationalrath have been carried, some of them by narrow majorities, and after much vigorous speaking the other way. Above all stands forth the powerful speech of Dr. Dubs, whose eloquent wind-up seems to have carried his hearers beyond the bounds of Swiss parliamentary propriety, as it was received with "vielseitige Bravo's." Nor can we wonder when a veteran statesman makes such an appeal as this:—

Wir haben 24 sehr glückliche Jahre erlebt, und sind dadurch vielleicht etwas zu lässig geworden. Es können auch wieder andere Zeiten kommen, wo wir alle einander bedürfen, der Grosse das Kleine, wie der Kleine das Grosse. In diesen Zeiten hilft nur edelgütige Liebe und edelgütige Treue. Bauen Sie, meine Herren, kein Haus, von dem man sagen könnte: es ist zwar schön gerummelt, aber was darin fehlt, das ist das alte edelgütige Recht.

The main point on which Dr. Dubs insisted was the Ständevotum or vote of the Cantons. If there was to be a Referendum at all, it should be, as it is in the case of a constitutional amendment, not only to the People but to the Cantons as well. Appealing to the experience of Switzerland and America as against that of France and Spain, he asserted that the only true Republic was the Federal Republic. The main principle of all was the equality of rights among the sovereign States which had joined to form the Confederation. He disposed of the cavil about one man of Uri counting as much as many men of Bern. It was not that a man of Uri counted for more than a man of Bern; whenever men's votes were counted, the vote of each counted equally; but when it was an affair, not between individual men, but between sovereign commonwealths, then, as a poor man counts for as much as a rich man, as a small state in the European commonwealth has the same rights as a great one, so in their capacity of sovereign Cantons Uri and Bern had the same rights. It was vain to argue that, because Cantons which had the Referendum in their cantonal affairs had handed over certain subjects to the Federal authority, it therefore followed that the Referendum ought to follow them into the Constitution of the League. When the Cantons had handed the matter over to the League, they had, as Cantons, nothing more to do with it; but on the principle on which it was argued that there ought to be an appeal from the acts of the Federal Assembly to its constituents, that appeal ought to be equally to the constituents of both Houses, to the Cantons as to the constituents of the Ständerath no less than to the people as the constituents of the Nationalrath. At the final voting the Ständevotum was thrown out by a majority of one only, the House dividing by 20 against 19.

While we are in the act of writing the English papers are beginning to be a little more liberal with telegrams on Swiss matters, and one piece of news is, that on the question of education the Nationalrath having adhered to its own decision, the Ständerath has come round to it and voted, by a majority of one, that primary education should be a matter of Federal concern. Another telegram is amusing. The Nationalrath has voted that the new scheme of the Constitution should be voted on in globo—that is, that the whole should be submitted to a single vote of Yea or Nay, instead of being voted on section by section. In one at least of the English daily papers this appeared as a vote that the scheme should be "published in the Globe." The Globe, it would seem, is looked on as the official organ of the Confederation.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS BILL.

LORD SHAFTESBURY has described certain Bills which he has brought into the House of Lords as an attempt to make the Ecclesiastical Courts as cheap and accessible as County Courts. One of these Bills contained a provision that suits against clerics for offences against the laws ecclesiastical should be commenced, either by the Bishop of his own motion, or by three members of the Church, being inhabitant householders of the diocese. The forcible argument and keen ridicule of the Bishop of Peterborough have already proved fatal to this Bill, but there is another Bill which has passed through Committee in the Lords, and will probably come down to the Commons, although it very inadequately reflects Lord Shaftesbury's promise of showing clerical sport to laymen. Indeed it is difficult to understand what object the author of this Bill expects that, in its present shape, it will answer. It appeals the Church Discipline Act, and it omits nothing in its place. The right of laymen to prosecute clergymen for ecclesiastical offences will, after the passing of this Bill, have to be gathered from the law as it stood more than thirty years ago. If the rejected Bill had passed, a Jew attorney, tempted to prosecute for the sake of costs, might have said that Lord Shaftesbury almost persuaded him to be a Christian. Such a Bill would so obviously have incited litigation that it is not wonderful that the House of Lords rejected it. On the other hand, the Bishop of Winchester brought in a Bill of much more moderate scope, which Lord Westbury inaccurately described as a proposal that a bishop should hold the door of a Court and let no one enter it without his sanction; and the consideration of this Bill has been postponed. It provided that the consent of the bishop of the diocese should be necessary to the promotion of a suit, and gave an appeal, in case he declined to give consent, to the archbishop. A system of free shooting is disliked by one party in the House, and the requirement of licences is disapproved by the other. And the result seems likely to be that the work which ought to be done by Parliament will be left in this, as in other cases, to be done by Judges, who will really make the law while professing to expound it.

The Church Discipline Act of 1840 provided that, in case of any clerk in holy orders being charged with any offence against the laws ecclesiastical, it should be lawful for the bishop of the diocese within which the offence was alleged to have been committed, on the application of any party complaining thereof, or of his own mere motion, to issue a Commission which should inquire and report to the bishop whether there was a sufficient prima facie ground for instituting proceedings against the accused. If they reported in the affirmative, and if the bishop of any diocese within which the accused held any preferment or the party complaining should think fit to proceed against the accused, articles should be prepared and filed, and the accused should be summoned to answer thereto. And it was provided that no criminal suit or proceeding for any offence against the laws ecclesiastical should be instituted otherwise than under that Act. It appears at first sight probable that the machinery of this Act would work as well as any substitute likely to be provided; but, however this may be, it is surprising to find this machinery abolished by the Bill without providing any substitute at all. The Church Discipline Act is, with an immaterial exception, repealed by the Bill, which puts nothing in its place. Lord Shaftesbury, in introducing the Bill which was rejected, represented it as a great restriction upon the existing rights of the laity. "It was supposed," he said, "that by the Church Discipline Act the rights of the laity to promote the Judge's office were entirely taken away. He never believed it was so. The issue had never been raised." It is clear, at any rate, that when this Act is repealed these rights, so far as it affected them, will revive, and the extent to which they exist and are practically available is likely to be elucidated by litigation. In reference to this point it may be useful to refer to a well-known case, in which Mr. Justice Wightman said that, "before the passing of the Church Discipline Act, the office of the Judge could not be promoted by private individuals for offences against the laws ecclesiastical without the previous leave of the Court." He quoted dicta of Sir William Scott that the previous leave of the Court is a part of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, which is not to be exercised without discretion, or left entirely to the judgment or passions of private persons, and that the process of the Court is not to be refused in a proper case. Mr. Justice Wightman proceeded to say that it might be inferred from these dicta and from the text-books of practice in the Ecclesiastical Courts that, before the jurisdiction given to the bishops by the Church Discipline Act, there was some restriction upon the commencement of proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Courts for offences against the laws ecclesiastical, and that it was not a matter of course to allow the office of the Judge to be promoted by any private person who might think fit to institute a suit upon grounds entirely frivolous. It must however be admitted that it was said by an ecclesiastical Judge that, though application was always made to the Judge before a citation is issued in a cause in which his office is promoted, that is not for the purpose of considering the merits of the case, but to ascertain whether it is of ecclesiastical cognizance, and to test the fitness of the person to be made responsible for the costs to the other party. There were other cases which tended to show that, as the ecclesiastical law stood before the Church Discipline Act, there was no discretion in the Court as to permitting or refusing to permit the office of the Judge to be promoted upon any preliminary consideration of the merits in the case of a charge of an offence against the laws ecclesiastical. We have followed almost the exact words of Mr. Justice Wightman's judgment, in which, nearly twenty years after the passing of the Church Discipline Act, he examines two conflicting views of what the law was before that Act passed, and comes to the conclusion that a good deal may be said and much authority adduced for either view. After the lapse of more than another ten years, in which thicker dust has accumulated upon the precedents cited by Mr. Justice Wightman, it is seriously, or perhaps thoughtlessly, proposed that the questions which he could not satisfactorily settle should be again agitated under circumstances which would compel some settlement to be arrived at. The inclination or caprice of a Judge, the artifice of counsel, or mere accident, may decide that upon which Parliament ought to have declared its mind in the present or in some supplemental Bill.

In order that we may not do injustice to this remarkable project of legislation, let us go methodically through its clauses. It proposes to enact (s. 22) that, subject to the provisions of the Act, every provincial and diocesan Court shall have power to hear and determine all questions relating to branches of the laws ecclesiastical, suits for faculties, suits of duplex querela, to the like extent that such Courts now possess. It further proposes to enact (s. 32) that, subject to the exceptions in the Act contained, no jurisdiction with respect to the correction of clerks in holy orders who may be charged with any offence against the laws ecclesiastical, or concerning whom there may exist scandal or evil report as having offended against the said laws, nor in suits involving any question concerning doctrine or the due administration of the sacraments and other rites and ceremonies of the Church, nor in any other suits in the Ecclesiastical Courts, shall be exercised by any Court or person except as mentioned in the Act. And, further (s. 34), a suit against any clerk accused of any offence concerning the doctrine, worship, discipline, or government of the Church may be instituted in the Court of the diocese wherein either the offence is alleged to have been committed, or the accused clerk has any ecclesiastical preferment, or is resident. And, further (s. 50), a suit shall be commenced in the provincial or diocesan Courts by filing a petition signed by counsel, and by serving the defendant with a copy thereof; and (s. 51) the petitioner shall make an affidavit that there exists no collusion between himself and the defendant, and that he believes the allegations contained in his petition are true. These appear to be all the clauses of the Bill that are material to our present purpose, and it is remarkable that the provision (s. 50) that a suit should be commenced by petition, being quite general in terms, would seem to indicate that any person, Churchman or Dissenter, resident or not in diocese or parish, might take proceedings. This, however, cannot be the meaning of this Bill, because, if it were, the other Bill would have been unnecessary. That Bill, as we have seen, provided that suits should be commenced "by three members of the Church, being inhabitant householders of the diocese," and that Bill has been rejected. The clauses 50 and 51 of the present Bill appeared in the original draft of it, while the companion Bill had still a possibility of becoming law. They remain in the Bill after it has emerged from Committee of the whole House, and after the companion Bill has been numbered among the things that were. The Committee included the Chancellor and two ex-Chancellors, and yet it has produced a Bill which any Parliamentary draftsman ought to be ashamed to send out of his chambers. A suit may be commenced by petition, but who may commence a suit? The Bill repeals the Church Discipline Act, and apparently revives the old law expounded by Mr. Justice Wightman in the judgment to which we have referred. The draftsman who framed these clauses supposed that they and the other Bill would become law at the same time. That Bill is defunct, and the clauses seem likely to pass the House of Lords. Can anything be more bewildering?

An important observation arises upon the clause (s. 32) which purports to transfer jurisdiction with respect to clerks "concerning whom there may exist scandal or evil report" to the Courts or persons mentioned in the Act. This jurisdiction cannot be transferred unless it exists. And the effect of the Bill would be to make it non-existent. We must again refer upon this point to Mr. Justice Wightman, who has said that the office of the Judge could only have been promoted in the case of some direct and positive charge of an offence against the laws ecclesiastical, and no proceeding upon the ground of the existence of scandal or evil report of having offended against these laws would have been admissible under the old law. Such proceeding was made admissible by the Church Discipline Act; but that Act is repealed by the Bill. It may perhaps be contended that the jurisdiction which purports to be transferred is by implication created; but penal legislation ought not to be conducted in such a loose way. There are minor defects in the Bill which indicate that the Chancellor and the two ex-Chancellors did their work rather carelessly. Thus we find (s. 27) that, in case of appeal, a report of the evidence, "with the summing-up of the Judge," shall be transmitted to the superior Court. These words evidently had reference to certain clauses providing for trial by a mixed jury of clergy and laity which have been struck out. We rely, however, upon the principal objection, which we have fully stated. If this Bill does authorise laymen to prosecute clergy, the other Bill and the debate and division on it were all nugatory. If this Bill does not authorise laymen to prosecute clergy, then, as it repeals the Church Discipline Act, it proposes a sort of "as you were" back to the law of thirty years ago, which is an absurd conclusion. There is a clause which we had overlooked, which rather seems to favour our suggestion that a Jew attorney might be tempted by the Bill to become Christian. A party to any suit under the Act (s. 104), or, if retained on behalf of either party, serjeants-at-law and barristers-at-law, may appear and practise in the Ecclesiastical Courts with all the rights that they possess in the superior Courts. We never heard of a "party" practising in Westminster Hall unless he was an attorney. We are almost tempted to fancy that this Bill was settled, not by three law lords, but by the three old women mentioned by the Bishop of Peterborough as possible prosecutors under the other Bill. The House of Lords refused to allow three old women to do that which, if this Bill is to have any effect, may be done under it by one old woman. The principal effect, however, of such a Bill must be to supply work for that meritorious class the lawyers, who ought to be greatly obliged to Lord Shaftesbury for sowing a plentiful crop of litigation. We would undertake to point out many grotesque errors of detail beyond those already indicated; nor is there any limit, except that of our own space, to the adverse criticisms which might be made upon this extraordinary example of how to put the wrong word in the wrong place.

REVIEWS.

FROSSARD'S CORPS IN THE LATE WAR.*

VERY much has been said out of France in condemnation of the readiness shown by French officers to rush into print, and display their own errors in the most palpable light in the effort to repair broken reputations. This course is nothing new, as all will remember whose fate it has been to trace the history of such former French disasters as those of Moscow and Waterloo. But the complaint against such writers is surely hardly fair. There is always a tendency after a very unsuccessful campaign to fix the special cause of the miscarriage upon some minor actor without strict regard to truth. Grouchy's case at the hands of the great Napoleon and his admirers is a signal example of this unfairness. And there really is no manner of reason why a subordinate who finds himself unfairly charged with the consequences of his superior's errors and shortcomings should not come forward to tell the truth in his own justification when the campaign is over, and when peace, accompanied too probably with loss of employment, has freed him from the professional subordination which tied his pen before. It may be in some cases a positive duty to history that he should do so. Had Grouchy gone down silent to his grave, that grave would have been dishonoured for ever, and history have suffered one of the grossest falsifications which have ever been wilfully employed for the distortion of facts. And if the writer be really guilty as charged, his own evidence will, as in the case of that attempted exculpation of De Failly's which we had occasion some time since to expose in these pages, be inevitably the means of more thoroughly condemning him.

We have taken up the work of General Frossard, therefore, in as impartial a spirit as we can bring to bear on it, and shall go as directly as possible to the portion of his narrative that is specially devoted to the catastrophe of his defeat at Forbach, which, coupled with MacMahon's rout on the same day, so shattered the morale of the Army of the Rhine as to throw it at once on a dangerous, and as the event proved most disastrous, defensive. Frossard's reputation we conceive must for ever stand well or be condemned by his conduct at this crisis, for his after share of events in the army of Bazaine was so entirely that of a minor actor as to leave him no practical responsibility.

But before the sharp test of Forbach came the unreal and childish show of war at Saarbrück, which has more than any other circumstance of this unfortunate war thrown contempt on the fallen Emperor who permitted it. It was Frossard's corps that was engaged, and his name has therefore been freely handled in connexion with this paltry business. We are bound to state that the exculpation he offers is both clear and complete. The movement of his corps on to the hill overlooking Saarbrück was but part of a general advance directed by Leboucq of the IInd, IIIrd, and IVth Corps, Bazaine being for the occasion vested with the charge of the whole operation—a fact foreshadowing his subsequent elevation to the command that has proved so disastrous to his name. Frossard's corps it was that being the more advanced, drove in the Prussian skirmishers at Saarbrück, and shelled the station beyond; but, so far from his having prepared the theatrical skirmish that the poor young Prince might have "his baptism of fire," Frossard shows that he had no reason that very morning to expect either Emperor or Prince to appear in his lines. We may add that his former connexion with the Imperial household as governor of the heir of the Bonapartes has no doubt tended to give consistence to the erroneous belief that the skirmish at Saarbrück was a show prepared for his former charge.

* There is another charge against him arising out of the same event which is even more easily disposed of. This relates to an alleged bombardment of the open town of Saarbrück when the Prussian outpost—for it was no more—was driven back on the 2nd by the advance of Frossard's corps just spoken of. A good deal of nonsense has been written on this point, and the conduct of the French general has been even spoken of in the German reply to M. de Chaudordy's famous complaint of Prussian barbarity, as an excuse for the bombardment of French open towns. "Il est à la connaissance de tout le monde," are the words, "que l'armée française a commencé la campagne en bombardant Sarrebrück." General Frossard states that the place was neither bombarded nor even threatened with bombardment, since during the four days that the French guns overlooked it, their fire was never directed on anything but the station (which stands quite out of the place, on a hill beyond) and on the trains passing near. We are able to confirm this defence from personal observation, having searched the whole town for the traces of this alleged bombardment not long afterwards, and failed to discover them. On both these heads, therefore, the late chief of the IInd Corps, and ex-governor of the young Prince, deserves acquittal.

The more serious blot which has hitherto rested on Frossard's name concerns the events of the 6th, the day of the combat for the heights of Spicheren, now generally known as the battle of Forbach. The General's narrative of this struggle is laboriously detailed and very clear, and we have no hesitation in saying that whoever reads it carefully will not fail to acquit the writer of the chief share in the discredit which has hitherto attached to him as the immediate commander of the corps engaged. The story which credulous Correspondents have picked up from French runaways and other untrustworthy sources, had represented Frossard as completely surprised in his position between Saarbrück and Forbach by the columns of the First and Second German Armies, converging on the former point. It has further been usually represented that his command was an independent one, that Bazaine's corps lay close by him, and that he put off sending for the succour which would bring upon the ground a senior officer to himself until it was too late to save his apparently strong position from being turned and carried, and his corps not only routed but forced off its line of retreat, and separated from the rest of the French army. Once inquired into, these charges are found destitute of the most moderate foundation, and we are brought direct to the conclusion that the special writers of English and other journals have to answer for a vast quantity of rubbish heaped up over the true story of the French disasters, which it will cost the true compiler of history much pains hereafter to get rid of. So far from Frossard's having this utterly fictitious independence of Bazaine, a telegram sent to the former at 1 P.M. the day before from the Imperial head-quarters, placed him under the direct orders of the Marshal, Ladmiraal's IVth Corps being similarly treated. Leboeuf, who had hitherto fumbled at the strings of each corps separately, had apparently become alarmed at the increasing strength of the reports which told of the German concentration, and in his fright was endeavouring—too late—to get rid of the system of dissemination hitherto kept up on the frontier, one chief reason of which had probably been the fear of making any of the chief generals too prominent. Bazaine, assuming his new charge officially in the evening, called for the ordinary reports from the other corps, and learnt that Frossard had, whilst still independent, begun a retreat from his exposed position near to Saarbrück, and thus had already neared the other corps. The Marshal kept his head-quarters at St. Avold, fifteen miles behind Forbach, as a central point to the three corps he now directed. For the fact that the affair of the next day fell entirely upon a single one, he and not Frossard must bear such responsibility as does not fall upon minor actors. It was not certainly from want of information that his lieutenant was left by him unsupported.

* Rapport sur les Opérations du Deuxième Corps de l'Armée de Rhin, dans la Campagne de 1870. Par le Général Frossard. Paris: Dentu.

A fresh telegram from Metz, arriving during the night, ordered Frossard to meet the Emperor at a council of war the following afternoon; but the fatal day of the 6th began with a counter-order putting off this intended meeting, and giving the General the reason of the change, couched in the plain words:—"Tenez-vous prêt contre une attaque sérieuse qui pourrait avoir lieu aujourd'hui même." The fact of this message being sent direct to General Frossard, although he was now under the command of another by the Imperial orders, shows that Leboeuf or his master could not altogether refrain from interference in the newly-formed army. Bazaine himself, however, was nearer to Metz than the IIIrd Corps, with the telegraph line to the latter running through his head-quarters, so that the warning conveyed from Leboeuf was doubtless communicated to him, and he might have at once, had he so chosen, made preparations for reinforcing his subordinate against that "serious attack" which was so plainly predicted.

Bazaine, however, took no such precaution. By 9 A.M. the Prussian batteries had appeared before the Spicheren heights and engaged Frossard's artillery. That general at once telegraphed the fact to his superior at St. Avold, asking the support of Decaen's division, which he knew to be the nearest of those of the IIIrd Corps, and of a brigade in addition to cover his right towards Sarreguemines. At 10 A.M., having had no reply, he telegraphed to Bazaine that the action engaged would prove to be no less than a battle, and presently he received a reply to the effect that two divisions would move on Bening and Theding, points twelve and ten miles from the Spicheren plateau. "I cannot do more," added Bazaine, "having but a small force to hold the position of St. Avold;" and he went on to recommend General Frossard to detach a brigade, "and even more," to watch the road from Sarrelouis, by which his left might possibly be turned. Poor Frossard was far from being in a position to make detachments when this answer reached him about noon. The Prussians were attacking the spur of the bare heights sharply, though the brigade there had partly entrenched itself; they were swarming in the woods on the plain to the French left, pressing their right forward in the direction of Forbach; they were making attack after attack on the French right, where the Spicheren hill trending southward over the village of St. Arnaud is faced with wooded slopes favourable to skirmishers. Frossard was now obliged to bring the reserve of his own corps into action. He telegraphed repeatedly how severe the pressure on him was, and received replies to the effect that a third division was ordered to his support besides the two already mentioned. Frossard looked for them anxiously and in vain. About 4 P.M. a brigade of Bazaine's dragoons reached Forbach, where cavalry was the only arm not needed, and, as they cumbered the St. Avold road required for the ambulances, were ordered out of the way. At seven the Prussians had carried the wood on the French right, established their line of skirmishers on the crest of the Spicheren heights, and made a still more formidable lodgment in Frossard's original position on the plain towards Forbach. Moreover they were being reinforced.

Meanwhile not a battalion of Bazaine's corps had appeared. The French troops had fired away all their ammunition, and had had no meal. It was a foregone conclusion that Frossard should avail himself of the darkness to retreat from a position which was untenable by his corps unaided, and where he received no support from his chief.

The sole remaining question to solve is, what became of the three divisions of Bazaine's which were to have aided him. General Frossard traces their movements from hour to hour, and shows clearly that in each case there was a hesitation and uncertainty chargeable to the divisional commanders themselves more than to any complete default of orders from Bazaine. He declines, therefore, to make any direct charge against his late chief, and imputes the want of readiness to the vague apprehensions entertained of Prussian attacks from other directions. In fact each division generally appears to have expected to see the enemy on his own flank, and to have thought little of the duty of helping others. The uncertain and purposeless cross marches they had suffered at Leboeuf's instance for a fortnight before had infused timidity into the whole staff. And, like Bazaine, when he suggested Frossard's detaching "a brigade or more" in the very middle of the battle, they selfishly underrated the danger to which he was exposed. The whole story suggests a degree of imbecility rarely matched in military annals.

General Frossard's soldierly narrative is singularly confirmed by a loosely written, but not altogether despicable, account put forth by an artillery officer of the IIIrd Corps, under the sensational title of L'Agonie de l'armée du Rhin. We have only space for this writer's criticism on the events of the day, which we now give in his own words:—

Our divisions were posted at four different points, in motionless expectation of an imaginary enemy. Each of them was within reach of the battlefield, and heard the cannonade all day without the least suspecting the result. If Marshal Bazaine was obliged to scatter his divisions to guard various approaches, or to supply them more easily, had he not the power or had he not the will to make one of them march on the point where the guns were firing? This question will be without doubt answered some day.

The writer penned these words from his captivity in Germany, before Frossard had published the narrative which answers his interrogatory for the greater part with clearness, and which leaves on us the general impression that at this juncture the French higher staff officers were thoroughly deficient alike in foresight, energy, and unselfishness.

HISTORY FOR THE YOUNG.*

THE first of the three volumes before us, having been out for some years, is probably by this time well known to the public, or to that part of it which is engaged, as the circulars say, in "the education of youth." The second, European History, is simply an extension of the plan of the first. For the benefit of the few who may not already be acquainted with the Historical Selections by Miss Sewell and Miss Yonge, both of whom have done much in their day towards rendering history attractive to children, we will explain that they are simply an improved book of extracts. As everybody knows, there is nothing in this world duller than a universal history, where all explanation, detail, and picture-queeness have to be sacrificed to the necessity of getting the facts into reasonable compass. On the other hand, such a book as Lord Macaulay's History of England, or Dean Milman's Latin Christianity, is obviously not well fitted for school-room reading, on account of the length at which it dwells upon one particular period or subject alone. In short, in the compilers' words, "the former course is usually found to render the study of history uninteresting. The latter (although the works themselves are fascinating) is unsatisfactory, because it is not sufficiently comprehensive." The plan which Miss Sewell and Miss Yonge (we are sorry to have always to speak of them in this awkward dual fashion, but as they have intertwined themselves like Beaumont and Fletcher or Erckmann-Chatrian, there is no help for it) have devised for supplying the deficiency is to make extracts from standard histories and connect them by a thread of intermediate sketches which give a general idea of the period treated of. Thus passages taken from Gibbon, Sir Francis Palgrave, Deans Milman, Hook, and Church, Mr. Freeman, and other writers, who are authorities on their own subjects, are arranged chronologically, and so form a kind of continuous patchwork of history. The abruptness and want of connexion which generally characterize a book of extracts are avoided by the narrative supplied by the compilers, and by the judgment with which the selection is made. That the writers drawn upon should in all cases be of equal celebrity is of course impossible, if the work is to be in any way continuous. If no first-rate writer happens to have treated the particular subject required, a second-rate one must serve the purpose.

Neither can the compilers be held answerable for every statu-

* Historical Selections. A Series of Readings from the Best Authorities on English and European History. Selected and Arranged by E. M. Sewell and C. M. Yonge. London: Macmillan & Co. 1868.

European History. Narrated in a Series of Historical Selections from the Best Authorities. Edited and Arranged by E. M. Sewell and C. M. Yonge. 11. 1083-1228, London: Macmillan & Co. 1870.

Richard the First and the Third Crusade. A Book for Young People. From the French. By the Rev. Charles Foran, Oxon, Belmont House, St. Leonard's, Sussex. London: Wyman & Sons. 1870.

ment or opinion of the authors made use of, though we think that, in the instance of Roscoe's account of the Battle of Hastings, a note might have been appended with advantage. Gyrrh was not, as Roscoe states, "Earl of York," but of the East Anglians, the Northumbrian earldom being held by Morkere. It might also have been explained that the absence of cavalry in the English army, which, according to Roscoe, "has been pronounced a capital error on the side of Harold," was scarcely Harold's fault, unless it is held that he ought to have made a complete and sudden change in the tactics of his nation. That most unadvised of innovators, "Timid Earl Ralf" had some ten years earlier tried the experiment of making the English "contra morem in equis pugnare," the result of which had been the ignominious flight of Ralf and his whole army.

The majority of the selections, however, are from first-rate modern writers. Mr. Freeman supplies a general account of England before the Conquest; Deans Hook and Church have furnished the histories of Lanfranc and Anselm, the two great foreign ecclesiastics who did so much for Rufus and for Henry in their struggles against Robert and the purely Norman party. From Sir Francis Palgrave has been taken the history of Queen Margaret's attempts to civilize or to Anglize the Scots—a particularly well chosen passage, as it clearly explains what Scotland really then was, and what it afterwards became. The compilers utter a gentle protest against the severity of his strictures on the efforts of Margaret, whose chief errors, after all, proceeded from not acting in accordance with the maxim, surtout point de zèle. From him, too, has been taken the powerful, but somewhat overwrought and sensational, account of the death of Rufus. The more recently published volume European History contains amongst other things an abridgment of Professor Stubbs's preface to the Gesta Regis Henrici Secundi. This furnishes a good example of the way in which a collection of extracts like the present may be useful. The Gesta is not the sort of book generally to be found in school-rooms or drawing-rooms, and therefore the fine essay on Henry II. prefixed to it would otherwise be likely to be lost to ordinary readers. A full chronological index and a table of contemporary Sovereigns add to the usefulness of this second volume.

To those who are familiar with the works laid under contribution the interest of these two books lies in the original matter, which is thoroughly good historical writing—quiet in style, fair in tone, and free from all sentimental weakness. For example, there is none of the common lamentation over the Norman Conquest. No patriotically inclined English reader, we suspect, but at the bottom of his heart dislikes hearing that men of his own name were conquered by Normans, or, as the Chronicle still more painfully puts it, "French." The misleading, though convenient, term of Anglo-Saxons is agreeable in so far as it softens the unpleasantness of the transaction; but unless, with the cheerful poet who composed "The Tith Little Island," we regard Duke William's invasion as a testimony to the charms and advantages of England, the fact of the Conquest still remains unpleasant to the ordinary English mind. But the compilers of the Historical Selections have taken care to point out what is forgotten in the popular view of the subject, that it was the infusion of Norman blood and spirit which gave the energy and vigour to which we now lay claim. The following description of the pure English race, un-leavened by Dane or Norman, deserves quoting for its terseness and general truth:—

Sturdy and resolute, with great natural capacity and a deep sense of the poetical, but lacking energy and enterprise, the English of that period had honesty, but not honour; strength, but not spirit; pride, but not enthusiasm; intellect, but scarcely vigorous mental life, while sloth and actuality hindered the exercise even of the powers which they possessed. True-hearted but uncouth men, with great faculties, unavailing because never roused: such they were, and such in all human probability would they have remained but for their enemies.

But whilst such stern justice is dealt out to the old English, the Normans are somewhat tenderly handled. William certainly cannot be accused of treating his countrymen with weak indulgence, but his impartiality mainly sprang from a determination to be master in his own dominions. It might be pointed out that in one quality—mercy—the Normans were markedly inferior to those they conquered. That frightful cruelty which reached its climax in a De Belesme or a Fitz-Hubert, tearing out the eyes of child hostages, torturing and impaling prisoners of war, is hardly conceivable in a man of the pure English race, which has at all times been brutal rather than positively cruel. To the epithet of "chivalrous" the Normans are undoubtedly entitled, and their chivalry fostered a spirit of enterprise, and occasionally prompted actions of fitful generosity. But they had not much of the character which people trained on Tennyson's poems would attribute to chivalrous heroes. In real life, the elements of good in early Norman chivalry were almost counterbalanced by the heartless contempt with which its disciples were taught to regard men of meaner rank; and the ruffianly barons who turned England into a Pandemonium during Stephen's nineteen years of anarchy do not speak well for the system under which they had been reared. Norman chivalry required to be blended with the English respect for law and spirit of freedom before its brighter side appeared. Its glory is a kind of after-glow. That, when its aims and follies had died away, its ideal continued to influence men, and gave form to the great poem of Spenser, is the best proof how much real good was in it. That the present authors, however, did not let away by the glitter of romance, or by reminiscences of the Waverley Novels, is shown by the sketch they give of that boasted hero of chivalry, Richard Cœur de Lion. Instead of the Richard of the Tahman and Isabelle, of Blondel and Robin Hood, the Richard against whom in short, the legendary Richard—we have a plain unvarnished account of the bold Angevin who is commonly looked upon as an English hero:—

The aweless lion could not wage the fight—

Chivalry and romance have given a charm to Richard's character which it is to be feared would be found to vanish on nearer investigation. Generous he was undoubtedly, and brave even to rashness; but his ambition was selfish and unjust, and his temper uncontrollable; and though many of his faults may be attributed to his early education, and under better influence and in happier times he might have proved himself a sovereign of no ordinary stamp, he certainly cannot be said to deserve the enthusiasm which is so often lavished upon him.

The careful distinguishing of the Angevin princes from the Normans, with whom they are usually confounded, is also a praiseworthy feature.

The remaining work on our list, Richard the First and the Third Crusade, by the Rev. Charles Forge, Oxon, is vaguely stated to be "from the French," of which the assertion that "all Frenchmen wish to give their country its natural boundaries" is internal evidence. We presume, however, that the solemn advice printed on the fly-leaf is Mr. Forge's own:—

TO MY PUPILS.

HISTORY IS PHILOSOPHY teaching by Examples.

Read History.

BIOGRAPHY IS HISTORY speaking by Examples.

Read Biography

Avoid Sentimentalism and Sensationalism; they are weak.

Read Sir Walter Scott's Historical Novels; they are unsurpassed.

Read Cooper's; they are delightful.

But read Novels only as a refreshment after your severer studies.

But after reading this sound advice one would not expect to find Mr. Forge, or his French original, falling back upon the pages of the Tahman for a description of Queen Berengaria—a description, too, which mainly refers to the part enacted by the Berengaria of the novel. When Scott wrote that "she gambolled with the freedom of a young lioness, who is unconscious of the weight of her own paws when laid on those whom she sports with," he was thinking of the cruel trick she is made to play Sir Kenneth, upon whose fictitious misfortunes the plot of the Tahman turns. But the woes of Kenneth and Edith are unknown to history, and a passage constructed with reference to them is out of place in an historical work. Another remark which occurs on glancing over this book is that the first business of a translator has been imperfectly discharged. "Saxe" is not English for Saxony, nor "the Gallois" and the "Pays de Galles" for the Welsh and Wales; "his fiancée" would have been better rendered by "his betrothed," and the "abbés" who are represented as figuring at the coronation of Richard should have been abbots. To say that Matthew Paris styles the patriotic Londoner, William "le Barbu," is likely to give a false impression that Matthew wrote in French. The original Willielmus dictus Barbatus vel Barba, should have been preserved, or else translated into English. And we may add, by the way, that the only son of Henry I. was not Henry, but William. As for the composition, it is careless throughout, and Mr. Forge's pupils, it is to be feared, will hardly learn a good English style from such an example as the following:—

His hand on his sword, Richard, who had already received at Tours the sign of a crusader, when he was apprised of the fall of Jerusalem, burned with indignation against the Mussulmans guilty of such crimes, and swore a second time to cross the seas and bring them to punishment.

Neither do we much admire the description of Richard's personal appearance: the privilege of talking nonsense about their heroes' eyes ought to be confined to novelists:—

His eyes flashed fire in the transport of his passion, and in the excitement of the battle-field; but in the sweet intercourse of private life that terrible expression gave way to one altogether irresistible and seductive, and love and affection melted from their azure depths.

Richard's character, however, is more fairly treated than might be expected from a writer who disquisitions on the azure depths of eyes. He relates, with no attempt at palliation, the quarrel with the French knight Des Barres, an affair in which Richard, despite his lauded chivalry and generosity, showed how childishly malevolent he could be when his vanity was hurt; and the King's rapacity and unscrupulousness in screwing money out of his people are not disguised. But the book, if with no glaring faults, and with some merits, is too poor in style and composition to be accounted a successful work.

GRAY'S BIRDS OF THE WEST OF SCOTLAND.*

THERE is something in the thorough knowledge and ardent love of a subject which may be trusted to preserve a writer, however technical or limited may be his task, from dullness or lack of general interest. It might have been feared that the work of a professed ornithologist, limiting himself to a narrow and out-of-the-way province of the British Isles, would be about the last theme whereof to make a readable volume. Yet, precise as Mr. Gray shows himself in his treatment of natural history, and heedful as he is throughout of what is due to the requirements of science, he is nowhere open to the charge of dryness, nor can it be said that the interest of the general reader has been sacrificed on the altar of pedantry. His intense sympathy with the feathered races which he has made the study of his life finds vent in a certain warmth of description of which the reader can scarcely fail to catch the glow. Grave and measured as he is in style, he can rise to pathos in depicting the wrongs done to his favourites and companions by the cruelty, the greed, and the ignorance of mankind. We are moved to mourn with him over the extirpation which has befallen or which speedily threatens many a noble or curious breed; and greatly should we share his joy if our voice might perchance reinforce the plea which he feelingly puts in for mercy and care towards the varieties which still exist, as well as for an intelligent and loving study of what forms one of the leading wonders and charms of creation. It is not the ornithologist alone who will deplore the almost total disappearance of the golden eagle, whose very presence, as our author justly urges, gives a character to much of the finest scenery in Britain. Subjected to a relentless persecution which makes it a wonder that the bird should have survived at all, the Western counties and islands form now its only resting-place in the breeding season. On all the outer Hebrides the true golden eagle—Aquila chrysaetos, the "Iolair dhub" of the Gael—is still a well-known denizen, and from Barra Head to the Butt of Lewis Mr. Gray was enabled to trace many an eyrie during the breeding months of 1867. On North Uist there were two eyries last year; one containing but a single young bird, which was unluckily within too easy reach of the cragman to be let alone, but which Mr. Gray found thriving fairly well in captivity. In the islands of Lewis and Harris the birds are best known where the scenery is grandest. On Benbecula, where they are frequently seen, there are no eyries; but on the next island, South Uist, one is found every year on Mount Hecla. Thither the old birds, "the King of Hecla" and his mate, may "be seen almost daily carrying with their strong talons a young lamb each to their eyriets, the shepherds of Skye breathing vengeance against the pride and pest of the parish." True to its name, the Iolair dhub of the Western Isles is blacker, while smaller in size than those of the mainland—a difference of bulk due, in Mr. Gray's opinion, not so much to comparative scantiness of food or hardship of climate as to specific variation in nature, traceable equally in certain allied birds of California and Texas. Many anecdotes of the predatory habits, the powers of flight, and other characteristics of these splendid but now rare birds have been brought together by the writer during the twenty years which he has spent in executing his design, traversing repeatedly the entire coast-line of Scotland, besides making almost every variety of woodland and moorland so many observatories of the manifold phases of bird life.

* The Birds of the West of Scotland, including the Outer Hebrides. By Robert Gray, late Secretary to the Natural History Society of Glasgow. Glasgow: Murray & Son. 1871.

Supplementing his own observations by a careful and extensive course of reading, Mr. Gray has made his volume a kind of repertory of all that has been added to this branch of ornithology since the labours of Sir William Jardine, Professor Macgillivray, and Mr. Selby. With the study of the records left by the older Scottish writers, more or less scientific, he has joined the personal inspection of nearly all the collections of birds, public and private, throughout Scotland, gaining thereby the advantage of putting to the test the accuracy of previous descriptions. He has thus been enabled to correct sundry prevalent errors, though, in justice to the soundness of earlier or still popular impressions, room must yet be left for possible changes in the physical conditions of life. Thus, birds like the Grey Shrike (Lanius excubitor), Great Spotted Woodpecker (Picus major, or "Snaagan darnich" of the natives), and Shore Lark (Alauda alpestris), formerly represented as rare, have been found by Mr. Gray to be now almost regular winter visitors in great numbers and scattered over a wide tract of country, although making their first appearance in the North-eastern district of Scotland; while the Hobby (Falco subbuteo), Wryneck (Trochus tauricus), Tree Sparrow (Passer montanus), and some other species, formerly looked upon as mere stragglers into North Britain, are now known to extend their breeding stations even to the westernmost counties. On the other hand, not a few species recently announced as new to Scotland are shown to have been familiar to older authorities. In Don's Fauna of Forfarshire, for example, several species, such as the Red-backed Shrike (Lanius collurio), Nuthatch (Sitta europæa), and others are catalogued as being well known in the county as far back as the opening of the present century. The observations of friends, whether naturalists by profession or amateurs in science, have been of especial use to our author in completing his notices of the migratory birds, according their seasons of advent and disappearance, with the range and nature of their haunts. One of the most interesting birds of Scotland, which, from being comparatively common, has become, with the extinction of the kite and hawk, the rarest of all, is the Osprey (Pandion Haliaetus or Iolair wing). It has even been stated at times that the osprey now breeds anywhere in Britain. Mr. Gray has had the satisfaction of finding that there are still three or four breeding stations of this bird in Scotland, which are strictly protected. Another station, the most westerly, is in Wigtownshire, while both in the counties of Kirkcubright and Inverclyde eggs have been taken within the last three seasons. Mr. Gray has seen young birds recently trapped, in a poulterer's shop in Glasgow, and he remembers the bird sitting in Loch Awe and Loch Doe, though not of late years. From Inch Galbraith on Loch Lomond, from Loch Maree, as well as Loch Awe, Loch Menteith, and other former haunts, the osprey has disappeared, save that a stray bird may be seen at times hovering in the neighbourhood of the islands where the nests were found of old. It is but a rare straggler to the Outer Hebrides, a solitary specimen having been taken at Barra, and in Islay it is extremely rare. The most recent instance of its being met with in the mid-districts of Scotland was in October 1866, on the river Carron, between Falkirk and Larbert, where, after eluding a host of enemies during six days, it was shot with a perch in its clutch. Mr. Gray's opinion concurs with those of most other competent naturalists that there is no specific distinction between the British osprey and the Paudion Carolinensis of North America, or the allied birds of Asia and Europe in general, although the eggs of the American species seemed to him invariably richer in colour.

That the falcon tribe should have become comparatively rare of late years is to a great extent accounted for by the disuse of trained birds of this class for the purposes of sport. As a natural enemy of the farmyard and preserves, it could hardly survive the withdrawal of the artificial shield of protection. Representatives of the leading species are, however, still to be met with in the more out-of-the-way districts. Although a rare bird, the Gyr falcon, better known as the Greenland falcon (Falco candicans), is frequently seen both by sportsmen and naturalists, chiefly on the Western coasts of the Hebrides, but even in Aberdeenshire, and as far South as Scarborough. The Iceland falcon, or Labrador falcon of Audubon, is by no means uncommon; and even the Peregrine, Sheablag, though subjected to an extraordinary amount of persecution, still holds its ground in the tracts where it has been well known for centuries, and may be called a common bird from Burrow Head to Cape Wrath. It abounds in all the Western Isles. On the mainland the ravages of keepers and collectors have grievously thinned its numbers, and deserted eyries are to be widely seen. Compared with the Hebridean peregrines, those of the mainland are comparative pignies; but differences of more size, in the opinion of the best naturalists, are not to be taken as proofs of the deterioration of species. Whether in America or elsewhere, there is—as Mr. Gray is supported in thinking—no real specific difference between F. peregrinus, F. matron, and F. nigripes. Our author's partiality to this beautiful bird leads him to defend it from the charge of cruelty in killing more than its needful prey—striking down birds and leaving them dead, without further touching them. But even the anecdotes which his own note-books supply weaken sadly the case for the peregrines against the sportsman as to their being "too generous to imitate man in killing what they do not require." Of the Red-footed Falcon (Falco rupestris), Mr. Gray is happy in introducing to the public the only specimen which he knows to have been met with in Scotland. This singularly rare bird—a full-grown hen—was shot in Aberdeenshire, though it is by no means so uncommon in South Britain. Its stomach contained beetles, from which it may be inferred that, like many of its congeners, it is not so destructive of game as many preservers imagine. The Merlin, or Seag, Falco Eximius, a courageous little bird, is widely distributed throughout Western Scotland, including the Hebrides. Its habits are social, leading it to haunt the church towers, gables, and chimney tops of large towns, partly in pursuit of casual prey. Two birds came into Mr. Gray's hands which had been captured in Glasgow as black as sweeps from having haunted the chimneys after the pigeons and sparrows that doted there for warmth. The habits of the Kestrel—Falco tinnunculus—by far the commonest of the raptorial birds of West Scotland, are less interesting in the eyes of the naturalist. All that is new in Mr. Gray's observation of it is its being partly nocturnal in its flight, he having seen it on the hough-heads near Dunbar, about nightfall, snatching at ghost moths and large beetles as they hovered above some grassy patches near the edge of the cliffs. Of the terror inspired by the eagle-like dart or swoop of the Merlin our author's experience supplies a characteristic instance:—

On the east of Scotland, where I studied the habits of raptorial birds for many years, I remember some years ago seeing this Falcon capturing snipes very cleverly at the sea-shore. At a particular part of the coast near Dunbar, where a rivulet enters the sea, the snipes fed in great numbers at low tide, the ground, which was covered with small brown pebbles, being well adapted for the concealment of birds. With the most punctual regularity, a pair of Merlins used to come as I made my appearance at this place, and hover about till I had raised a brace, which were immediately pounced upon. But after a time the snipes became so terror-stricken that a hundred shots would not frighten them; nor could a single bird be raised, though I saw them occasionally skulking under the stones. I found them more than once, indeed, paralyse with fear, and so heedless of anything save the hawk, that I was able to pick up one or two and transfer them to my bag while my two friends were flying overhead disappointed of their usual supply, and doubtless in wonder at this sporting novelty. Ultimately, however—for the snipes persisted in frequenting the place, though an unusual one—these birds acquired so much cunning that they ran to conceal themselves under the slimy stones below tide mark, thrusting their bodies, crab-like, into the crevices as soon as the Merlins and I came in sight! At such times their hurry was extremely diverting; and as the facts I narrate extend over a length of time, I could not help being struck with the behaviour of the snipes during the protracted disturbance they were subjected to.

The destruction wrought by the greed or cruelty of man upon the winged natives of Scotland has in some slight measure been compensated by the introduction of the pheasant, an exotic bird which seems to find itself at home, so far as climate is concerned, throughout the length and breadth of Europe, although requiring the aid of artificial protection against its human or other enemies. The pheasant is reported by Mr. Gray to be extensively naturalized in the Western counties, and as far inland as Ross-shire and Ayrshire. The first mention of the bird in Scotland occurs in a Preservation Act of James VI. or I., June 8, 1594. The flight of the strong-winged true game of the glen is very different from that of the pampered half-tame denizens of Southern preserves. How far the introduction of the partridge into Scotland may have been artificially brought about, or have followed naturally upon the reclamation of waste land and the advance of husbandry, it may be difficult to decide; but it does not appear to have made its way farther West than Islay, Mull, and Skye, while it is known to have been introduced into Harris by Mackenzie of Seaforth not more than eighty years ago, and also into Lewis, where it has failed to thrive to the same extent.

No bird has received of late years greater attention than the Great Auk—Alca impennis or An Gearbhuid. Mr. Gray's notice of the "Garfowl," so noted in ancient story, so full of melancholy interest to the naturalist of to-day, contains an excellent summary of all that is handed down from early times, combined with the descriptions of those who had seen perhaps the last specimen alive. The numbers of skins, skeletons, detached bones, and eggs of the rare, if not extinct, British auk are carefully tabulated by Mr. Gray, together with the countries which possess them; the finest specimen of all being that in the British Museum, knocked down with an oar by some sailors at Papa Westra in 1812. Whether a living representative of the race is destined once again to gladden the eyes of ornithologists, or to excite the interest of the larger class who are perpetually on the look-out for novelties, is a matter for hope or desire rather than for speculation. Unfortunately, the mournful conviction is forced upon us, as it is upon our author, that "its doom will most likely be sealed by its re-discovery." While the merciless hand of man is doing so much to thin or extirpate the native varieties of fowl, the greater is the value and the interest which attach to catalogues or descriptions so carefully drawn up and so thoroughly worked out as those of Mr. Gray.

SALA'S PAPERS HUMOROUS AND PATHETIC.*

THIS little book lets us into a curious piece of information. Mr. Sala tells us in his preface that he has selected from his works the papers of which it is composed, and has prepared them, chiefly by considerable excisions, for the purpose of public reading. We fear that this fact throws a ghastly light upon the intellectual condition of our fellow-countrymen. We do not mean by this to say anything against the literary merits of the articles. There is, for example, a description of Niagara in winter which, for anything we need say to the contrary, is as graphic as most descriptions of Niagara. But we confess we are totally unable to realize the state of mind which leads a person to spend a certain quantity of coin and half an hour of time in order to hear another person read a description of Niagara aloud. People talk about the modern tendency to sensational exhibitions, and complain that managers endeavour to attract crowds by noisy, indecent, and dangerous performances. It may be so, for the world is wide and there is room for many tastes; but we may safely say that at no period of history with which we are acquainted has a form of amusement been devised so exceedingly mild and unobjectionable as that which is now offered. The British public must be very amusable, or must be very hard up for amusement, before it betakes itself to listen to a piece of ordinary prose which does not even affect to be dramatic; and we have little hesitation in saying that few persons are less likely to admire such an amusement than Mr. Sala himself. Yet he must be singularly free from vanity if he is not conscious of a gentle complacency at the thought that he can evoke admiration so ardent, if so ill directed. Perhaps he feels a little foolish at the rather grotesque form which his auditors' hero-worship takes, but no man could be stoical enough to refuse to gratify it. He condescends to clear up one bit of personal history which has perplexed the minds of many writers. We do not know what were the multitudinous forms taken by the legend which has gathered round the first appearance of this new luminary in English literature. Doubtless an event of such importance would go through many metamorphoses when subject to the popular imagination. Luckily, for once the hero can himself dispel the myths which have concealed the nucleus of fact. Mr. Sala, it seems, was already the author of a story in the Family Herald when he was one night locked out of his house with the sum of ninepence in his pocket, and, not having the courage to take a lodging on credit, walked the streets till next morning. Like a sensible man, he profited by his adventure to write an account of it, which Mr. Dickens inserted in Household Words; and he has ever since been a contributor to that periodical and its successor. Told in this bald way, the story sounds rather commonplace; though we can easily imagine how in skilful hands it would be converted into a thrilling narrative of a penniless and homeless man of genius springing by one bound into success, and deriving from his very misfortunes the materials for his future glory. But even in its baldest form it is in one sense rather curious. The paper which Mr. Sala composed from his night's wanderings is not a very admirable work of art. It is not equal, for example, to Charles Lamb or to Addison's higher efforts. But it is so far remarkable as it shows a great facility for adopting the style of the most popular author of the time. Mr. Sala can write a bit of Dickens almost as well as Dickens himself. Add a few touches, and the description might do for a chapter in David Copperfield. In the same way, the paper called "Tattyboys Rents" is just one of those descriptions of squalid London in which his original delighted, and we could almost have sworn, were it not that Mr. Sala carefully fences off in brackets a few words supplied by Dickens himself, that the papers published in Household Words had all of them been polished up by the editor. Here, for example, is a passage describing an incident supposed to occur to Mr. Sala—whether historically or not we cannot say—in an attempt to run away from school. He meets a tramp, whose hands and face are "inlaid with a curious chequerwork of dirt, warranted to stand the most vigorous application of a scrubbing-brush," and of whom it is said, "It was a dreadful peculiarity of this man that when he spoke he scratched himself, and that when he didn't speak he gave his body an angular, oscillatory wrench backwards and forwards from the shoulder to the hip, as if he had something to rasp between his jacket and his skin, which there is no doubt he had." The anonymous tramp would have taken his place quite naturally as an inferior member of the society to which Bill Sykes, and the old man who meets Copperfield on his road to Dover, and a hundred other characters in Dickens belong. Obviously, if Mr. Sala did not give promise of much originality, he at least showed himself capable of hitting off with great precision the style in which a certain portion of the public takes unspeakable delight.

It would be rather hard to say what is the precise secret of the charm. One characteristic of Mr. Dickens which undoubtedly contributed very much to his popularity with his thoroughgoing admirers, though it generally repelled his more critical readers, was his delight in cheap pathos. Now although Mr. Sala has chosen to inscribe upon his title-page "humorous and pathetic," we must confess that we fail entirely to detect the slightest touch of the latter quality. We have not only read his papers with perfectly dry eyes, but we can venture to assure the most susceptible young woman who may be inclined to hear them read that she need not be afraid of any unpleasant shock to her feelings. There is indeed a description of an unlucky Jew being cruelly tortured and finally losing his head, which may possibly be supposed to come under this description. But instead of dwelling, after the true Dickens fashion, upon the sentimental side of his victim's suffering, and forcing us to watch him like Fagin tasting every drop of the cup of bitterness, Mr. Sala evidently regards the whole affair from a comic point of view. He is totally insensible to Shylock's argument as to a Jew's possession of the organs bestowed upon a Christian; and he speaks of his tormentor as he would of a young gentleman wrenching knockers off a door instead of crushing a fellow-creature's legs. Neither, to say the truth, does the humour in these papers strike us as very excellent in quality. There is a copious use indeed of some of those tricks of style with which Dickens familiarized us; but for the most part the humour which Mr. Sala undoubtedly possesses does not appear in this part of his writings. We are probably let into the secret of the interest which they possess in a paper called "Down White-chapel Way." There, at a "penny gaff" he listens, amongst other entertainments, to a duet performed by a couple representing a drunken tailor and his wife:—"Mr. S. reproaches Mrs. S. with the possession of a private gin-bottle; Mrs. S. inveighs against the hideous turpitude of Mr. S. for pawning three pillowcases to purchase beer. The audience are in ecstasies. A sturdy coal-heaver in the stalls slaps his thigh with delight. It is so real." The sturdy coalheaver represents the average reader. He slaps his thigh or indulges in some similar manifestation of pleasure when he reads Mr. Sala's adventures on that historic night when he had only ninepence in his pocket. There is nothing tragic and nothing even decidedly comic in them. But then we have all gone through experiences sufficiently near to enable us to appreciate the strict fidelity of the story. A sailor cast away at sea, or a traveller lost in a boundless desert, is a more imposing figure; but then few people have imaginations vivid enough to produce a fair representation of their feelings. A night in London streets, with its trivial incidents—the encounter with a policeman, or a stray dog, or a fire-engine, or a rival tramp—just comes home to our bosoms. A crowd of holiday-makers in a picture gallery will pass by the most poetical saints and virgins, the most exquisite works of the great colourists, or the most glowing landscapes, to fasten with intense delight upon anything that reminds them of their daily lives. Hogarth is infinitely more to their taste than Titian, though Hogarth is growing rather too old-fashioned. But a realistic picture of a contemporary English mob, inferior as may be the art, will at once call forth a genuine spark of enthusiasm. On the same principle, readers who would be utterly insensible to any refined observation of character or sentiment are carried away by a simple photographic description of the streets in which they walk, the clothes in which they dress, or the dinner which they eat every day. We do not, of course, mean to imply that simple accuracy of detail is sufficient to excite their interest. Some touch of the grotesque, or the humorous, or the pathetic, must be added, and there must be a certain skill in grouping the objects to be portrayed; and in the "Key of the Streets," for example, there is evidence that Mr. Sala knows how to select the most impressive facts. But still wonderfully little appeal to the imagination and the feelings is necessary in order to make a tolerably good likeness amusing; and, as it is generally said that any man might write an interesting book by simply giving a perfectly sincere autobiography, so it seems that a man need do little more than set down briefly and distinctly what he sees whilst taking an hour's stroll in London in order to induce Londoners to hang upon his pages with delight. Great indeed is the force of simple unambitious realism, with just enough of the humorous in it to prevent its sinking into absolute dullness.

* Papers Humorous and Pathetic. By G. A. Sala. London: Tinsley Brothers, 1871.

Mr. Sala, however, soon soared above these humble efforts, though we know not whether his more ambitious performances are likely to be better appreciated. They depend, indeed, partly upon the same principle. Mr. Sala is a cosmopolitan after a fashion. He delights in reminding us at every moment that he has travelled in various quarters of the globe. We have in this little volume sketches from the United States, from Paris, from Venice, and from Holland. They are not bad of their kind, and we admire the audacity with which the writer plunges into the most hackneyed topics. He has a plan of his own for giving them freshness. "Understand," he says, when beginning the thousand-and-first description of Niagara, "that I abandon any attempt at picturesque narrative, or at striving to emulate that which has been done, and done admirably, by a hundred men of letters." Though after this preface he naturally proceeds to imitate his predecessors a little, we must do him the justice to say that he generally keeps his word, and endeavours to set forth the scene before him, not as it would present itself to the eyes of a poet or a philosopher, but as it strikes a shrewd, sensible cockney, but still a cockney to the backbone. It is his evident pride that he looks upon Niagara or the Bridge of Sighs without the smallest attempt to get up the proper conventional emotion, but from the point of view of a Cook's tourist of rather superior abilities. He carries London with him everywhere, hates humbug, despises sentiment, and if in so doing he misses the deepest significance of the scenes, he at least tells us what is perhaps worth knowing—just how it strikes a thoroughgoing Londoner who won't condescend to varnish his emotions. We laugh at our American cousins for their resolutely prosaic way of contemplating the world; but in that particular respect the Americans are perhaps more allied to Englishmen of the ordinary type than we generally acknowledge. At any rate, whatever the value of such observations, we can easily understand that the ordinary Briton enjoys a writer who tells him without nonsense, and with a fair share of humour, though also with a large allowance of affection of superior wisdom, precisely what he, the said ordinary Briton, would feel if transported to the place in question. Yet, we must repeat once more, we are rather surprised that even the ordinary Briton should care to hear such writing read to him in public.

RATIS RAVING.*

WE are working double tides to try to keep up with the Early English Text Society; and the Early English Text Society, or at any rate Mr. Furnivall, as its representative in the outer world, seems to be working equally hard to keep up with us. As we ought to have noticed Andrew Borde, so we ought to have noticed "Ratis Raving" long ago; but for once we will not be behindhand. We had hardly had time to turn our thoughts from Andrew Borde to "Ratis Raving" when what we take to be the very latest publication of the Society has come into our hands in the usual way. This takes the form of a single page, from which we find that, almost as soon as our review of Andrew Borde could have been in the hands of our readers, Mr. Furnivall set to work with a good heart to correct on a little fly-sheet the mistakes which we had pointed out. Nay, more, he showed that his memory reached over a period of several months, as he fell back upon the "Four Supplications" and explained that "gnatonical" does not mean "gnat-like." He adds that the entomological explanation of the word was "copied unthinkingly by Mr. Cowper from an edition of Foxe's Martyrs"—readers of Dr. Maitland will very well remember what edition. So far so good; but Mr. Furnivall is less happy when he corrects his amazing description of Charles the Fifth as "Emperor of Austria" into "Emperor of Germany." Perhaps Mr. Furnivall has been misled by the example of the composers of the Queen's Speech. We know not whether he has yet come back from his rural retreat into some place where he finds it possible to work, but the speed with which his sheet of corrections has come out looks as if he had. If, then, we are right in thinking that Mr. Furnivall has got to his books again, we should recommend a little course of German and other Imperial history before he meddles again with such terrible persons as Emperors, or attempts to quarter them in any particular part of the world. And in anybody but Mr. Furnivall we might be inclined to complain of the breach of literary etiquette which he has committed by attaching to his corrections the name of a supposed author of the article which he quotes. We need not say that we should be guilty of an equal breach of rule if we were to tell him whether his guess is right or wrong. But with Mr. Furnivall we do not get angry at these things. We do not expect him to be governed by the same laws as other men; a little gambol or caper of this kind is merely of a piece with the other gambollings and caperings which went on in Mr. Furnivall's woodland paradise. For aught we know, when Mr. Furnivall sent out his fly-sheet, his head may still have been swimming after a waltz with the fair-haired Alice. How can we expect him to stoop to be guided by the dull prosaic laws of every-day life?

We turn from Mr. Furnivall to his colleague Mr. Lumby, and we find ourselves at once carried back from poetry into prose. There is no romance about Mr. Lumby, at least not in his editorial character. He makes no confessions or revelations beyond the dry description of himself as "late Fellow of Magdalene College, Cambridge." His preface does not contain a single personal detail about himself. We are left to guess whether he lives in town or country, whether he took the side of the Germans or the French, whether he has a wife to chat with or a boy to play with, or even so much as a fair-haired Alice to waltz with. Mr. Lumby is perhaps discreet in not treating us to any of these pleasant little revelations. He certainly acts in a way more conformable to the ordinary practice of scholars. Still it is something of a come-down in the world to turn from the highly wrought picture of Mr. Furnivall's holiday to such humdrum matters as "Ye grette lawis of Scotland of ye gude King David," or even to the more exciting theme of "Taurus cornutus ex patria germinare brutus."

The pieces here brought together consist, as the title-page tells us, of several moral and religious discourses in prose and verse printed in a manuscript in the University Library at Cambridge. They are all important philologically, as giving us a peculiar form of the "Louthiano Inglis," or Lowland Scotch, of which not much has been preserved. They date from the fifteenth century, "the later part of the early period of Scottish literature," and they mark the stage in that dialect when it was no longer, as it had been up to the war of independence, identical with the language of Northern England, but when it had not yet put on that distinct shape of that Scottish language of the sixteenth century which Queen Elizabeth found less easy to understand than French. Its peculiarities are set forth in a paper by Mr. J. A. H. Murray, from which Mr. Lumby gives us a long extract. Mr. Murray rules it to be "pure and unmixed Scotch" of its own date, as distinguished from the later dialect, which he calls "Middle Scotch." One difference which Mr. Murray remarks is curious, as showing a falling back on earlier forms on the part of the later dialect. "The indefinite article is, as in Northern English of same date, a before a consonant, an or ane before a vowel, in contrast with the Middle Scotch usage, as in ane buik, ane kyng (which appears in the Acts of the Scottish Parliament between 1475 and 1500)." But French forms unknown in Southern English have already crept in, as "murderour" for one guilty of murder (murder), from the French meurtre. So we find ruis, which Mr. Murray understands to mean streets, seemingly from the French rue; but Mr. Lumby doubts this interpretation. Stankis again seems to come from the French étang (étang), from stagnum. We get the characteristic plurals in is and the good old participle ending in and, as well as the Scotch form of the past participle in yt. Eka is become a verb; the curious growth of a verb from a conjunction, as also several verbs from adjectives, as gud, yll, lesso, law, riche—a usage still kept up in Scotland, but which in the first two cases at least has no parallel in modern English.

All the pieces of this volume are, as we have said, designed for religious instruction; and it is wonderful how small the proportion is with which any reasonable person of our time would be inclined to quarrel. Confession to a priest is enjoined; the virtues of the Mass are highly extolled, one whole piece indeed being devoted to the subject; and the Sacraments are of course reckoned to be seven. On the other hand, we do not think that there is a single word about invocation of Saints, or anything setting forth the usurped authority of the Bishop of Rome. And, as we so constantly find in mediæval religious writings, there is nothing of that quasi-controversial tone and colour thrown over the whole thing, that tendency to dwell specially on points characteristic of the writer's own sect or school, which is so common in modern writings of the same class. Where everybody is orthodox, where nobody doubts about anything, but where men simply need exhortation to a more lively holding of their faith and a more perfect carrying it out in their works, the character of religious writings is quite different from what it becomes in times when people are always thinking of the difference between opposing parties. There were dissenters in the fifteenth century, but we may doubt whether they had made much way in Scotland; and even in England they were not so prominent as to make simple and devout believers have them constantly before their minds. The consequence is that in these pieces we get much more on those points on which all Christians agree than on those on which they differ, and the greater part of the strictly religious teaching in this volume might be put into a modern sermon or a modern book of devotion without much risk of giving offence. The short piece on the "Vertewis of the Meas" is naturally the one at which modern readers are most likely to stumble. It is certainly startling to find words put into the mouth of St. Paul and of Our Lord Himself of which we find no trace in the New Testament:—

Sanct paul said that rycht as our lord ihesu cryst is mar worthi and mor precious than any uthir creatur that god maid [is this orthodox?], so is he mar mar worthi and mar precious than any uthir orewis or sacrifice that may be said or maid in this erd.

And directly after:—

Item, our lord ihesu said that quhat sum eua. thing þat men with clea

* Ratis Raving, and other Moral and Religious Pieces in Prose and Verse. Edited by J. Rawson Lumby, M.A. London: Published for the Early English Text Society by Trübner & Co. 1870.

hart and gud deuotione askis at the mass in thar praterie, It salbe grantyt thaim or elles bettir and mar propitiable thing, na thai ask hyme be mekill. Item, quicquid orantes petit, &c.

One question we have to ask of Mr. Lumby on a point on which he gives us no help. What is the meaning of the name of the chief piece here printed, the one which gives its name to the volume? What is the meaning of "Ratis Raving"? The name comes from the author of the piece himself, who tells us, towards the end of his first book:—

Now þene, I pray the rest the here,
For now is ended this matere;
The quihik is ratis raving cald,
Bot for no raving I it hald;
Bot for rycht wys and gud teching,
And weill declaris syndry thinge,
That is rycht nodfull for to know,
As the sentens it wyll schaw.

Mr. Lumby has no note upon this, and we cannot find either the word ratis or the word raving in the glossarial index. Is raving used by the author in the modern sense, or does he by raving simply mean dreaming? And, in either case, has raving anything to do with the French rêver, a word whose own origin is very puzzling? And whatever raving may be, what is ratis? We tremble as we ask whether it has anything to do with the "majores muros qui vulgariter vocantur rati" who, according to Giraldus, so irreverently ate up an Irish Bishop's books, and were therefore banished from the island. The black species may have crossed with the Dalriadic colony into the younger Scotia, as the brown species seems to have crossed into England along with the illustrious House of Hanover and Protestant succession. But when they have got there, we do not see what they have to do with moral instructions about "The Foly of Fulye and the Thewis of Wyemen." And we have unpleasant qualms whether our rats may not turn out to have as little to do with the matter as Mr. Funnivall's gnats. But, rats or no rats, the ravings of our worthy author consist of moral instructions, most of which are as much to the purpose now as they were in the fifteenth century. Nearly at the beginning we are taught not to abuse any of the five senses, in reading which we looked with special care to see in what way the seemingly harmless sense of smelling can be turned into an engine of sin. Perhaps an extravagant lover of perfumes might come under this head; but on this point our raver does not enlarge, but rather speaks in a way which shows that he was in his age a sanitary reformer:—

Than sonar sleis ill air nor sword,
As men supposis now, veill and mare,
In thair dais than thai did aie,
That ill corrupcionne of aie
Will schort levyinge and mekle empare
The men that cumis quhar it is
And kepis thaim rakeisly and myas
And maisteris gud and kindly skill.

When he gets to the sense of touch, his illustration is curious enough. God gives grace to those who keep their hands innocent, and the example given is how "Gothra the bulgonè"—by which we are to understand Godfrey of Boulogne was able to cut an armed man—was he a foul paynim or a supporter of the rebel Rudolf?—in twain with one blow because he kept his hands innocent. There is much to say about loyalty, the word being used in the wider sense of strict adherence to engagements in general, and we are told how

This lumbertis gevis it mekle price,
Thair dar weill better trust than tyll,
Than tyll the emperouris wyll,
Or tili his obligatiounne,
Fore all his riches and renoune.

Considering that this was most likely written during the reign of Frederick the Third, we are not surprised—notwithstanding the splendid cope in which he is arrayed at Innsbruck by the piety of his penniless son—at the somewhat humiliating comparison.

We should like to know the piece of history or legend referred to in the following lines:—

"Be þone man the quihik wald nocht
Put godis help in to his thoct,
Bot traitis hail in his riches,
And neuer of vanite wald sess."
This was the superscriptione
One mortymar was wryten doune,
Quhen he was ded, upone his graif
This wordis ware his ypatif.

Is this Mortymar the Roger of the century before—famous at Nottingham—or who? Mr. Lumby gives no help. There is a great deal of good advice in the book, especially about marriage and the behaviour of women. Daughters should be married while young, and in choosing a wife a man should look out for the daughter of a good mother. There is also a very pretty description of childhood and its toys. Altogether, our author, if he raved in the strongest sense of the word, certainly kept a good deal of method in his madness.

O'SHAUGHNESSY'S LAYS OF FRANCE.*

THIS book contains an expanded version of five out of the twelve Lays attributed to the Anglo-Norman poetess, Marie de France. Mr. O'Shaughnessy would have done well to indicate, however briefly, the mode of treatment which he has adopted, and it is a blemish in his undertaking that he has preferred to omit any such explanation. Among the Anglo-Norman trouvères, Marie holds, if not the first place, at least a very prominent one. When Normandy was lost to England in 1204, there seems to have been a considerable emigration to this country of persons who had become attached to English rule; and among these, Marie is said to have changed her abode. Her Lays at any rate were very probably written on this side of the water, and certainly in the early part of the thirteenth century. The only MS. copy of them is preserved in the British Museum, and stands No. 978 in the Harleian Collection. Besides these twelve Lays, Marie wrote a collection of Fabliaux, and a sort of Inferno of her own, being a description of the descent of one Owayne Miles into St. Patrick's Purgatory.

The Lays have that peculiar air of romance, always on the border of the supernatural, and often passing it, which seems to have been indigenous to France at the dawn of literature, and never to have reached far beyond its limits. A comprehensive and very capable analysis of them was made early in this century by a female critic named Betham, and was published in 1816. Out of the seven Lays which Mr. O'Shaughnessy has left untouched, the three most remarkable are the "Lai de Frayne," "Bisclaveret," and "Sir Lanval." The word bisclaveret was the Norman equivalent for wer-wolf; and this tale is a very ghastly commemoration of the vengeance which overtook the unfaithful and treacherous wife of a French baron who had the misfortune to be plagued by this double existence. Being destined to become a wolf on three days in every week, he yielded to the obstinate solicitations of his wife, and revealed the means by which he might be prevented from returning to human form when the fated three days were over. She adopts the indicated method, and marries a paramour. In the capacity of a tamed wolf the injured baron becomes a favourite at court, and is at last able to wreak a terrible vengeance on the guilty pair, and to recover his proper body and position. The "Lai de Frayne" is, in our opinion, a more worthy subject for treatment than any of the rest, and it was a pity to omit it in this volume of expanded versions. It describes the fortunes of twin sisters, one of whom is called La Coudre (coudrier), the hazel, and the other La Frayne (fiène), the ash.

Mr. O'Shaughnessy's selections are "Laustic, or the Night-ingle," the "Two Lovers," "Chaitivel," "The Lay of Eliduc," and "Yvenec," or "Ywonec," as it is in the MS. These Lays stand eighth, sixth, tenth, twelfth, and seventh in the original collection. We propose to notice in detail the last two only, which are worked with especial care, and are both in subject and treatment very sufficient specimens of the rest. And we adopt this limitation the more readily, as the poetry of Mr. Morris's school, to which Mr. O'Shaughnessy belongs, has a decided tendency to grow long-winded. We are very far from taking up the extraordinary position of a writer in the Quarterly Review, and condemning those poets who go for their material and their inspiration to a nearer or a remoter past; and it would not be a good sign for the progress of taste if a deaf ear were turned to the lays of Chaucer's "olde gentil Bretons" (les anciens Bretons courtois). But the contemporary workers in this field are apt to run into an extreme, and to go on from page to page as if the history of a look or a sigh were the one engrossing topic in the universe.

The "Lay of Eliduc" has been very largely added to and altered by Mr. O'Shaughnessy. There are about 2,200 lines in his version against about 1,100 in the MS. Eliduc is a French baron who, falling under the King's displeasure, quits his palace and his wife, and goes to try his fortunes in England. In England he is received with much distinction at the Court of some vague chieftain; and with the aid of his ten knights, the small retinue who followed him from France, he is able to save his new friends from a formidable invasion, and completely to annihilate the foe. The rest of the tale is soon told. Though noble-minded in the grain, Eliduc is not proof against admiration and prolonged absence; and love grows up between him and the chieftain's daughter, Guilliadun, who at last returns with him to France. On the voyage a storm rises, and, in her hearing, Eliduc is charged with being its cause, as he brings home this princess, while a wife is still living in his palace. Guilliadun swears to death on hearing of her lover's marriage, and as she dies the storm passes away. He lays her in a woodland chapel, where by a miracle, after long watching, he discovers the herb that wakes her from her deathlike trance. And here Mr. O'Shaughnessy's version comes to a most unsatisfactory end, by recording how the true wife pined away, and remarking that, though the husband's love has blossomed into a new life, he will have a sorry return home at last. The original legend is much more in harmony with itself and with the temper and feeling of its age. In it, the wife, Guilliadun, is the watcher by the supposed corpse; it is she who miraculously brings about the waking; and when the two women have come to know the truth about themselves and the man they love, it is she who withdraws to some, with an idealised generosity, into the chambered life, whither however she is soon followed by the others also.

* Lays of France (Founded on the Lays of Marie). By Arthur W. F. O'Shaughnessy. London: John Bellamy, 1871.

"Yvonne," though not enlarged with quite the same freedom of addition as "Eliduc," has nevertheless been materially altered, and shown of its proper termination. Bertha is the young bride of an ogre-baron, who shuts her up in a tower. The supernatural element abounds in the sequel, and the virtues of the Sacrament are brought out into prominence. After a long and dreary waiting, she is visited by a princely lover, who has the power of assuming a falcon's shape while passing to her chamber. The Baron brings about his death by fixing a dagger-blade to meet the falcon-form at the window; but Bertha is able to pass out from the tower, and, reaching the palace of her lover, to find him in his proper character still able to make his last farewells. After his death she gives birth to a son, who was "named in lays" Yvonne the Deliverer. Here, again, Mr. O'Shaughnessy ends abruptly; but the legend goes on to tell how Bertha kept the prince's sword till the day of her son's knighthood, and how he was then enabled, by the first stroke he struck, to kill the baron who had wronged his mother and caused his father's death.

These specimens will show sufficiently the kind of method which has been adopted in this volume with reference to the original. It is not a method to be accepted with anything like unqualified approval. All that the author chooses to do is to guard himself against the impression that his work is a mere translation; but he guards Marie de France against nothing. No reader can be satisfied, without a laborious process which scarcely any one will take the trouble to go through, whether this or that page or line of thought and mood of feeling is to be attributed to Marie or to Mr. O'Shaughnessy. The whole position might have been set right by what in itself would have had an independent value—namely, a brief appendix, with some few text passages of the MS., both in the original form and in a completely literal rendering.

We regret the absence of such an obvious appendage all the more because—as we have before remarked in noticing an earlier volume of his—this modern votary of Marie has, in imaginative power, keen intuition, and ear, a genuine claim to be writing poetry, as things go now. There is a passage in the sombre and gloomy poem of "Chaitivel" which, among many others that deserve to be reproduced, seems to be especially representative. Chaitivel was a luckless lover, between whom and his lady, Sarrazine, three phantoms of former lovers intervened, with fatal and supremely grievous results. Altogether the story had better not have been worked out or published; the figures are more shadowy even than the scarcely traceable giant-form of the Cyclops in Turner's picture of the retreating ship of Ulysses; and it is all gloom, no relief. But the drawing of the dwelling-place of Sarrazine, where she used to lead her toiled life, is done with great beauty and effect:—

The slow cloud found it sweet to rest
Over each shadow-haunted tower
Of her lone castle, and to remain
Low brooding over that domain
Of deep autumnal wood and plain
And mirroring lake that the power
The sun and summer owned no flower
Down in the deep and wayward ways
Ruined and lost about her bowers,
Whose desolation was the nest
Of a strange plaintive bird with crest
Of tarnished fiery feathers. Haze
Of changeless morn and noon was blue
Above the still blue of the lake,
Where, year by year, some long dream grew
More and more wonderful, and threw
A stranger spell over wild brake
And dripping mile of sallow sedge—
Where the dark bittern and the crane
Answered with lone unearthly cry,
Or spectral, on the oozy edge,
Some tall grey eagle with wide eye
Stood slumbering.

It would be easy to select a number of isolated touches of real merit, like this of the deer in "Eliduc":—

On where, in wilds of forest grass,
Through sun and shade was wont to pass
The shrinking spirit-slender herd
Of roe.

And Mr. O'Shaughnessy is also an accomplished master in those peculiar turns of rhythm which are designed to reproduce the manner of the mediæval originals. In octosyllables like these—

And the face of his own wife dear

And prayed Love would bless this and this

And marble things fair to behold

there is a halt, a limp, a catch, quite distinct in its effect from the forceful variations of rhythm in the ten-syllable heroic of Milton or of Tennyson; from

Burst after them to the bottomless pit,

or,

And the sword of the tounny across her throat.

Force and vigour and variety do not seem to be at all the qualities aimed at in the halting catch of the octosyllable, which is rather a reproduction of the quaint manner of an age in which metre had not attained its final development. How marked is the mannerism which this peculiarity can introduce may be seen at a glance by comparing a page of these Lays, or of similar work in the same school, with a page of Walter Scott's octosyllabic writing.

Our real quarrel—and it is a serious one—with Mr. O'Shaughnessy and the school to which he belongs arises from the persistency with which it appears by them to be held that poetry is bound to represent the passion of love, with an increasing freedom of delineation upon the physical side. A tolerably advanced point has been reached already; and, to hear the adherents of this school talk, it is not the self-imposed restraints of the school, but only the external repression of accepted social morality, that prevents the limit from being indefinitely extended. Two leading propositions appear to underlie the efforts of this school; first, that the passion of love is by far the most important element in human life; secondly, that art is entitled, even if it is not under an obligation, to give distinct representation and expression to everything that is. When the first of these doctrines is urged, either by implication in some poem or directly in its defence, we certainly do feel grateful that there is still at work so vigorous and masterly a hand as George Eliot's to remind poets and lovers, and everybody in general, that there are such things as law and duty, besides passion; and that, on the whole, the more dignified course for a reasonable being, inheriting the results of many ages of cultivation, would be to subordinate passion to law, rather than to worship passion until it begins to revert towards the fetish influences of very early or very barbarous times. Mr. Swinburne has pushed to sufficiently offensive lengths the second doctrine about the universality of representation, without reserve, as the right, if not the duty, of art; though even he has hitherto remained far behind the brutal indecencies of Walt Whitman. In his version of the Lays of Marie Mr. O'Shaughnessy has in too many passages carried this treatment of his art to an excess which we are bound to censure and regret alike on moral and on literary grounds. Art committed to this fatal theory of the abandonment of all reserve—art, that is to say, divorced from law, and from the accumulated results of moral progress—is not only self-destructive, as history proves again and again, but tends to spread disorganization and destruction in society and in the individual consciousness, as far as its influence reaches.

Our protest against this perversion of art will no doubt be met with contempt by not a few adherents of the view which we are discussing, but it will be the contempt of those who have got out of gear with the higher life, not of the intellect only, but of feeling also.

EASTLAKE'S GOTHIC REVIVAL.*

THAT great reaction from the Renaissance which has characterized the present century, and which has stamped indelible traces on the current art and literature of Europe, deserves and demands an historian. Mr. Eastlake, the Secretary of the Institute of Architects, has undertaken, in the volume before us, to trace the course of this movement in one of its most important developments—that of architecture. It may be doubted, perhaps, whether the time has even yet come for an impartial review of the whole revival. A man would be very bold indeed who should pretend to prophesy the future phases of this memorable intellectual outburst. Who can tell with any accuracy, from the signs of the times, whether the Gothic Revival has culminated, or has begun to wane again, in the perpetual flux and reflux of thought and sentiment? On the other hand, it is clear that, unless the materials for a complete history of this new Renaissance of the nineteenth century are speedily collected, many of them will perish from men's memories. We shall see, in our examination of Mr. Eastlake's volume, that with all his pains and industry some important facts have escaped his research or have been forgotten. This reflection enhances our sense of gratitude to this accomplished writer for the zeal and impartiality with which he has undertaken, without further delay, a difficult and very important task.

Wisely contenting himself with his own special study of the building art, Mr. Eastlake, as the somewhat verbose title of his book tells us, attempts to show how the taste for mediæval architecture, which was never quite extinct in England, has lately been revived among us. Here, to begin with, he has laid hold of an important truth. Gothic architecture had not quite died out when the revival began. We scarcely know what Mr. Eastlake intends his readers to understand by the "two last" (he should have said "last two") centuries; but it is certain that the traditions of what is more properly called Pointed architecture have survived, in stone-producing districts, to our own days. Geology has had much to do with it; just as the fact that Paris commands so beautiful a material for building has given that city a stone architecture instead of a brick one. In the counties of England where good building stone is not procurable, the use of brick has helped to drive the Pointed style out of the field, except indeed in those districts where the abundance of native timber has favoured the retention of the older architectural forms.

* A History of the Gothic Revival: an Attempt to Show how the Taste for Mediæval Architecture which lingered in England during the Two Last Centuries has since been Encouraged and Developed. By Charles L. Eastlake, F.R.S.B., Architect. London: Longmans & Co. 1872.

In his laudable desire to keep clear of ecclesiastical controversies, Mr. Eastlake perhaps depreciates, though unconsciously, the influence which the Caroline Churchmen exerted in stemming the flowing tide of revived Classicism. He speaks indeed of Land's church of St. Catherine Cree, in Leadenhall Street, and of his collegiate buildings at Oxford, and he briefly mentions Cosin's works at Bishop Auckland and at Brancepeth. But other examples might be found. Strange to say, for example, the chapel of Peterhouse, Cosin's most memorable work, is not noticed. Indeed we incline to think from internal evidence, though it is difficult to believe it, that Mr. Eastlake has never visited Cambridge at all. Generally in his book we have been pleased to notice proofs of personal inquiry and examination in most of his criticisms. But his accounts of works in Cambridge are unusually meagre, and seem to be given at second-hand. Indeed in the long list of "selected examples of Gothic buildings erected between 1820 and 1870" (which forms a kind of appendix at the end of this volume), the very early and most remarkable specimens of the Gothic Revival contributed by Wilkins in Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and by Hickman in St. John's College, find no place. We conclude that Mr. Eastlake never saw them, nor heard of them. But no history of the Gothic Revival can be in any sense complete without a comparison of the influence exerted by the two ancient Universities on the secular and religious architecture of England.

With this abatement—which, however, is not an inconsiderable one—Mr. Eastlake's summary of the gradual decline of the Gothic traditions in English architecture may be read with profit. He is scrupulously fair to Sir Christopher Wren, though his own sympathies are with the Pointed school. We doubt, however, if he has given that great architect credit enough for his sense of Gothic proportion. It is Wren's detail that is so disappointing in his Gothic buildings. The masses and outlines are generally most satisfactory. Witness, for instance, his noble tower of St. Mary Aldermary in the City, which might have been made, and ought (at all cost) to have been made, a leading feature in the new Queen Victoria Street. It is still possible to see the tower from one side; but an encroaching pile of warehouses has destroyed a matchless architectural effect. The twin western towers of Westminster Abbey, again, are charmingly proportioned, when seen from a distance—as, for example, from the Serpentine Bridge in Hyde Park—filling up the bottom of the valley down which the West Borne used to find its way to the Thames. It is only the detail, not the mass, that is bad in these towers. We probably owe more than we know of to Wren for his magnanimity in not altogether proscribing Gothic at Westminster; as Inigo Jones would certainly have done in Old St. Paul's had he had the opportunity. Wren's declaration, in his interesting report on the Abbey, which Mr. Eastlake quotes, to the effect that "he would strictly adhere to [the Gothic style] throughout the whole intention" of his projected and partly accomplished restoration, is very remarkable. As there is nothing very new in them, we pass over some interesting discussions of the influence which Horace Walpole's dilettantism had on the continuance and the revival of the Gothic style among us. We come next to Batty Langley, who is little more than a name to architectural students of our time. He is often quoted in derision; but most readers know little or nothing about him. Such persons will find in these pages a very amusing account of the once famous book in which he and his brother so far patronized the Gothic style as to improve it and reduce it to five orders, in harmony with the scientific laws of Vitruvian art. Mr. Eastlake, however, is quite right in giving Batty Langley a place in his catena of those who had a share in keeping alive the Gothic sentiment. He is on newer ground—to us at least—when he proceeds to chronicle actual eighteenth-century works in a quasi-Pointed style, such as those which Thomas Barrett carried out, in 1782, in Lea Priory, Kent (near Canterbury, though Mr. Eastlake forgets to tell us so), afterwards well known as the seat of Sir Egerton Brydges's private press, and very recently improved by Mr. Gilbert Scott and Sir William Chambers, in 1771, at Milton Abbas. It would have added largely to the usefulness and interest of the work if some illustrations of these forgotten designs had been given. Beckford's fantastic "abbey" at Fonthill occupies a large space in Mr. Eastlake's summary. It was the work of James Wyatt, "the destructive," who touched no ancient building that he did not spoil. Would that he had kept himself to such harmless vagaries as Fonthill, and spared us the interior of Salisbury! At this very moment the paintings of the vaulted roof of the choir of Salisbury are being renewed, in memory of the late Bishop, by Messrs. Clayton and Bell. The ruthless whitewash applied by Wyatt had so destroyed the mediæval distemper work that it is scarcely possible to decipher a single figure or a single legend. It was a wanton and most cruel destruction; and must have been a costly one, when the expense of scaffolding is taken into account. Mr. Eastlake is almost needlessly tender to Wyatt's memory, and says more for his works of Gothic restoration at Windsor and Belvoir than we are quite prepared to accept. That Nash ever attempted to design country houses in a Gothic manner will be new, we think, to most readers. James Essex, of Cambridge, was on the whole the foremost of his contemporaries as a practical reviver of Gothic. Mr. Eastlake says of him that "he may be fairly described as the first professional architect of the last century who made a study of ture which is exemplified in the last-mentioned country seats and many others here enumerated, such as Elvaston, Donnington, Hawarden, Knowsley, Eaton, and Eastnor, the growth of a corresponding literature is to be observed. One of the first revivalists, as distinguished from the mere antiquaries, was that prolific writer John Britton, who, born in 1771, did not die till 1858. His Cathedral Antiquities in particular must have produced a very great effect in spreading a love and admiration for the ecclesiastical Pointed style in its highest forms. Among other writers who contributed to the progress of the movement were the elder Pugin and his colleague Willson. But of all these James Carter, using the Gentleman's Magazine as his organ, did the best yeoman's service in the cause of revival by remonstrating against unnecessary destruction and arguing for careful restoration of architectural remains. His writings mark the progress from purely archaeological description to the fervent spirit which distinguished the earlier apostles of the movement.

The names of Cottingham, J. C. Buckler, John Shaw (who built Christ's Hospital), Poynter (who designed St. Katherine's Hospital in Regent's Park), James Savage (to whom we owe the really fine church of St. Luke's, Chelsea, notable for its vaulted roof), Blore, Hickman, and Salvin, are the most distinguished practical architects of what Mr. Eastlake rather unhappily calls the præ-Puginesque period. The list of contemporary writers includes the names of Millers, the historian of Ely, Dr. Milner of Winchester, and Whewell. By a most singular omission Mr. Eastlake makes no mention whatever of two men still more eminent as architectural writers, Thomas Hope and Professor Willis. We cannot account for this oversight; more especially as Whewell is expressly commemorated as having introduced the Pointed styles of the Continent to English students. It was Thomas Hope who was actually the first, in his History of Architecture, to do justice to the Romanesque and Pointed architecture of the Continent. And Professor Willis is, both for foreign and home architecture, facile princeps among professional writers. We hope most sincerely, in the interest of historical truth and justice, that Mr. Eastlake may be called upon to produce a new edition of his work, in which these grave omissions may be rectified. Our space has been exhausted in considering the first half of the volume before us. We hope to notice the later history of the Gothic Revival in a second paper.

THE CHOICE OF A DWELLING.*

THERE are few subjects about which an ordinary Englishman finds himself so much at sea as the means of protecting himself in taking or building a house. Whether he intends to rent, buy, build, or restore a mansion, villa, cottage, or town-house, his dreams are harassed with visions of architects, contractors, artisans, all of whom, he feels, know him to be a novice, and listen with scarcely suppressed pity to his crude ideas upon a subject which concerns the very comfort of his life. It needs no small application to master plans and specifications; and when this stage of adult education is past, there remains a sense of ignorance of details, and of unfamiliarity with the nomenclature of architecture and construction, which he does not like to confess, or to remedy by sitting humbly at the feet of the architect or clerk of the works. In this strait, the natural resource is a book which will furnish simple folk with the results of skilled experience; and though it is seldom wise to quote book-learning to practical people, yet, with a really handy volume upon such a subject as house-building, an intelligent reader might, without distressing himself, so far post himself up in the details and verbiage of the craft he has to encounter as to be able to understand the matters under discussion, and to save himself from being led blindfold into undertakings which he has never contemplated. But till now the handbook meet for laymen such as we have described has been a desideratum. Laxton's Builder's Price-Book, a very useful annual to those who are involved in much brick and mortar, is too strictly professional, and deals only with one side and branch of the subject. The English Gentleman's House, by Mr. Robert Kerr, though a very suggestive and able volume, is enough to frighten average house-builders by the sumptuousness of its conceptions, and the magnificence of scale on which the points "generally necessary" to an English dwelling, in the writer's view, are elaborated; however masterly it may be in its own way, it cannot pretend to perform the functions of a handbook. But the same publisher who brought out Mr. Kerr's work has just performed a similar service for a really handy book, by an experienced and skilful architect, Mr. Gervase Wheeler. Mr. Murray's advice and practical assistance are acknowledged with much frankness in the preface, and the public is at length provided with a well-arranged manual on all questions connected with the erection or purchase of a dwelling, written, as far as possible, in untechnical language, and adapted, it seems to us, to the needs of the most ambitious as well as the humblest-minded of intending housebuilders. And at a time when the Prince of Wales's illness and the supposed defects of drainage and ventilation at Scarborough and Sandringham have been the text of many an exhortation to householders to overhaul their continuously with the revived taste for mediæval architec-

* A Practical Handbook of Useful Information on all points connected with Hiring, Buying, or Building a House, with its Furnish and Garden Outbuildings. By Gervase Wheeler, Architect. London: John Murray, 1871.

domestic arrangements and set their dwellings in order, the appearance of the Choice of a Dwelling is singularly opportune, especially as it devotes more than one valuable chapter to drainage and water-supply, and to those details in house-arrangement as to which we are so much at the mercy of the plumber.

In the first part of the volume, which is taken up with matters preliminary to house-building or house-occupying, soils, materials, and sites are discussed in their order; and though it is premised that gravel, rock, sandy loam, and chalk are better foundation-soils than clay, yet, failing a choice, we are told how to make the best of clay by drainage, which, besides removing noxious fluids from within a house, shall carry off the surface water which is apt to clog the external and internal area of a heavy undrained soil, and by evaporation to become a serious evil. With proper drainpipes to convey water to an ultimate discharge, clay may be made a satisfactory building substratum, and in these pages the secret of sufficiently deep and uniform excavation, and lining with a bed of concrete, is expounded so lucidly that the reader who has to face the dread ordeal of "beginning to build" may, without any intense strain of mind, discover how to protect himself against careless contractors or workmen. With an open-air drain round external walls, and a system of house-drainage starting from below the lowest level of the lowest part of the building, collected to one point and led thence by the main drain, with as few junctions and turnings as may be, to the outfall, and with a map at hand to show the direction, depth, and ramification of the system of house-drains, there need be no uneasiness on this point, especially if the contractor has taken care to secure clear pipes, plenty of water, and a gradual fall, and has trapped every connecting drain at the point of junction. A most valuable section is devoted to the ventilation of drains; and a special caution to get rid of accumulations of noxious gases and the flow of foul air by means of an upright pipe carried above the gutter levels, and discharging high enough to keep clear of any upper windows (p. 10), will be read at the present time with as much interest as profit. Ventilation, indeed, in all its applications is a problem which is thoroughly met in the book before us, as will be conceived when we note that the somewhat unsightly tubular excrescence which runs up the external angle of the turret of an otherwise picturesque country house figured in the vignette at the head of Mr. Wheeler's preface, is a ventilating flue connected with the ceilings of the principal rooms. Equally careful provisions and suggestions are made with regard to an ample and wholesome supply of water for all purposes; and hints on filtration, on trapping waste-pipes of cisterns at the entrances of the drain, and on the often vexatious question of well-sinking—which is seldom carried deep enough—are given to the content of any puzzled householder. He may also by a study of the second chapter learn how to tell good materials from bad, and so, indirectly at least, to gauge the honesty of a builder or contractor. If we may not fathom our fellow-man, we may at least tell the honest brick by its ring and shape; and the mixture of garden mould and road scrapings with pit-sand which is often sold for "ballast" to make into mortar with strong lime, with dry rot and perishing mortar as its results, will readily be detected by any one who has been put on his guard by this volume.

It is, indeed, no little matter to understand the proper constituent parts of mortar and cement, so much have they to do with the binding together of the masses of stone or brick about which Mr. Wheeler has so much to say in the proper place. He winds up an account of the chief building stones by a suggestion that, as in France, a Government Commission should be issued to report upon the supply, nature, and relative value of the various kinds. Though not decidedly hostile to artificial stones, such as Ransome's patent and others, it is easy to see that our author has an architect's prejudice against them; nor are we aware that he has even alluded to those preservative or reparative washes with which, as in the case of the Houses of Parliament, it has been proposed to make perishable stone "beautiful for ever." But on the uses and proper laying of encaustic tiles, which are best laid, according to one of Mr. Minton's workmen, upon a timber floor covered with a sheet of stout zinc to avoid shrinkage; on the best roofing materials, as to which Mr. Wheeler has a strong leaning to good Bangor slates, which may be tested by ring and touch; and on the strength and seasoning of timbers, he is the reverse of reserved or uncommunicative. Upon the subject of slates he is more than one place recommends the wonderfully thin veneers into which they can now be split for the lining of cisterns, as well as of winter wardrobes and linen-closets. Backed with cement, these thin sheets of slate, which can be split to the thickness of a sixteenth part of an inch, would effectually exclude moth or vermin, and the shelves and compartments might be of the same clean and durable material. Floor timbers, Mr. Wheeler thinks, should be deeper than is commonly the case, in order to secure strength and stiffness. In a later portion of his work he recommends the construction, as is sometimes the fashion in Holland or the United States, of a double floor. We pass over the chapter on choice of a situation, because the suitable aspect and the arrangement of outlook, as well as the cautions against the proximity of trees, unless it be a cedar or two or a tree of umbrageous top for coolness in the vicinity of a larder, are points pretty generally known even to amateurs in house-building. Our space also forbids our noticing the hints as to a "house to let" contained in the first chapter of the second part. At the same time, it is only fair to say that any one who has laid them up in his memory need never be taken unawares as to what he has a right to claim of his landlord, nor be at fault as to what are fixtures, what are removable, and what are debaseable fittings. He will know how to guard himself against smoky chimneys, and against loose and cheap door-handles, with shank and screw-hole out of which the screw is for ever getting lost. It has happened to ourselves to have been supplied with door-handles the knobs of which actually might be crunched into shapelessness by a fairly strong hand; and therefore we welcome "the door-knob with moveable collar round the shank of the handle, attached by screws to the face of the door, the other end of the knob going through with the door, and being permanently fastened thereto" (see p. 238). All sorts of preliminary advice to those who contemplate building, on estimates, plans, consulting architects, clerks of the works, and similar precautions, will be found in Chapters v.-vii.; while as to the buyer of a house, it is a golden suggestion that he should always, if possible, get a year's previous tenancy, so as to have "wintered and summered it."

The author's experience of his profession, not only in England, but also in America, enables him to offer many valuable suggestions for the re-arrangement, as well as the building de novo, of houses whether in town or country. The fault he finds with our town houses is their want of depth, arising probably from the difficulty about lighting the far end of a deep room in our dark atmosphere, as well as from the desire to get a backyard or small garden in the rear. The former difficulty he would cure by a rearrangement of windows, heightening of rooms, and judicious choice of colours for papering. The back external area he would sacrifice, except so far as to allow a small paved air-space. It is worth while to study Mr. Wheeler's application of his New York experience to English town-houses, although there are some features of internal arrangement which the different habits of society in this country render unnecessary. One of the most noteworthy features in the special plan of the house erected by him in Philadelphia is the octagonal planning of the dining-room, allowing as it does ample space for the front door and entrance passage, as well as corners for a fire-proof safe, a private store-closet, and other conveniences. This cutting off of corners, sometimes externally as well as internally, is indeed a great hobby of Mr. Wheeler's, and often a very successful one, though we are not quite sure that such a corner is ever, when it can be avoided, the place for a fireplace. In pp. 142-6 the author gives a plan and details of a London house with considerable depth, with library, dining-room, serving-room, and dressing-room upon the ground floor; front and back drawing-room with connecting ante-room on the first story; and, on three bedroom floors above, as many as nine larger and smaller sleeping rooms, with three dressing-rooms and bath-rooms, box-rooms, linen-closets, and so forth. In a sanitary point of view, the town-houses in pairs with a common party wall, and an external wall with side area for light and air to each, are highly to be commended, as allowing the transit of all house-drains, soil, and waste-pipes to the exterior side area, where they can be readily got at for cleansing and repair.

Equally happy and more diversified are Mr. Wheeler's plans for suburban and country-houses, as to which one capital bit of advice is not to build too much at once. "Much of the justly praised picturesqueness of our English country-houses arises from the additions which successive owners have made to the family homestead, and which often result in a peculiar charm unobtainable in a building planned and completed in one operation." He might have added, that besides the picturesqueness thus added to the exterior, there is an attraction to most minds in the irregular-shaped rooms which are often the result of an addition to the original homestead—as where the addition of a square or oblong space for an external court or garden is made to a narrow study with an arch connecting them, or a kind of apse is added to an already well-proportioned room. The prevailing fashion of ample bays is one which cannot be too much praised, and of this fashion Mr. Wheeler makes excellent use. He has also from his American experience contracted a fondness for verandahs which serves him in good stead in several of his best plans for suburban or country residences. To our thinking, his parsonages require to be regarded less as parsonages proper than as the dwellings of professional or business men who do not aim at a very handsome or costly mansion. In accommodation and cost they would frighten the secretary of a Diocesan Church Building Society. One feature in them, however, is very well conceived; we mean the private room opposite the library and hard by the vestibule, which all who have the charge of a parish find so convenient as a "speak-a-word" room. But five principal bedrooms, with four in the wing, two dressing-rooms, a bath-room, &c., &c., strike us as too large a provision for a house which will change hands in each generation, and which, while suitable for a clergyman who has pupils, means, and a large family, will be a tax upon the childless couple who may come after him and will have to keep it up. Very good and complete is the plan of the symmetrical villa of brick with stone dressings, of Italian architecture, square outline, but pleasingly varied elevation. The library, sixteen feet square, is under the campanile, which is carried a full story above the roof, and has a large bedroom on the top floor. A verandah surrounds the drawing-room and morning-room, which are on either side of the library, and a corridor from the drawing-room leads to the garden vestibule and to the conservatory. The dining-room in this as in all Mr. Wheeler's plans is conveniently connected with the kitchen, a serving-room and butler's pantry alone intervening, but not so as to interrupt direct access. Considering the amount of convenience and accommodation, we should call this villa cheap at the author's estimate of 3,000*l*. But the house upon which we have set our affections is the large stone house with a tower, of which there is a drawing in the vignette, and which we learn was erected on a beautiful site on the slope of the Berkshire hills, Massachusetts, U.S. It is of irregular plan, and was designed to afford views of the wild scenery of the surrounding country. Hence its large square tower at the outer corner of the entrance, the windows of the square billiard-room in which command the landscape in every direction. Thick stone walls exclude heat, and a moderate area of glass secures pleasant internal temperature. The ground story of the tower is the library, 24 ft. square, and above the billiard-room is a parapet and flat cement roof, over which is an open-air "specula." Another pleasant break of the regularity of this plan is the boudoir on the right of the entrance porch with a room intervening. This has an octagonal projecting bay carried up to the roof as a lesser tower, and affording the same feature to the room above, which is the young lady's sitting-room, with an adjacent work-room for her maid. All the details of this house are in keeping, and its arrangements strike us as well nigh perfect. It has but one long corridor, a great recommendation in the author's eyes, though we are far from sure that corridors have not their utility, as they certainly have their charm. When fairly broad, they serve for a promenade between the dances at a ball.

Many hints about less expensive dwellings than those we have glanced at might be culled from this handbook, but our few remaining notes must be à propos of the "several parts of a house," which form the subject of a later chapter. Mr. Wheeler obeys a sound instinct when he rebels against the old theory of dingy furniture and dark flock papers for dining-rooms. In the library, too, he attaches due weight to the windows at the end and sides, and the recess for a table with front and side lights to catch the best aspect at each hour of the day. A deep bay or oriel with a cushioned immovable seat or locker, at the far end of the room, facing East, where the sun is off the windows by noon, is very desirable. And besides the ventilation of book-cases, for which the author provides, it is of importance to insist on the shelves being of sufficient thickness and of such moderate length, or with such frequent supports, as to prevent the weight of the books causing them to bend and give way. We see no notice of a plan which is very useful for arranging the leather work at the top of each row of books—namely, to glue it to oak strips attached to the shelves by a hinge, so as to facilitate the leather being raised to remove a book or books. But the suggestion in p. 215 of fixing the library window roller-blinds at the bottom instead of top, with a cord passing over a pulley above, and allowing light from the upper part of the window, is a very happy and, to us, original device. The hints for drawing-room decoration, for billiard-rooms, kitchens, &c., are clever and practical. The laundry is well conceived, too, though, if on a large scale, it would be worth while to have patent rinsing-machines, and hot closets for steam-drying the clothes passing through them upon clothes-horses, as described by Mr. Kerr. Much more might we say of this excellent vaude-mecum, of its sound advice as to offices, out-door arrangements, terraces, covered carriage-ways, and everything, in short, entering into the category of "the house and its essentials." It is easy to predict that it will take its place as a permanent book of reference on the subject of which it treats, and there can be no doubt that it will be the means of saving much time, worry, and expense to inexperienced persons who consult it when about to build or buy a house.

A WOMAN'S FAITH.

WE may perhaps venture to entertain a hope that novel readers in the stirring events of the last two years will have become surfeited with mere incident, however exciting, and will once more ask for delineation and development of character. It may, however, be the case that increase of appetite grows by what it feeds on, and that those who only a few months ago, if their morning paper did not contain an account of some bloody fight or siege, cried, "Fie upon this quiet life; there is nothing in the paper," will still expect to have their "six or seven dozen" killed for them, if not in real life, at all events in fiction. The influence of the telegraph moreover, we fear, will be unfavourable to a quiet style of writing, and in the constant supply which it furnishes of startling incidents, in what may perhaps be called Renter's English, will do but little to foster a taste for those novelists in whose pages adulteries and murders are not as frequently repeated as the text in a long sermon. We would suggest that a skilful writer might perhaps combine the advantages of the old and new styles, and so might please the taste of two sets of readers. He might, by a plan which we shall presently unfold, give a most minute delineation of character, and yet avail himself of all the resources of modern science in producing startling incidents. All that is required is to combine the old letter-written novel with modern telegraphy. If, for instance, a modern Clarissa Harlowe were living in India, and her correspondent were in England, letters could be written as long as those of last century, and character and incident could be as slowly and as minutely unfolded. At the same time, for those who are as eager for the rapid development of a plot as persons who travel on the Great Eastern Railway are for the end of their journey, there could be sent by cable, not only a summary of each important letter, but also a notice of each important event. Even those who read the story in full would occasionally find a curious kind of interest in the news that came by telegraph; for while they were watching how the various characters were regarding the incidents that were surrounding them, and the hopes and fears they were entertaining, they themselves would often, by the previous insertion of some brief telegram, be aware what the issue had been. The heroine might, for instance, in a long course of letters from India, have been describing the machinations of the villain of the piece, and the plot he was slowly weaving round her. When the story was at its minutest and things at their blackest, a telegraph, brief but impressive, would arrive, announcing that "Vice was defeated and Virtue triumphant." The letters brought, however, by the next two or three mails would all be of the most desponding order, and the reader, aware that his beloved heroine was saved, would study without the pain of anxiety her efforts and alarms, and at the same time would be full of eagerness to learn how she had finally managed to escape. It might be objected that a story set before the reader on such a method as this, where the general narrative was often a month behind the most striking events, would have lost much of that breathless interest which the unfolding of a skilfully arranged plot affords. But we must remember that, on the one hand, our plan is confessedly a compromise between two opposite schools of novel-writing, and, on the other hand, that the interest would be just as often excited as lessened if the telegraph part of the book were skilfully managed. It will be some while, however, we fear, before a book appears written on this plan, though we do not reserve our invention for ourselves, but throw it open to the world. Meanwhile, till we can have a story thus written which will please every one, we must be content to go on dividing our novels for the most part into two classes. We shall still have the novel of incident and the novel of character. There are doubtless many novelists who more or less successfully combine both, but we generally find that those who deal in a rapid succession of startling incidents do not attempt to delineate character; and that those who attempt to delineate character do not deal in a rapid succession of startling incidents. If, however, as at the outset of our remarks we hoped might be the case, novel readers have had enough of startling incidents to serve them for some time, and would like a little repose in the fictions they read, we can with a good conscience recommend to them A Woman's Faith. It might be objected that, however free, with perhaps one exception, the story is from what are called sensational scenes, the rate of mortality nevertheless is excessively high. The heroine's sister dies, her mother dies, her baby dies, the hero's bosom friend dies; and the wild Italian girl, the heroine's unknown rival, dies. And yet so clearly is the author averse to dying scenes that, with the exception of the baby, all of them die off the stage. From the very opening scene, too, we are led to expect a tolerably rapid succession of deaths, as three of the characters are introduced to us in a very weak state of health. That the rate of mortality therefore should be high is as natural as it is in St. Pancras Workhouse, and does not afford any just grounds of astonishment or complaint.

The plot is simple enough. Two women are in love with one man; the one, Margaret Herpath, a pure, high-minded English girl, the other, Candida, a passionate, unscrupulous Italian peasant girl. Candida, by detaining some letters, makes the hero, Richard Brandon, believe that Margaret is faithless to him, and so keeps him for her own lover for two years. In the end he finds out how he had been deceived, and marries Margaret, without, however, having the courage to avow the intimacy that had existed between him and Candida. Candida, finding herself deserted, though not left unprovided for, revenges herself by giving Margaret proofs of her husband's former intimacy with her, and by stealing their newborn baby. The baby dies from exposure to the weather, but throughout this double trial Margaret still shows herself "a Faithful Woman." The story, by the way, we would observe, bears two names. On the title-page it is called "A Woman's Faith," but the heading of each page is "A Faithful Woman." Candida herself soon afterwards dies in a hospital, penitent and forgiven. Margaret adopts the child that her rival had borne to Richard Brandon, and brings it up as her own son. The first scene of the story is laid in Rome, and the hero, in a series of letters to his friend, an English country parson, gives a lively and interesting description of the society of that capital. These letters are the cleverest part of the whole book, and in a very pleasant manner they gradually introduce us to all the characters, few as they are in number, of the story. We have Rosie, Margaret's invalid sister, who, with all the suffering of a sick couch, manages, as so many women in real life do manage, in the intervals of pain to be the liveliest in her talk, and the warmest in her sympathies with the pleasures of others, though she cannot herself share in them. She has many a discussion with the hero, upholding English, from which she is an unwilling exile, against Italy, where he lives by choice. He had on one occasion "ostentatiously delivered" at the very notion of an English spring, when not only Rosie, but also Margaret, thus attack him:—

"Oh, Margaret! and to think of those April mornings on the English hills!"

"And the beech-woods in early May! and the little ope, blue with hyacinths! and the singing of the birds!"

"Yes; we've no such birds here, Mr. Brandon. They're too used to the sunshine to their garden for it, here. I never could have imagined such an anomaly as a languid skylark until I heard one here, the other day. He was fairly, literally, sleek, poor fellow, and his wings and his voice both failed him. Did you ever happen to hear an English skylark, Mr. Brandon?"

Besides Rosie we are introduced to pretty Mrs. Portland, whose enthusiastic talk was not unevenly balanced by her husband's matter-of-fact brevity. Perhaps at times her garrulity is too fully reported; but, on the whole, she in her long speeches, and her husband in his short speeches, are cleverly drawn characters. Brandon tells his friend of his first meeting with Margaret, of the first time he heard her voice. He had been riding along, and while stopping his horse to gaze into the almost dazzling brilliance of a kind of "drift" of those blossoms which had lodged about the spreading roots of some finely grown oak-trees, he heard a voice, coming from the wood, say,

"We must gather plenty of them for Rosie. How she would love to see them here! How she would—oh, if the poor darling could only have come with us to-day! This lovely, lovely, lovely day!"

It seemed as if the voice would naturally have burst into singing, only for the underlying pathos of this tender regret.

He luckily managed at this moment to get his horse badly lamed, and so everything was provided that was needed to lead to an introduction. Everything would have gone on smoothly enough, and one volume instead of three would have easily contained the whole story, had it not unfortunately been the case that where Margaret was lodging there also was her rival, the unscrupulous Candida. Brandon had some months before been kind to this girl when she was ill, and without knowing it had won her love. For some weeks love-making goes on very pleasantly and steadily, when, as ill-luck would have it, Brandon hears that his bosom friend in England has fallen so alarmingly ill that he must at once hurry from Rome to his bed-side. In his absence Rosie dies, and the Herapaths also return to England. The letters that Margaret had sent to her lover, through Candida's treachery, never reach even the post, and when he hastens back to Rome it is to find that he has lost all trace of her. The hurried journey and the double anxiety he has had prove too much for him, and, combined with the unhealthiness of the Campagna in summer, strike him down with a fever. He is nursed through it by Candida, and, on his partial recovery, hears from a gossiping correspondent in England that Margaret is starting for America, and in all probability will soon be married. A man's faith, we fear, is weaker than a woman's, for he at once yields to despair, while Candida, in a "tearless frenzy," reveals to him her passion, which as yet was unknown to him.

Two years the story passes over in silence. At the end of that time Brandon, coming to London, suddenly meets Margaret, and learns that she has throughout been faithful to him. They are soon married; but who ever heard of a marriage only half-way through the second volume that boded any good? The sufferings, the remorse, and the faith that are told of in the sequel of the story, we have already briefly described. The chief merit of the story lies in the characters of Margaret and her sister Rosie, which are very well drawn, and in the lively conversations and descriptions of a quiet society in which the book abounds. We must remark, however, that the story might have been in many places cut down with advantage. The author writes with facility and accuracy, and no doubt finds a constant pleasure in the easy run of her pen and the easier flow of her words. Nevertheless, after she has gratified her own love of composition, she would do well at times to gratify her reader's love of brevity, by scoring out, traverse calamo, not a little of what she has written. Penelope lost none of her woefulness by her habit of undoing at night what she had done in the day, and authors would lose none of their readers if, in moderation, they followed in her steps.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we decline to return rejected communications; and to this rule we can make no exception.

The SATURDAY REVIEW is duly registered for transmission abroad.

The publication of the SATURDAY REVIEW takes place on Saturday mornings, in time for the early trains, and copies may be obtained in the Country, through any Newsagent, on the day of publication.

Nearly all the back Numbers of the SATURDAY REVIEW may be obtained through any Bookseller, or of the Publisher, at the Office, 33 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C., to whom all Communications relating to Advertisements should likewise be addressed.

Now ready, VOLUME XXXI., bound in cloth, price 18s. Cloth Cases for Binding all the Volumes, price 2s. each. Also, Binding Cases, price 2s. 6d. each. May be had at the Office, or through any Bookseller.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 544, MARCH 9, 1872:

Prussia Bismarck and the School Question.
The House of Lords and the Public Business. The Attack on the Education Act.
The Tichborne Case. Mr. Goldwin Smith on English Institutions.
France. Mr. Lowe and the Income-Tax Deputation.
Legal Education.

The Story of the Tichborne Case.
Newspaper Decorum. The Catholic Movement in Bavaria.
Imperialism Whitewashed. Infant Life Protection. Recruiting.
The Debates in the Swiss Schweizer.
The Ecclesiastical Courts Bill.

Prossard's Corps in the Late War. History for the Young.
Gray's Birds of the West of Scotland. Sale's Papers Humorous and Pathetic.
Ratis Raving. O'Shaughnessy's Lays of France.
Eastlake's Gothic Revival. The Choice of a Dwelling.
A Woman's Faith.

CONTENTS OF No. 545, MARCH 2, 1872:

The Queen and the National Thanksgiving—England and America—The Ballot Bill—The Count of Chambord—Mr. Lowe's Resolutions—Spain—The Government and the Education Question—Pay and Expenses in the Army.
Crowds—Last Tuesday—The Literary Uses of Folly—Rhetoric of the Thanksgiving—Interviewing a Prince—Parliamentary Logic—The Renewal of the Vatican Council—The Sunday Post.
Bismarck's Essays on Historical Truth—Dixon's Swissers—Elise's Life of Lord Byron—Schmidt on Modern Greek Folk-Lore—Poor Miss Finch—Mallouin's Recollections of an Indian Official—The Cumberland Dialect—French Literature.

London: Published at 33 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LONDON INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, 1872.—SEASON TICKETS now on Sale at the Albert Hall, Ticket Office, and at the usual Agents. For a Gentleman, 25s. For a Lady, 15s. For a Youth under Fifteen years, 10s.

ELIJAH WALTON'S ENTIRE COLLECTION of OIL and WATER COLOUR PAINTINGS, now on view, at his GALLERY, 4 Westminster Chambers, Victoria Street, Westminster.—Admission, 1s. Open Daily from Ten till Five.

DORÉ GALLERY.—GUSTAVE DORÉ, 35 New Bond Street. EXHIBITION of PICTURES (including "CHRISTIAN MARTYR," "MURDER," "TRIUMPH OF CHRISTIANITY," "FRANCISCA DE RIMINI"). Tea to Six.—Admission, 1s.

UNIVERSITY of LONDON.—NOTICE is hereby Given, that on Wednesday, 21st of April next, the Senate will proceed to Elect EXAMINERS in the following Departments:

Examiners.	Subjects.	Present Examiners.
ARTS AND SCIENCES.	(Each.)
Two in Classics	£200	Rev. Dr. Holden, M.A. Vacant.
Two in The English Language, Literature, and History	£150	J. G. Fitch, Esq., M.A. Prof. Henry Appleton. Prof. Cassell, Esq., M.A.
Two in The French Language	£100	Gustave Moitte, Esq., B.A. R. Ross, Esq., Ph.D. Vacant.
Two in The German Language	£75
Two in The Hebrew Text of the Old Testament, the Greek Text of the New Testament, the Vulgate of the Christian Bible, and Scripture History	£50	Rev. Samuel Davidson, D.D., LL.D. Vacant.
Two in Logic and Moral Philosophy	£60	Prof. G. Crookes Robertson, M.A. Rev. John Venn, M.A.
Two in Political Economy	£50	Prof. W. Stanley Jevons, M.A. Prof. T. G. Cliffe Leslie, Esq., M.A.
Two in Mathematics and Natural Philosophy	£500	Prof. H. J. R. Smith, M.A., F.R.S. Prof. H. G. Adams, Esq., F.R.S. Prof. W. G. Adams, Esq., F.R.S.
Two in Experimental Philosophy	£100	Prof. G. Carey Foster, Esq., F.R.S. H. Dumas, Esq., Ph.D., F.R.S.
Two in Chemistry	£175	Prof. Odling, Esq., F.R.S. J. D. Hooker, Esq., M.D., LL.D., F.R.S.
Two in Botany and Vegetable Physiology	£75	Thomas Thomson, Esq., M.D., F.R.S. Prof. Dumas, M.D., F.R.S.
Two in Geology and Palaeontology	£75	Prof. Morris, F.G.S.
LAW.
Two in Law and the Principles of Legislation	£100	Prof. Bryce, D.C.L. T. R. Holmes, Esq., Esq., R.C.L., M.A.
One in Equity and Real Property Law	£50	Harbert H. Carter-Hardy, Esq., LL.B.
MEDICINE.
Two in Medicine	£150	J. S. Bristowe, Esq., M.D. Prof. J. Marshall Reynolds, M.D., F.R.S.
Two in Surgery	£100	John Elliott, F.R.C.S. Prof. John Marshall, F.R.S.
Two in Anatomy	£100	Prof. G. Viner Ellis, F.R.C.S. Prof. John Wood, F.R.S., F.R.C.S.
Two in Physiology, Comparative Anatomy, and Zoology	£150	Prof. Michael Foster, M.D., M.A. Henry Power, Esq., M.D.
Two in Medical Jurisprudence	£75	Robert Barnes, Esq., M.D.
Two in Materia Medica and Pharmaceutical Chemistry	£75	Prof. G. G. Smith, M.D.
Two in Forensic Medicine	£50	T. H. Fraser, Esq., M.D. Prof. Garrod, M.D., F.R.S. Vacant.

The Examiners above named are re-eligible, and intend to offer themselves for re-election. Candidates must send in their Names to the Registrar, with any attestation of their Qualifications they may think desirable, on or before Tuesday, March 26. It is particularly desired by the Senate that no personal application of any kind be made to its individual Members.

Residing in Gardens, By Order of the Senate, WILLIAM B. CARPENTER, M.D., Registrar.

RUGBY SCHOOL.—FOUR SCHOLARSHIPS, tenable for Five Years, if the holder shall remain so long at the School, will be open for Competition in June next to BOYS, whether already in the School or not, who shall not be over Fifteen years of age on the 1st of June next. Applications for Admission to the Examination must be made to the Head Master on or before June 1. Testimonials of Good Conduct and Certificates of Birth must be sent at the same time.

Rugby, March 1872. HENRY MAYMAN, Head Master.

MARLBOROUGH COLLEGE, March 1872.—THIRTEEN SCHOLARSHIPS, varying in value from £50 to £150 a year, besides a certain number of FREE ADMISSIONS, will be competed for early in June next. These Scholarships are open to Members of the School and others without distinction. Two will be offered for preference to Members of the School, and One is limited to sons of Clergymen. Age of Candidates from Twelve to Fifteen. Full particulars may be obtained on application to Mr. SELLERS, the College, Marlborough.

RADLEY.—ST. PETER'S COLLEGE.—TWO ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS of £50 per annum for Four years, open to Boys who were under fourteen on January 1, 1872, will be held up on April 26. Apply to the Warden of the School.

MR. STREETER, 7 CONDUIT STREET, BOND STREET, W.
MR. STREETER, JEWELLER and DIAMOND MER.
7 CONDUIT STREET, BOND STREET, LONDON, W.

ESTABLISHED 1861
TIMEWELL, SPECIAL TAILOR and MILITARY OUTFITTER 26 Broadway, New York City

THE

SATURDAY REVIEW

OR

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 855, Vol. 33.

March 16, 1872.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

INDIA.

LORD NORTHBROOK has already commenced his Indian career by making a speech on Indian affairs. What he had to say he said with much good sense and right feeling, but naturally he could do little more than engage to abide by the great principles of toleration and justice which were proclaimed when the Crown took upon itself the government of India. He paid a hearty tribute to the merits of Lord Mayo, and expressed a conviction that the late VICEROY would be lamented as much in India as in England. This anticipation has been fully justified by the detailed accounts subsequently received of what took place in India after Lord Mayo's death became known. There appears to have been a genuine feeling of horror at the act, and of lamentation that so good a friend to the people of India had been cut off. This feeling showed itself far beyond official circles, and although no utterances that come before the English in India can be relied on as showing the real feelings of anything like the mass of natives, yet it is highly satisfactory to observe that the natives, so far as Englishmen could detect, displayed sincere grief and affection and gratitude. No further evidence has been forthcoming to show whether the assassination of Lord Mayo was instigated by the action of a conspiracy, or whether it was due to the sudden and unpremeditated impulse of a barbarian. In the absence, however, of any evidence either way, it is more reasonable to incline to the latter hypothesis, not because a conspiracy to murder a Viceroy is in the least improbable, but because the chances of the conspiracy succeeding in the manner selected were so infinitesimally small that it is very improbable that any conspirators should have conceived it possible to murder a Viceroy as Lord Mayo was murdered. No one could have foreseen that Lord Mayo would go up a hill to see a view, stay till it was dark, and then walk on unprotected in front of his guards to a jetty. He had, indeed, been warned that he was not sufficiently protected, but he had as usual replied that he did not wish to show himself afraid or to feel afraid. On this occasion he happened to judge wrongly, but no conspirators could have guessed that he would do so. On the contrary, this was exactly an occasion when he would have been wise to take precautions to which ordinarily he was averse. No precautions whatever can save any one from assassination if the assassin absolutely abandons all hope of his own life. A Viceroy, therefore, is very wise as a general rule to show himself perfectly unconcerned about the possibility of a fate overtaking him which he cannot avert. To be unconcerned is the only way to preserve peace of mind and to inspire respect; and the two things which, in the long run, are the most likely to keep from assassination the very few men in any community who are willing to expose themselves to the certainty of death in order to commit a murder, are the perception that those whom they meditate killing are beforehand impervious to fear, so that the murder of one man does not alter the behaviour of others, and the conviction that there will always be a new official to replace the one that is murdered. Assassination is not always useless for its own miserable ends. It does no good in the long run, even according to the standard of good which the assassins accept. But it does sometimes produce an effect which the assassins may like to contemplate. If any of the attempts to assassinate the Emperor of the Far East had succeeded, there would probably have been a sudden panic and a relaxation of the reins of government in France which might have offered desperate men a chance. But in India the assassination of one Viceroy only leads to another Viceroy coming out prepared to tread almost exactly in the path of his predecessor. And what may be said of a Viceroy may be said of course of judges and minor officials. It may be hoped that assassination will cease in India as soon as it is seen that it is of no use whatever to kill men who are only parts of a great machinery of government, and whose destruction leaves the machinery working on exactly as it worked before.

It is desirable to discuss the questions suggested by Lord Mayo's assassination out to the end, without any shrinking from the truth or any anxiety to make too much or too little of the event. The conclusion, we think, to which a full discussion of the subject leads is that our Indian officials do run a risk, and for the time possibly an increasing risk, of being assassinated. Crimes have a fashion like everything else, and, as Captain BURTON has pointed out in a letter to the Pall Mall Gazette, the catastrophe of Lord Mayo's murder had been preceded by four other assassinations in a twelvemonth, three judicial officers having been murdered "up country," besides Mr. NORMAN at Calcutta. But what is the mode of meeting this fashion of assassination? Captain BURTON answers that the proper mode of meeting it would be to make certain reforms which he recommends in our way of treating Mahomedans. This seems to us an extremely wrong policy. The very first and the indispensable condition of stopping assassination is to bring home to persons meditating assassination that if they commit the crime they intend they will not only be certainly executed, but that they will commit this crime absolutely for nothing. That they should die, but that their cause should triumph, is exactly what they want to be the result of their act. A fanatic may possibly doubt whether he would be very highly rewarded if he killed an infidel without producing any benefits to the faithful; but if he gets concessions made to the faithful, he will be sure that his merits in killing an infidel will be adequately appreciated in a better world. If there were any monstrous injustice which we were committing against Indian Mahomedans, if we tortured them, or defiled their holy places, or forbade them to study the Koran, we should have, of course, to abandon our evil ways, even though assassination had been used to open our eyes to them. But on all doubtful points of ordinary policy, as to which our injustice is very doubtful or very slight, we ought to be absolutely firm in the face of assassination. A Mahomedan has been lecturing in England on the wrongs of his fellow-Mahomedans in India, and his great grievance is one that no doubt is practically felt by educated Mahomedans, but it is one which it is very difficult to remedy, and as to which it is very doubtful whether any attempt to remedy it ought to be made. It is that Hindoos get employment under the English Government more easily than Mahomedans do, because they can afford to give all their time when young to learning English, while Mahomedans are in conscience bound to learn Arabic and Persian. Captain BURTON's complaints of injustice are somewhat more serious, although we are startled to find that he opens his letter by denying altogether that revival of the Puritanism of ISLAM which Mr. GIFFARD PALGRAVE, at least an equal authority, has not only asserted to exist, but has described minutely. If two such authorities differ absolutely as to such a very prominent and startling incident in current Mahomedan history, it is hard to be sure whether Captain BURTON is right in describing the hostile feelings of Mahomedans towards our rule in India in the strong language he uses. The Mahomedans groan under our injustice, he says, on three heads. In the first place, we will not go on trying cases for ever, as was lately shown in the case of the Nawab of TONK. This, says Captain BURTON, is quite opposed to Mahomedan feeling, for they hold that it is never too late to do justice. In the next place, we are sometimes in conducting trials contented with less than the minimum prescribed by the Koran and the Old Testament of the oaths of two competent respectable witnesses swearing directly to the fact. Lastly, we do not recognize the right conceded by the Koran and the Old Testament to the Avenger of Blood to kill the shedder of blood. It is useless to discuss these points in detail, but it is the adherence of the English Government to these forms of injustice which Captain BURTON calls a vicious system of which Lord MAYO was the victim, and he distinctly states that, if this system is adhered to, similar causes will produce similar effects. The mode of averting future assassinations would be, according to Captain BURTON, to let the Mahomedans of India see that, in consequence of five of our officials having been assassinated by Mahomedans, we were now prepared to go on trying disputed cases for ever, to alter our rules of evidence, and to let the avengers of blood have their fling. There could not, we venture to think, be any policy more foolish, more fatal, and more provocative of assassination.

To keep to the great unalterable principles of our Indian Government as Lord NORTHBROOK insists, to determine that assassination shall never succeed, and to imitate the example of Lord MAYO, and to be always seeking for information and inspiring personal confidence, are the first duties of a Viceroy. Mr. FITZJAMES STEPHEN has written from Calcutta to say that, in deference to the opinion of friends whose judgment he somewhat distrusts, he thinks it right to assure the English public that Lord MAYO's last journey was not undertaken for mere amusement. Mr. STEPHEN knows the English public far too well not to have seen that those who could believe that the English public would need any such assurance were entirely mistaken. The very last thing that would have occurred to any one here was to imagine that a Viceroy would go to the Andaman Islands for amusement. Lord MAYO went because he thought it a duty to go. That a Viceroy should not go too far into details is obvious; that he should not cease to learn from personal experience is also obvious; and how to sail between the two extremes is a question of tact and judgment. If Mr. STEPHEN's friends had urged that the public in England might have thought that a visit to the Andaman Islands was a work of detail rather out of the sphere of a Viceroy, there would have been some sense in combating the objection. Prima facie it does not seem the business of a Viceroy to visit a penal settlement. It was, therefore, very desirable that some one as competent as Mr. STEPHEN should explain why in this instance Lord MAYO very properly thought such a visit within his sphere. The duties of General STEWART, as superintendent of this settlement, are exceedingly arduous. He came after a period of utter anarchy, and he has striven under enormous difficulties to introduce something like order there. He has unlimited forests and fisheries at his disposal, and he might therefore hope to make the settlement in time not only orderly, but productive. Lord MAYO paid his visit in recognition of the magnitude of the task which General STEWART had undertaken, and of the spirit and zeal with which he had set to work. Lord MAYO's great knowledge of public works was also likely to be very serviceable to an official who can have few opportunities of receiving advice or assistance from his superiors on such points. There were, in short, very excellent and exceptional reasons why in this instance the Viceroy should visit a penal settlement; and it is very desirable that they should be explained, or otherwise Lord NORTHBROOK might hereafter be judged by an erroneous standard, and be condemned because he fell short of the zeal for entering into details displayed by Lord MAYO. If it is once known that Lord MAYO was quite aware that it is not the part of a Viceroy to be fussy and meddling, and that he only entered into details for exceptional and assignable reasons, none but fair criticism on this head will, it may be hoped, be bestowed on his successor.

MAZZINI.

THE vote by which the Italian Parliament has expressed regret for the death of MAZZINI is an authoritative condemnation of the errors of his career. Down to the moment of his death he was conspiring or agitating against the Constitution by which the Parliament exists; nor would he, if his life had been prolonged, ever have willingly consented that the country which he passionately loved should be free and independent except in accordance with his own ideal theory; yet his death, while it prevents the dangers which might have resulted from his misdirected activity, naturally recalls the memory of his early struggles with the domestic and foreign enemies of Italy. If MAZZINI's counsels had been followed, Italy would perhaps still have been split up into petty States and controlled by an alien protectorate; but without MAZZINI's enthusiasm and impulse there might have been no aspiration for unity to be realized by more practical statesmen. To his eager but vague imagination the dream of a democratic Italian Republic presented itself as a single and indivisible object; and the revolution which converted a cluster of provinces into a great kingdom was to him an almost unqualified disappointment. With a more vivid perception of reality he would have understood that the largest part of his task has been already accomplished by himself and by others. To a reasonable Italian Republican the consolidation of the whole Peninsula under a national Government must seem a more indispensable achievement than any change in the existing Constitution. The Parliament assembled at Rome was right in remembering that MAZZINI had anticipated the establishment of an Italian Government in the ancient capital at a time when the Papal dominion seemed to the world to enjoy almost absolute security. Of the moral and political system of the great agitator it was unnecessary to take notice, except in the recognition of his undoubted honesty and earnestness. Although men are responsible for the soundness as well as for the sincerity of their opinions, a legitimate distinction may be drawn between unconscious error and deliberate violation of conscience. MAZZINI was so far a false prophet that he often mistook the character of his inspirations, but he never wilfully falsified the message which he thought himself bound to communicate. MAZZINI's memory will be tenderly regarded by his countrymen, if only because he habitually claimed for them equality, or more than equality, with the nation which they have long regarded with deferential admiration. It was one of his favourite assertions in his later years that France was exhausted, and that Italy must henceforth become the leader of social and political improvement.

In the early part of the century a feeling of general patriotism must have been unintelligible to the great majority of Italians. The insolence of French officials, civil and military, during the Empire, was in Italy, as in Germany, the first impulse to the sense of national existence; but on the fall of NAPOLEON, the popular wish in Lombardy, and in some other parts of Northern Italy, was directed to the restoration of Austrian rule. The separation of the Emilian provinces from the dominion of the Pope would have been anticipated by forty years if the exaggerated scruples of England and the jealousy of other Powers had not defeated the projects of METTERNICH for the spoliation of the Holy See. A few years of the restoration effectually dispelled the illusions of the Italian adherents of Austria. In MAZZINI's early manhood the actual condition of the Peninsula may have suggested the expediency of a national effort for deliverance. Beyond the limits of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom the power of Austria covered and secured the misgovernment of the Austrian Duchies, of Naples, and of the Papal territory. At that time, or somewhat later, devotion to the Emperor of AUSTRIA was inculcated as a religious duty in the Neapolitan catechism; and in the patrimony of St. PETER and the Legations it was well known that ecclesiastical tyranny would be supported in case of need by Austrian force. The scattered insurrections of 1821 were crushed by the arms of Austria, and a common oppression indicated to its victims the necessity of union. At an early period in his career MAZZINI, with a transient perception of the true method of liberating Italy, sought the alliance of CHARLES ALBERT, then Prince of Carignano, and heir-presumptive of the Crown of Sardinia; but he never forgave CHARLES ALBERT's desertion of the Liberal cause at the summons of Austria in 1821. The Prince, like MAZZINI himself, was an enthusiast, but the vehement orator failed to appreciate the silent resolution which finally concentrated itself in the enterprise of 1848. The darkest blot in the character of MAZZINI is his complicity in a plot for the assassination of CHARLES ALBERT shortly after his accession to the throne. Only a few years ago MAZZINI, in the course of a personal controversy, stated without any expression of regret that he had lent a dagger to a professed follower who promised to use it for the murder of the KING. It is not surprising that he should afterwards have been thought capable of sharing in the plot of ORSINI, with which he was probably unconnected.

By his brilliant writings and by his personal influence MAZZINI inspired his own zeal for the Italian Republic into the minds of a large portion of the educated youth of Italy; and many of his disciples have since distinguished more clearly than their master between the two objects which in his own mind were inseparably united. The Republic was an accident, or a fancy, if it was not a delusion; but the unity and independence of Italy were objects worthy of any sacrifice. MAZZINI was never able fully to understand that the supremacy of a great military Power could never be disturbed without the agency of a regular army. He probably believed in the fabulous legends of the French national rising in 1792, and he resolutely refused to see that the Piedmontese troops were at the time the only genuine Italian soldiers. His addresses to the people of Italy are full of vague declamation about the might of the people to be exhibited in a general rising from the Alps to the sea; and MAZZINI himself apparently thought that clubs and daggers and pistols would prove a match for muskets and cannon. There was an opportunity of trying the experiment in favourable circumstances when CHARLES ALBERT suddenly burst into Lombardy in 1848, and threatened the fortresses of the Quadrilateral. MAZZINI could have done more than any other man to cause a popular rising in aid of the Piedmontese army; but he imposed as a condition of the exercise of his influence that the KING should undertake at the close of the war to allow the choice between a Monarchy and a Republic in the liberated territory to be determined by a popular vote. CHARLES ALBERT rightly regarded the augmentation of the power of Piedmont both as the best security against Austria and as the just reward of the valour of the Piedmontese army. On his refusal to accept the offered terms, MAZZINI withheld his aid from the national cause; and when RABETZKY made his victorious advance, the partisans of MAZZINI instigated the Milanese rabble to rise against the unfortunate and heroic KING. A few months afterwards MAZZINI proved that his perversity had no admixture of treason or cowardice by his gallant resistance, as one of the Triumvirate which governed Rome, to the profligate attack of the French Republicans under the orders of CAVAIGNAC and the National Assembly. After the inevitable fall of the city, the French officers had the decency to connive at the escape of the patriot leaders, who might otherwise have been exposed to the relentless vengeance of the POPE. Soon afterwards MAZZINI took advantage of the defeat of the Piedmontese army at Novara to instigate a rebellion, not against the POPE or the KING of NAPLES or the Emperor of AUSTRIA, but against VICTOR EMMANUEL, to whom CHARLES ALBERT had, in his despair, bequeathed the duty of retrieving the fortunes of Italy. The remnant of the army which had fought unsuccessfully at Novara was compelled to undertake the unwelcome task of suppressing the Mazzinian rebellion at Genoa.

After the establishment by French and Piedmontese arms of the Italian Kingdom, MAZZINI continued to preach discontent, and to organize conspiracies against the new Monarchy. On the other hand, he is said to have had a share in GARIBALDI's successful adventure in Sicily and Naples, and in the rash campaign which ended at Mentana. It would be unjust to deny to MAZZINI and to GARIBALDI a share in the acquisition of Rome as the national capital. The KING was notoriously unwilling to inflict further injury on the POPE; but it was necessary either to suppress a Republican rebellion or to secure the capital for the kingdom by the exercise of force. The unity of Italy was now accomplished, and MAZZINI resolved to devote the remainder of his life to his scheme for converting the Monarchy into a Republic. If his course has been often mistaken, it has never been mean. Although the practical result of the success of his schemes might probably have been confusion and anarchy, his own designs were always constructive; and he was never tired of dwelling on the duties, as contrasted with that which he held to be the immoral doctrine of the rights of man. One of his latest writings was directed against the Paris Commune, and against the extreme democratic party in France. He was entirely opposed to the atheistic doctrines of modern revolutionists, and to the elaborate system of COMTE; and he was a firm and earnest believer in the theism which had always formed his creed. Though his intellect was not of the highest order, he may be considered a man of genius. His eloquence, even when he wrote English, was remarkable, and in his own language it gave him a powerful influence over his own countrymen. Even his sanguine disposition may perhaps have been chilled by the recent prospects of his cause. No considerable section of the Italian people seems to wish for a change which would abolish the present securities for order and prosperity without providing any practical alternative. A breach took place after the French war between MAZZINI and GARIBALDI, who is, as it were, a MAZZINI without an intellect. The merits of the quarrel matter less than the fact that the two chief members of the revolutionary party were unable to agree on their objects, or on the means by which they were to be effected. There are sounder politicians than MAZZINI, and there are more wise than GARIBALDI; but it is to the honour of Italy that the popular prophet and the popular champion have been always exempt from suspicion of selfishness or dishonesty.

PRINCE BISMARCK'S VICTORY.

PRINCE BISMARCK has won a great victory. He has carried his Bill for the Inspection of Schools in the Upper House by a majority of fifty. He induced no less than one hundred and twenty-five members of the House to vote with him. There were a short time ago about twenty Liberals in the House, and the Ministry recently used a power it possessed of calling a limited number of burgomasters to take their seats. These burgomasters were warmly in favour of the Bill, as are all the middle classes of the great towns. Twelve members thus added gave the Prince thirty-two only on whom he could absolutely rely on account of their opinions, and it appears now that he has managed to add ninety-three to his list of supporters. This result, which was entirely unexpected, and took Berlin completely by surprise, was produced by a combination of various influences. In the first place, Prince BISMARCK was permitted to announce that the measure had the entire approval of the KING, although that no great Court pressure was exercised may be inferred from the fact that Prince RADZIVIL, one of the KING's aides-de-camp, voted against the Bill. Still the Upper House prides itself on being eminently loyal, and many members who might have wavered if the sentiments of the KING had been supposed to be doubtful were probably determined by knowing that their Royal master wished his great Minister to be successful. Then again Prince BISMARCK disarmed much opposition by calling attention to the modesty of the sum which he proposed to expend on new school inspectors; 3,000*l.* a year was all he purposes to devote at present to carrying out the provisions of his Bill, which showed clearly enough that he did not wish to take the conduct of education out of the hands of the clergy generally, but merely to use the Bill where political danger was to be apprehended from clerical teaching. That at present political danger is threatened from Ultramontane quarters he proved beyond dispute. He showed that such a person as the Bishop of MAYENCE could be shown by documentary evidence to be in league with factions openly bent on breaking up the unity of Germany, and on favouring the future triumph of France, on the ground that France was the chief protector of Rome. But the most telling of his arguments was probably the personal one, that the Upper House must choose between letting him meet as he wished what he believed to be a great national risk and doing without him. Either they must believe him when he said that matters were much more serious than persons who only read newspapers would imagine, and must give him the new powers he asked for, or they ought to be prepared to govern the country on different principles, and to accept the responsibility of allowing German unity to be undermined as, if he were right, it would be sure to be. This was an argument that was really unanswerable. That, after all that German unity has cost Prussia to win, and amid all the dangers that still surround it, Prince BISMARCK, although supported by the KING, should be turned out of office because he tried to guard it, and that the favourites of the Upper House should rule because they were prepared to risk it, was simply impossible. And it was much the best thing for the country that its impossibility should be once for all recorded by the adhesion of an overwhelming majority to Prince BISMARCK's proposals.

The seizure of the papers of Canon KOEHLER, the conductor of a Polish seminary, had furnished Prince BISMARCK with materials of which he made liberal and effective use. Two letters were discovered from Herr WINDTHORST and the Bishop of MAYENCE to the Canon, in which the writers urged that no more addresses on behalf of Catholics should be sent to the German Parliament, but that addresses in a similar sense should be sent direct to the Courts of the German sovereigns, where they would be sure to produce an impression if they were continued systematically, and came in at regular intervals. "Even if," as Herr WINDTHORST wrote, "we may have little to hope for at the hands of German potentates, yet, if these petitions show their Catholic subjects to be stirring, they will not dare to interfere with the move which the Catholic Powers, sooner or later, are sure to make on behalf of his Holiness the POPE." This, Prince BISMARCK said, looked very much like an attempt on the part of the writer to beguile foreign Powers, although their political and military interests might in a future war be different from those of Germany. France is longing for her revenge, and her evil counsellors are whispering to her that the surest road to revenge is to sow the seeds of religious discord in Germany, so that in the hour of need the forces of Germany may be paralysed, and then to strike a heavy blow at Italy. If Italy succumbed, the reactionary party in Austria would be sure to lift up its head, and so Germany might be surrounded by a league of Catholic Powers, and torn asunder by domestic dissensions before the great effort to win back Alsace and Lorraine was made. To this may be added, that if the schemes of Canon KOSMIAN and his friends were realized, Prussian Poland would have been brought to an extreme pitch of disaffection before a war with France broke out. Among the papers of the Canon was found a missive from the POPE, appointing the Archbishop of POSEN to be Primate of All Poland, including the portions of Poland belonging to Russia and Austria, so that a Prussian Archbishop had been secretly nominated to an office to which historical traditions of political power were attached, in order that the force of Poland generally might be used against Germany when necessary. The campaign has also been carried on vigorously in the West as well as in the East of Prussia, and special services have been recently held in Alsace to bewail the present afflicted state of the Church, so that the Alsatians might be taught that their restoration to France and the restoration of his temporal power to the POPE were inseparably mixed up, and that to achieve the former they must labour for the latter. The eyes of the whole Catholic world are, in short, to be directed to France as its champion in a crusade for the POPE; and in order that the holy object of placing the States of the Church once more under the government of priests may be obtained, Germany is to be first broken up by religious differences, then environed by a fanatical league, and then crushed on the field of battle. Prince BISMARCK accepted openly and resolutely the challenge thus given him, and his first pitched battle with his ghostly enemy has been fought and won.

To have got a majority of fifty in the Prussian Upper House, and to have obtained leave to spend a small sum on inspecting such schools as he may think fit through State agents, is a great deal to have done; for the opposition which Prince BISMARCK had to encounter was one very difficult to overcome. But the consequences of his victory go far beyond the sphere of Prussian schools. They must inevitably extend to France and Italy. The aims of the clerical party have been unmasked, and many Frenchmen will ask themselves whether they are prepared to support these aims. France is offered her revenge and the renewal of her political supremacy in Europe, and these are tempting offers to every Frenchman. But in return France is to be the abject tool and slave of the Jesuits. What Prince BISMARCK has done is to force this upon the minds of intelligent and patriotic Frenchmen. So long as the clerical party could work in the dark, and seem devoted to nothing but the good of France, men of sense and honour might overlook the real nature of the bargain that was proposed to them. The Education Bill of M. JULES SIMON, which has been framed on principles diametrically opposite to those of the clerical party, has no chance of being accepted by the Assembly; but its discussion will afford matter for serious reflection to those who see that there are two courses open to France in order to recover its greatness—that of being the champion of Ultramontanism, and that of reorganizing itself on new principles with compulsory military service and sound elementary education under the adequate, although not the exclusive, control of laymen. The former course is tempting, because it promises much earlier advantages, and makes it appear possible that revenge may begin almost as soon as the indemnity has been paid. Many years must pass away before the fruits of pursuing the other course would show themselves. But then, to say nothing of the superior character of these fruits to that of any which the adoption of the other course would bring with it, Prince BISMARCK has already done much to take away from the championship of Ultramontanism the probability of success. He has appealed to Italy as well as to Germany, and has shown that both are exposed to the same dangers. VICTOR EMMANUEL was almost as much interested in this seemingly petty question of the inspection of Prussian schools as the King of PRUSSIA was; and it may be useful to the King of ITALY to know that this was so. M. THIERS has stated in his evidence before the French Parliamentary Committee of Inquiry that when he got to Florence in 1870 he found the King willing to send 100,000 men to the aid of France, but that the Italian Ministry would not hear of it. Even the King must be glad now that his troops were kept at home, and must see that to go to Rome and to fight for France was a stroke of policy absolutely incongruous with each other. In face of the machinations of the party which is endeavouring, not without many appearances of success, to get the control of French policy, Germany and Italy must stand fast by each other. Prince BISMARCK by the course he has taken and the success he has achieved has done much to brighten the prospects of this alliance. He has consolidated the unity, and therefore the strength, of Germany; he has given Italy at once warning and encouragement; and he has offered France an opportunity of considering in time whether it will accept the assistance of clerical intriguers, and whether, if it does so, there is any reasonable prospect of this assistance being worth having.

THE EWELME DEBATE.

THE House of Commons has on two recent occasions indicated with significant tact its opinion of Mr. GLADSTONE's peculiar mode of interpreting Acts of Parliament. When the COLLIER promotion was discussed, an official majority was allowed to protect the Minister from a formal Parliamentary censure, and during the discussion of the Ewelme scandal the House was nearly counted out. If the proceedings on both occasions had been translated into words, the House of Commons would have declared that successive evasions of statutes were both wrong in themselves, and especially irritating to those who wish to place confidence in the leader of their party; but that while neither case was grave enough to justify a vote which might have produced a Ministerial crisis, Mr. GLADSTONE had in both instances succeeded in convincing himself that he would be right in doing what to the rest of the world appears to be obviously wrong. The speakers in the Ewelme debate who repudiated any intention of throwing a slur on Mr. GLADSTONE's character were perfectly sincere. A tendency to intellectual tricks of sophistical ingenuity has no similarity to corruption. If the appointment of Mr. HARVEY had involved any personal or political advantage to the dispenser of the Crown patronage, Mr. GLADSTONE would probably have been deterred by conscientious scruples from serving himself even by the promotion of a deserving clergyman. On the other hand, it may be conjectured that Ewelme would have been given to an Oxford graduate if the Chancellor of the UNIVERSITY had not unluckily attempted to prevent the selection of an alien. Most persons have in the course of their lives been tempted to commit a trespass by a notice that there is "no right of road this way." The warning suggests the probability that there is a pleasant path or a convenient short cut; and if Mr. GLADSTONE ever in his youth committed such an irregularity, he perhaps held that the fence might be lawfully climbed to the right or to the left of the notice board; or he may have construed a notice that there was no footpath into an admission of his right to pass on horseback. Lord SALISBURY, or the LORD CHANCELLOR at his instance, stopped up one gap, in the belief that the Government would be induced to keep in the high road. He now knows that he ought to have provided at all points for the immunity of the Oxford pastures. The representative of the Government and of Mr. GLADSTONE in the House of Lords must have known that Lord SALISBURY would not have been contented with a restriction which only enforced on an alien candidate for the living the observance of certain forms. Mr. GLADSTONE asks why the House of Lords, if it meant to protect Oxford graduates, did not say so? and the answer is sufficiently obvious. The House of Lords, or rather Lord SALISBURY, thought that a concession must involve something conceded; and that the Government would interpret the condition in the sense in which he had himself suggested it. The animus imponentis has generally been regarded as the guide to the meaning of a contract. Mr. GLADSTONE not unnaturally objected to the power of imposing conditions which Lord SALISBURY derived from his position as a leading member of the majority in the House of Lords, and Mr. HENLEY judiciously observed that it would have been much better that the disposal of ecclesiastical patronage should be unrestricted. Mr. GLADSTONE was misunderstood as having hypothetically threatened an exercise of the Royal veto, when he merely announced that he would rather have dropped the Bill than have accepted a limitation to send de jure Oxford graduates. Even in its milder form his declaration was probably an unconscious afterthought. When he consented to the proviso that the Rector of Ewelme should be a member of the Convocation of Oxford, he excluded from the enjoyment of the benefice all the non-graduates who might, without a violation of law, have been appointed to the Regius Professorship of Divinity. The prerogative would not have been much more profoundly compromised if Lord Salisbury had succeeded in his attempt to exclude Cambridge candidates. If the Lord Chancellor had consented to a clause disqualifying all but red-haired clergymen for the preferment, it would not have been worth while to object to the further stipulation that no man should evade the stipulation by dyeing his hair red for the occasion. Mr. Gladstone drew a characteristic distinction between the two cases in which he has lately evaded the intentions of Parliament. The Government had, as he admitted, bestowed the colourable qualification of a seat on the Common Law Bench, while the University of Oxford was responsible for making Mr. HARVEY a member of Convocation. In both instances Parliament had intended to limit the disposal of Crown patronage, and in both instances it was defeated by the exercise of the same subtle faculty of reasoning. The impression which such conduct produces on simple minds is apparently unintelligible to Mr. GLADSTONE.

The effect of giving a far-fetched construction to a statute bears an external resemblance to processes which pervade the whole system of English law and administration. Legal fictions are fossil records of obsolete institutions which retain their ancient form while their substance has gradually disappeared or undergone an organic change. There is no practical reason why Common Law Judges should be serjeants; but as the only harm of the custom is that it imposes upon them a certain expense, they still distribute rings with Latin mottoes which are gravely published in the Law Reports. If the popular legend that bishops were compelled to profess their repugnance to promotion had been true, the conventional falsehood would have probably pointed to some former time in which ambition found no place in clerical minds. It is not the duty of a statesman to anticipate the work of time by emptying recent legislation of its meaning and purpose. There is a wide difference between wilful mutilation of a tree and the natural operation by which its superfluous branches die out and ultimately fall off. It sometimes happens that unwise legislation, like the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill and the cab regulations of two years ago, proves to be stillborn; but Prime Ministers owe a deference to the law which may be less inexcusably withheld by cabmen and Irish Roman Catholic bishops. Notwithstanding the ATTORNEY-GENERAL's plausible argument, there is something in "what honourable members are pleased to call the spirit of an Act of Parliament." Even Judges interpret ambiguous enactments by the aid of the supposed intention of the Legislature, and laymen may be excused for thinking that a clause which could have only one object must be supposed to have attained the end for which it was framed. The Lord Chancellor could not have supposed that Lord Salisbury was anxious to facilitate the transaction which furnishes the latest gloss on the disputed clause. Similar apologies were made last year when it was urged that the Royal Warrant strained the Constitution, although by universal acknowledgment it was conformable to law. The Constitution is the interpretation, and in some respects the supplement, of the law, existing only in the traditions and tacit understandings of those who share in the government of the country. It is because statesmen are supposed to respect the spirit as well as the letter of the law that the prerogative has scarcely undergone the smallest diminution, while the actual power of the Crown has been imperceptibly transferred to a Committee of Parliament. It is evident that Mr. GLADSTONE had no intention of claiming the perfectly legal power of advising the Crown to exercise its veto; but Mr. BOUVIER might be pardoned for thinking that the author of the Royal Warrant was capable of once more resorting to the worm-eaten treasure-house of the mediæval prerogative. Mr. GLADSTONE justly censured "one of those pro-dictions which possess all knowledge by intuition, and with the superfluity of which the nineteenth century is either 'blessed or cursed,' for the grave blunder, immediately afterwards repeated by Mr. HARDY, of confounding incorporation in the University with the less solemn form of admission ad eundem. It is to be feared that Mr. GLADSTONE is not one of those who consider criticism a blessing. He perhaps mistakes for hostility the expression of impatience at the occasional display of peculiarism which tend to diminish the public confidence in his judgment. There is perhaps but little use in pointing out defects which may be inseparable from a character, but political commentators are bound, not only to give advice which may probably be disregarded, but to counteract as far as they influence may extend the practical effect of erroneous conclusions. If any of them fancy that they possess by instinct perfect knowledge of ad eundem degree and of all other human and divine subjects, they ought to be grateful to Mr. GLADSTONE for reproving their vanity. Nothing can be sadder than resistance, if it is thought to be worth while; but Prime Ministers, if the task were not too disagreeable, would often profit by the impartial or even unfriendly discussion of their acts and motives. Even hostile partisans select for attack the weak places of an adversary, and some of the sharpest criticisms on Mr. GLADSTONE's policy are not dictated by any party feeling. Those whose object is to overthrow his Government and to bring his rivals into office ought to welcome his orotichets, his sophisms, his vehement outbursts, his Privy Council appointments, and his Ewelme nominations. These things do the Opposition no harm, and they tend to weaken the Liberal party. The habitual application to Acts of Parliament of the canons of interpretation by which Lord PETER explained away his father's will is a damaging and unpopular propensity.

FRANCE AND THE ASSEMBLY.

THE French Assembly shows increasing signs of a disposition to break away from the restraints which prudence and patriotism have hitherto imposed upon it. The sitting of Monday is described as more stormy than any that have yet been witnessed, and, according to the Times Correspondent, the order which was at last restored was due rather to the curiosity of the Deputies than to any returning sense of decorum. The principal cause of this confusion was a telling phrase of General CHANGARNIER's. Two of the Deputies have had the bad taste to write violent articles against the Assembly, and General DUCROT proposed that one of them should be prosecuted in a court of law, and that the other should be visited with the censure of the House. The objections to the assumption by the Assembly of the post of public prosecutor are obvious, and General CHANGARNIER probably expressed the views of the more reasonable members of the Right when he recommended the Assembly to take no further notice of the offence. Unfortunately, however, in giving this prudent counsel he described the erring Deputies as ignorant of the usages of decent society, and proposed to extend to them an "amnesty of 'disdain.'" The confusion, which had been great before, became greater now. M. DE FOURTOUT, the Chairman of the Committee which had reported in favour of a prosecution, was so charmed with the epigrammatic turn of the sentence, that he at once presented an order of the day in which the Assembly was made to "associate itself to the words 'of General CHANGARNIER,'" and in spite of frantic protestations from the accused Deputies and from the whole Left, the motion was carried by an immense majority. The insincerity of the original proposal could not have been more clearly shown. It was not to vindicate the honour of the Assembly that a prosecution had been demanded, it was simply to gratify the spite of the majority. The Committee had probably not been able to invent anything biting enough to satisfy the occasion, and they had consequently been reduced to the commonplace expedient of advising an action for slander. But when General CHANGARNIER, in opposing this proposal, supplied them at the same time with the precise weapon they were in search of, all thought of pushing matters further was abandoned. The infliction of a verbal insult satisfied the wounded feelings of the Right, and to their keen appreciation of this pleasure they sacrificed all regard for their own consistency, or for the dignity of Parliamentary procedure.

Two days earlier the Assembly had been occupied with more important matters. M. GUIRAUD, a member of the Catholic Right, had thought fit to make the retirement of M. POUYER-QUETIER the subject of a question, and upon this question he founded a speech which constitutes the most open assault that has yet been made on M. THIERS from the Conservative side of the Assembly. He could understand, he declared, a system of Ministerial responsibility, and he could understand a system under which a Ministry had no corporate character, but simply carried out the orders of the Chief of the State. If the former is in operation, how is it that the composition of the Cabinet is continually changing, while the Cabinet itself is immovable? If the latter is in operation, what difference is there between the Republic of 1872 and the Empire of 1852? France has reversed the maxim, the King reigns and does not govern. She has now a Provisional King, who governs but does not reign. Such a state of affairs is good neither for the Assembly nor for the Government. The want of a homogeneous Ministry, of a Ministry appointed by the majority, and existing in virtue of their support, entails upon the Chamber the responsibility of a policy which it never originates and does not always approve. Weakness on the part of the Assembly is necessarily weakness on the part of the Government, for the Government has nothing to rest on except the Assembly. It is supported neither by tradition, as in the case of the old monarchies, nor by universal consent, as in the case of the American Republic. Consequently the Government ought to have no policy distinct from that of the Assembly. Instead of trying to conciliate all parties, it should have cast in its lot with the strongest, and been content to share its fortunes. In its desire to establish the Republic, it has preferred to pursue the opposite policy, and the result has been to make both a Republic and a Monarchy impossible. A Republic is impossible without the co-operation of the Conservatives, and the Government has alienated the Conservatives. A Monarchy is impossible, because the Government has so openly showed its sympathy with the Republic, that for the present a restoration would only be the signal for another revolution. The only remaining alternative is the maintenance of the provisional state of things, and to this the construction of a homogeneous and responsible Ministry is an indispensable condition. Either the Government must regain the confidence of the majority, or the majority must regain command of the Government.

So far as facts go, this indictment against M. THIERS has a great deal of truth in it. His administration is in many respects unlike any of the ordinary forms of government. His own position is exceptional, his relation to his Cabinet is exceptional, his relation to the Assembly is exceptional. The answer to the charge is that an exceptional state of affairs requires exceptional treatment. M. THIERS governs France because in a moment of extraordinary depression twenty-seven departments returned him as their representative. He governs France with but little regard to the views of the majority in the Assembly, because he justly believes that the Assembly is but an imperfect representation of French opinion, while at the same time he shuns the confusion which would certainly accompany a new election. If the Right really expressed the views and feelings of a majority of Frenchmen, M. THIERS's course would be clear. If the indemnity were paid and the German occupation at an end, M. THIERS's course would be clear. In the one case he would have nothing to do but to choose his Ministers from the majority, and leave it to them to determine whether the Republic should make way for the Monarchy. In the latter case he would have nothing to do but to insist upon a general election, and leave the new Assembly to choose the form of government. As it is neither of these alternatives is open to him. To allow the present Assembly to have its own way would be to betray the Provisional Republic into the hands of men who are resolved that it shall never, if they can help it, become anything more than provisional. The determination of the majority to disregard the circumstances under which they were elected, and to assume constituent powers which were never formally entrusted to them, is evidence in itself of their consciousness that a dissolution would place them in a far less advantageous position than that which they now occupy. The country is patient under the rule of the Assembly because it has faith in the PRESIDENT. If M. THIERS were removed, it is more than doubtful whether the Assembly could command any confidence whatever. On the other hand, to dissolve the Assembly by main force—and in the absence of any constitutional authority armed with the power of dissolution, such a step might require force—however justifiable it might be at any other time, would certainly not be justifiable as long as the effect of political confusion might be to delay the payment of the indemnity and the liberation of French soil. Some of the Correspondents of English newspapers insist on the fact that the PRESIDENT has not the power of dissolution as a proof that, if M. THIERS were to take measures for appealing to the country to judge between him and the Assembly, he would be guilty of a coup d'état. That he would commit a constitutional irregularity is clear enough, but it is precisely a case in which the substance of liberty may easily be lost by a pedantic adherence to the forms by which it is usually preserved. Technically speaking, it is true that if M. THIERS were to declare the Assembly dissolved, and to issue writs for a new election, he would be guilty of usurpation. Technically speaking, it is true that if the Assembly were to proclaim the Count of CHAMBRAY King, it would be acting within its right. Yet there can be no question that the technical propriety of the latter act would not prevent it from being regarded as usurpation, and that the technical impropriety of the former Act would not prevent it from being substantially constitutional. The claim of the Assembly to govern France is valid on one condition only. It was elected to perform a particular duty, and on the theory that this duty is not yet completely discharged, the Assembly is in its right place. But the mere act of passing from the task of paying off the Germans to the task of pronouncing on the form of government would amount to an admission that its original duty was fulfilled, and in that case, if its own sense of propriety did not lead it to lay down its authority, and to leave France free to decide upon her own future, it would devolve upon the Executive to meet an emergency for which no provision had been made, and to take care that the country, which is the ultimate master of the Assembly, is not betrayed by its own servants.

In spite of occasional outbursts, the common sense of the Assembly promises to keep it out of an open quarrel with M. THIERS. It seems as though nothing but infinite tact and temper on both sides would avail to do this, and the Assembly has neither one nor the other, while M. THIERS, who has tact, has not always temper. Fortunately the instinct of danger has hitherto stood in the place of both these qualities. It is to the credit alike of the majority and of the Government that M. GUIRAUD's sarcasms provoked neither imitation nor reply.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE THAMES EMBANKMENT.

IT is difficult to understand the ill-natured and almost malicious perversity which the Ministry have consistently displayed with regard to the Thames Embankment. Two years ago they were defeated in an attempt to appropriate for the erection of public offices the ground which has been reclaimed from the river at a great expense by the ratepayers of the metropolis. Last year Mr. GLADSTONE proposed to refer the question of the disputed ground to the arbitration of a Select Committee nominated by himself; the Committee heard all that the Government could urge, and decided that the land should be set apart as a public garden, "at a rental calculated after the rate paid for the adjoining portions of land reclaimed." This award has been repudiated by the Government, simply because they do not like it. They insist that the principle which has been formally laid down by the Board of Trade, and uniformly adhered to for some years past, of surrendering foreshore rights when required for public purposes at a nominal rent, shall be departed from in the case of the Thames Embankment, and that the ratepayers of London, who have spent a couple of millions in constructing a great public work and in providing a handsome approach to the Houses of Parliament, shall be compelled to pay for land which they have created and which previously did not exist, as if it had always been a valuable estate in the actual possession of the Crown. It is known that Mr. GLADSTONE has peculiar ideas as to the political wickedness of the metropolis, and he is perhaps not sorry to have an opportunity of getting up a cry that will pit "the country" against the capital. Nothing can be more iniquitous than that the virtuous and enlightened population of the provinces should be taxed in order to provide a pleasant lounge for the abandoned capitalists who debauch the press; but it may perhaps be doubted whether the political views of the nurserymaids and children in perambulators who frequent the Embankment have been strongly influenced by a corrupt interest in the purchase of commissions. The question which the House of Commons has to decide is not, as the Government puts it, whether a local improvement shall be paid for out of the national revenue, but whether the national revenue shall be increased at the cost of a local improvement. It is true that the Crown has magnanimously surrendered the foreshore and the water-frontage; but the foreshore, until the ratepayers reclaimed it, was nothing but a bed of mephitic mud washed by the tide, and the only return from the water-frontage was some 400*l.* for a little wharf. The increased rental which has been obtained from the Crown lands for enlarged gardens, and that which the Metropolitan Board is willing to pay, would almost cover the sinking loan, and it would be more than made up if the Metropolitan Board were to throw in, as has been suggested, two acres of ground near Whitehall Place. It may be argued that the country ought not to lose by the Embankment; but it is difficult to conceive why the country should expect to make a profit out of it.

The question as to whether it is a very simple one, and whether it is separate it from various extraneous matters, and whether it has got mixed up in the course of controversy. The question is

Government is summed up very clearly in the draft Report which the Commission of the Enquiry submitted to the Select Committee. It is responsible as unworthy of a moment's notice the fantastic theory as to the private ownership of the Crown lands with which Mr. GLADSTONE once startled and amused the House of Commons. Mr. GLADSTONE's argument was that the income of the Sovereign is fixed at the full value of these lands at the beginning of each reign, that they are held in trust by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, not for the nation, but for the Sovereign, and that it would be a fraud upon the latter if on every occasion the utmost money value were not squeezed out of them. In point of fact, as Mr. LOWE shows, the beneficial ownership of the Crown lands is substantially in the nation; "for there is no chance that the Sovereign will ever again manage for his own benefit the estate of the Crown, or be independent of Parliament as trustee for the nation." Once it was the custom to give the Sovereign so much land, out of which he was entitled during his lifetime to make the best revenue he could. This was found to be, for various reasons, an inconvenient plan; and the Sovereign is now paid by a fixed salary in cash, instead of by the grant of an estate. It is certain that when the Civil List has to be settled at the beginning of the next reign the sum voted will not in any degree be affected by the question whether the Thames Embankment is laid out as public gardens, or is covered with Mr. Goss's "superior" family mansions, or by the wild assumption that it is only by the personal forbearance of the Sovereign that Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens are not cut up into streets and terraces. The Crown lands are essentially national property, and they are therefore at the disposal of Parliament for any purpose to which Parliament may think fit to apply them. The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER argues that the reclaimed ground of the Thames Embankment must be treated as if it were a slice of one of the Royal Parks, and that if the ratepayers of London want to have it, they must pay for it at the full market price. When this land was under water it was a freehold of the Crown, and the trifling circumstance that the water has been removed from above it, and that it has been converted from wet mud into dry land, does not affect the rights of the freeholder. There is a well-known play in which an unscrupulous speculator sells his rights in a salt-mine which turns out to be the open sea; and the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER's "valuable property" of foetid ooze at the bottom of the Thames is an estate of a similar description. Legally, of course the rights of the Crown are not affected by the transformation which the estate has undergone; but justice and common sense, to say nothing of common honesty, alike require that the ratepayers should have the benefit of the soil which they have themselves created. "When one section of the community," says Mr. LOWE, "desires to obtain for its use the property of others, there is but one honest way of doing this—to pay for it." The ratepayers may reply that the property they claim is substantially their own, since it did not exist until they made it. It cannot seriously be pretended that the Embankment has diminished the value of the Crown property adjoining it, or that flower-beds and a noble roadway would drive away householders. Sir J. PENNETHORNE, who thinks that a garden frequented by nurserymaids and soldiers might be disagreeable to the residents in "superior houses," was obliged to admit that an open space of black slime for the recreation of mud-larks does not add to the amenity of a family mansion. The value of the houses in Arlington Street, Park Lane, and other streets surrounding the Parks is a conclusive proof that, if dwellings were built on the site of Fife House, the demand for them would not be affected by a public garden being interposed between the houses and the Embankment.

It is important to distinguish in such a case as this between the duty of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests and the duty of the Government. The relation of the Commissioners to the Board of Works or the Treasury is analogous to that of the Commander-in-Chief to the Secretary of War. In each case it has been thought desirable that a Parliamentary official, liable to political question, should not be concerned with the management in detail of certain delicate transactions. The Commissioners are in the position of technical officials, and they are bound to make the most of the property entrusted to them, subject to the general instructions of their superiors. If anybody is to blame in this matter, it is not the Commissioners, but the Government. It is for the State to lay down the principles on which the national estates shall be administered, and to see that the Commissioners comply with those principles. We agree with Mr. LOWE that the Commissioners bound, in the first instance, to look with jealousy and distrust upon any proposal for the appropriation of national property to local uses. Something of course is due to London as the capital; but London has already a great many Parks and pleasure-grounds which have been provided by the State, and it is only reasonable that, if it wants more gardens, it should pay for them, just as any Little Pedlington would have to do. This is a sound principle, and it has been enforced in the case of the new Parks which have been opened by the Metropolitan Board. In reality, however, the ratepayers have paid for the ground which they now claim along the Embankment, inasmuch as they paid for making it. The Embankment is not only a work of great public convenience, but it has added conspicuously to the dignity and beauty of the capital, and may fairly be ranked among our national monuments. If an application had been made to the Government to bear part of the expense of constructing it, a good deal might have been said in favour of the proposal; but all that is now asked is that the Government shall not take advantage of certain technical rights in order to tax the ratepayers for their enterprise and liberality.

It has been said that, as Liverpool, Glasgow, and other towns have had to pay considerable sums for foreshore rights, London would be unduly favoured if the payment on account of the Embankment were remitted or reduced to a nominal sum. It must be remembered, however, that while Liverpool and Glasgow derive a handsome revenue from the purposes to which they have applied the foreshores, there are no tolls on the Embankment from which the ratepayers of the metropolis can recoup themselves. Moreover, the practice of exacting a substantial rent for foreshore rights has been discarded since 1866, when the management of this kind of property was transferred from the Commissioners of Woods to the Board of Trade. The principle upon which the Board has since acted is stated in a Minute of this date. The assumption, it is pointed out, is fatally erroneous that the pecuniary interest of the public in the foreshore is its most important interest; to sell it to private persons because a high price is offered, without reference to the interests of public health and enjoyment, would be as absurd as to sell Dover Pier or to enclose or build in the London Parks. There is no reason why private houses should be erected on the site of Fife House; and the most appropriate and satisfactory course would be to use the ground for one or more handsome public buildings, with open gardens in front. This would add greatly to the beauty of the Embankment, and if the Government wanted a little of the reclaimed ground for the purpose, an amicable agreement on the subject might no doubt be come to with the Metropolitan Board.

LEGISLATION AGAINST THE INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY.

THE Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs has addressed to the representatives of the Monarchy in different countries a Circular in which he recommends the adoption of common measures against the International Society. One of his proposals is to the effect that members of the Society shall be included in treaties of extradition which have hitherto never extended to persons accused only of political offences. The Ministers had already obtained the sanction of the Congress to domestic measures of repression which may possibly be justified by expediency or necessity. The Constitution of 1869 expressly recognizes the right of political association; but it was easy to foresee that every Government would make an exception against organizations which appeared to endanger the political and social fabric. The Republican party, forming a considerable minority of the population, has often displayed subversive and anarchical tendencies; and if the International Society has any hold on the people, it must have identified itself with the old Jacobinical faction. The Spaniards are of all nations the least likely to feel enthusiasm for cosmopolitan doctrines which affect to obliterate national distinctions. Their aspirations, their virtues, and their vices are indigenous and local; and Republican agitators are more inclined to ally themselves with disaffected Carlists than with the unfamiliar demagogues of Paris and London. Some Continental Powers may possibly be disposed to concert with the Spanish Government measures for the suppression of a Society which has undoubtedly caused general alarm. But if the Spanish Minister in England understands the habitual policy of the Government to which he is accredited, he will communicate the Circular only in obedience to the official order of his chief. It is wholly out of the question that the English Government should either hamper its internal legislation by agreements with foreign States or modify its treaties of extradition in the manner which is suggested on the part of Spain. Those who join the International Society in Spain, in France, or in Germany may possibly be guilty of a moral offence, as well as a violation of the laws of the country in which they reside; but, of the innumerable exiles who during the troubles of Europe have taken refuge in England, few have been perfect characters, and nearly all have in their respective countries come into collision with some existing law. After the atrocities perpetrated by the Paris Commune, hasty protests were published against the possible concession to assassins and anarchists of the right of asylum which belongs to political offenders. The English Government wisely declined to recommend to Parliament any change in the law, and not a single demand for extradition of a Communist has been made by the French Government. Much less can simple membership of any Association be regarded as an overt act which could justify the surrender of a refugee. Among those who nominally belong to the International Club there are probably wide differences of opinion and of purpose, and even the deliberate propagation of the most mischievous opinions is constantly pursued in England with perfect impunity.

The French Assembly has passed, at the instance of the Government, a stringent penal Bill against the International Society. It is possible that measures which would meet with little favour in an English Parliament may be expedient or necessary in France; and, as a general rule, it is injudicious to criticize too severely the proceedings of a foreign Legislature. Notwithstanding the statements of apologists, the Society has repeatedly avowed its hostility to property, to religion, and to the middle and upper classes of society; and some of its members would probably welcome any opportunity of establishing their principles by force. Whether the Association is in France engaged in a conspiracy is a question for the French Assembly to decide, with the aid of any information which may be furnished by the Government. The Committee which approved the Ministerial Bill has apparently been guilty of an error in judgment in relying on doubtful or injudicious doctrines of political economy. If it is true that a large part of the working class must necessarily content itself with the bare means of subsistence, it would be prudent rather to leave those concerned to ascertain the fact by experiment than to invite their acquiescence by demonstrating the inevitable result of existing social arrangements. Still less judicious is a reference to the authoritative declaration that the poor will always be with those to whom the statement was addressed, or perhaps with a remote posterity. There are some fortunate regions in which there are no poor, and if it were possible to alter their condition, it would scarcely be a religious duty to introduce the element of poverty or of pauperism. M. LOUIS BLANC, who announced that he had never been connected with the International Society, profited by the mistake of the advocates of the Bill to contend that it could not be a crime to profess a desire for the amelioration of the state of the working classes. His own attacks on TURGOR and SAY were probably caused by an imperfect comprehension of their doctrines, but M. LOUIS BLANC is right in saying that disbelief in the conclusions of the soundest economists is not a proper subject of penal legislation. When the millennium arrives, there may perhaps be laws against talking or believing nonsense, if laws are any longer required; but legislators are not yet so infallible as to be justified in attaching punishments to offences which M. LOUIS BLANC describes as intellectual. A Bill which renders attacks on religious doctrines penal seems anomalous on the part of a Legislature which perhaps contains a majority of disciples of VOLTAIRE. The measure can only be defended by sufficient proof that the theoretical creed which is denounced is merely the symbol and bond of union among enemies of society engaged in a plot for the attainment of their objects. A part even of the practical aims of the International Society is, as M. LOUIS BLANC observed, regarded as legitimate in England. If a Trade Union has a right to organize itself in any country, it is difficult to understand how its action becomes criminal when the working classes of several countries unite for the same purpose. In spite of Sheffield outrages and of many minor abuses which have resulted from trade combinations, it is evident that artisans have a right to agree among themselves as to the conditions on which they will work. Their leaders long since discovered that it was useless and impotent to extort from the employers of labour terms which involved the transference of certain branches of work to foreign countries. The most obvious mode of overcoming the difficulty was to persuade their fellow-craftsmen in foreign countries to refuse their aid to the external competition which in some degree regulates the price of domestic labour. Some English workmen who were deputed to visit the last great Paris Exhibition formed the nucleus of the International Society, and it is said that, although some of the English managers are among the most pestilent of political agitators, the great body of their constituents have adhered more closely than their Continental allies to the original purpose of the organization. At Bielefeld and at Lausanne the managers of successive Congresses contrived to pledge their followers to the wildest doctrines of revolutionary spoliation; nor have the English delegates at any time opposed the most anarchical proposals of French or German demagogues. At home they are compelled to confine themselves for the most part to the more modest objects of raising wages or of shortening the hours of labour. It is not yet known whether they have attained any practical success; and they have certainly not raised the wages of Belgian or German workmen to the English level. M. LOUIS BLANC adroitly directed the attention of the Assembly to the economic side of the system, while the penal clauses of the Bill had been really directed against revolutionary designs. Even if the majority had been convinced by M. LOUIS BLANC's arguments in favour of freedom of opinion, it would have remembered that the obnoxious Association had been closely associated with the rebellion of Paris. The English Trade Unions have not hitherto responded to the repeated invitations of political agitators to divert their efforts to revolutionary purposes.

Although there may be no necessary connexion between the organization of the International and the criminal proceedings of some of its chiefs, it is undeniable that its influence was used both to promote, and afterwards to defend, the worst excesses of the Paris Commune. The Council of the Society sitting in London, and including many English members, published a formal approval, drawn by a German revolutionist, of the murder of the Archbishop of PARIS and his companions in misfortune. Two or three of the more respectable of the English members thought it right or prudent to disavow the document, and to withdraw their names from the Association; but some even of their English colleagues still remain responsible for a formal justification of the worst of crimes. It may be hoped that in England there will be no hostages to murder, and that even if the opportunity were presented, English revolutionists would shrink from following the precedent which they applaud. Extreme ignorance and an habitual love of violent language may perhaps excuse or explain their nominal adherence to the doctrine of assassination. It is not surprising that French statesmen should, while the Tuileries and the Hôtel de Ville are still in ruins, take a sterner view of the guilt of the Association. Committees of Assemblies, like private persons, often assign reasons which have little effect in determining their conduct. Quotations from TURGOR or from the New Testament are open to M. LOUIS BLANC's criticisms, but the leaders of the Society were convicted by courts-martial, not of economic heresies, but of rebellion, and in some instances of still graver crimes. In the insecure condition of France it is excusable to take precautions against enemies who may perhaps have been but temporarily subdued. When our native OGBURN and BRADLAUGHS announce their intention of committing contingent high treason, society consoles itself with the conjecture that they will forfeit their pledges, or that, in default of a judicious inconsistency, they will be hanged. In the meantime there is no law against adhesion to the principles of the International or of any other Society; and the great number of revolutionary clubs which always consist of the same members seems to show that the International is not regarded even by its supporters as sufficiently powerful to overthrow society. The participation of foreigners in the management of its affairs is not unlikely to interfere with its local popularity.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.

IF the Public Health Bill did nothing more than create a single Sanitary authority in every part of the country, and transfer to it all the powers now possessed by Sanitary authorities, Sewer authorities, and Boards of Health, it would be an immense improvement on the present state of things. The whole of England will in future be divided into urban and rural sanitary districts. Urban sanitary districts will include boroughs, Elective Improvement Act districts, and Local Government districts; and the sanitary authorities will be the Town Councils, the Improvement Commissioners, and the Local Boards. It will no longer be left open to the to adopt or not adopt the Local Government Acts. They will be deemed to be in force "within every urban district, and all the powers and duties conferred by them, as well as by the Sewage Utilization Acts, the Nuisances Removal Acts, and the Diseases Prevention Act, will in future be exercised by the urban sanitary authority. The rural sanitary districts will include the rest of the country. Each rural Union will constitute a rural sanitary district, and the Guardians of the Union will constitute the rural sanitary authority. The powers and duties vested in the rural authorities will be the same as those vested in the urban authorities, with the exception that the Local Government Acts will not be in force in rural districts. After the passing of this Bill, therefore, every ratepayer will know that in giving his vote at an election, whether of Town Councillor, or Improvement Commissioner, or member of a Local Board, or Guardian of the Poor, he is taking part in the election of an official specially charged with the supervision of all matters relating to public health in that district. He will know, too, that to the officials thus elected he has a right to look for information and assistance whenever his own health or that of his neighbours suffers from preventible causes. It will no longer be in the power of an ignorant or niggardly minority to deny him this satisfaction. Permissive legislation will have come to an end; compulsory legislation will have begun. The case of new towns suddenly springing up, or of old towns outrunning their present boundaries, is met by a provision empowering the Local Government Board, on the application of any rural sanitary authority, to invest such authority with all the powers and duties of an urban authority, and further to declare any rural sanitary district, or any part of one, to be an urban district; and on this declaration being confirmed by Parliament, the district will become a Local Government District, and be subject to the jurisdiction of a Local Board. Power is also given to the Local Government Board at its discretion to form any sanitary districts into a united district for any of the purposes of the Sanitary Acts, especially for the prevention of the pollution or obstruction of streams, for procuring a common supply of water, or for constructing a system of sewerage. This provision meets the need for water-shed authorities.

Upon the authorities thus constituted sundry new powers and duties are conferred by the Bill. They must appoint Medical Officers of Health and Inspectors of Nuisances, and such other officers as are necessary for the efficient execution of the Sanitary Acts. As regards the rural authorities, the Local Government Board will have the same powers with regard to the appointment of Medical Officers of Health which they already possess in the case of the District Medical Officer of a Union. They will have, that is to say, a veto on the appointment and the sole power of removing them, and they will pay half their salaries. The Bill does not extend this provision to the Medical Officers of Health appointed by urban authorities. In the case of large towns it would clearly be superfluous. A wealthy and intelligent community, such as Liverpool or Bristol, may be trusted to know the value of having thoroughly energetic and independent officers. But there are many small towns in which the level of intelligence in the sanitary authority will be no higher than in the rural districts, and there is no reason why the same check should not be applied to them. A limit of population might be fixed above which the provision should not apply, or the Local Government Board might have a discretionary power to suspend its operation.

Two comprehensive clauses deal with the pollution of rivers. The first prohibits, under penalty of certain prescribed fines, the throwing of any solid refuse into a stream "in such quantities as to interfere with its due flow or to pollute its waters." The second imposes a similar penalty upon any person who causes or permits sewage matter, "or other polluting liquid," to fall into a stream. Eight scientific tests of what constitutes a polluting liquid are given in this section. They are taken from the Report of the Rivers Pollution Commission, but though for this reason they carry with them a certain prima facie weight, they will probably be the subject of some criticism in Committee. It is important, however, that the principle of a test should be preserved, as without something of the kind it might be difficult in a mining district to obtain a conviction under any circumstances. Under the Public Health Act of 1848 and the Sanitary Act of 1852 it is incumbent upon sanitary authorities, whether urban or rural, to see that all houses are furnished with sufficient means of drainage, and that no drains are allowed to become a nuisance. The Public Health Bill attends and enlarges this provision. All sewers and drains, whether public or private, are henceforth to be maintained provided with means of ventilation, and kept so as to effectually prevent them from being dangerous to health. Every urban authority is to remove all refuse from houses, streets, and cesspools. Rural sanitary authorities may, if they choose, undertake to do the same thing; and if any urban authority, or any rural authority which has undertaken to remove refuse, omits to do so, it will be liable to a fine of ten shillings a day, to be paid to the occupier of the house, whose interest it thus becomes to see that they do not escape without punishment. The officers of the sanitary authorities may enter any house, after giving reasonable notice to the occupier, and inspect the drains for the purpose of ascertaining whether they are in such a condition as not to be a nuisance or injurious to health; and they are further ordered to make a similar inspection on the request of the owner or occupier of any house in their district, and to report to such owner or occupier the result of their inspection. The water supplied to every sanitary district, whether by the sanitary authority or by any Company or person, is to be effectually filtered when necessary, and to be free from any impurities rendering it unwholesome, or injurious, or dangerous to health. The water so supplied, as well as all polluting matter flowing into streams, is to be analysed under the direction of the Local Government Board. Other sections of the Bill impose on the sanitary authorities the duty of providing hospitals, medical assistance, and the means of disinfection for persons affected by contagious or epidemic diseases, and the Local Government Board may require the Medical Officers of Health to report all particulars of sickness within their respective districts.

The real importance of the Public Health Bill is shown but imperfectly by this bare enumeration of its provisions. They are so many supplements of the existing law, and some of the criticisms to which they have already been subjected show that their purport can only be understood when each is referred to its proper place in the network of sanitary enactments. It will then, we believe, be seen that the general effect of the measure, if properly carried out, will be to give the sanitary authorities all the powers that are required for the universal supply of pure air and pure water, or for the prevention and suppression of the various disturbing influences by which this universal supply is impeded or prevented, and to make it their duty to exercise these powers as often as an occasion presents itself. But when this has been conceded, two inquiries of great moment remain to be answered. What means of making an unwilling sanitary authority do its duty will be at the disposal of the Local Government Board, and how will it be known when a sanitary authority has failed in its duty? To the first of these questions the Bill supplies a sufficient answer. The 74th section provides that if any sanitary authority makes default in discharging any of the duties imposed on it by the Sanitary Acts, the Local Government Board may appoint an agent of its own to perform the duty, and charge the cost of performance to the defaulting authority. Or it may delegate to any body of persons locally interested in remedying the default all or part of the powers of the defaulting sanitary authority, including the power of levying and of borrowing money on the security of the local rate. Or it may make an order upon the defaulting authority, and enforce it by mandamus. Or it may apply in a summary manner to the Court of Queen's Bench to have its order enforced as if it were a rule of Court. Or, in the case of a Local Government District containing less than three thousand inhabitants, it may merge the district in some larger area. By one or other of these expedients every form of sanitary perverseness seems to be guarded against. To the other inquiry the Bill does not give an answer. The whole system of sanitary inspection on behalf of the Local Government Board remains to be created by an administrative decree. Under the Act of last Session the Board has power to appoint such officers as it thinks necessary, and by a clause in the present Bill the inspectors so appointed are to have, as regards the public health, powers similar to those possessed by Poor Law Inspectors as regards the administration of poor relief. Mr. STANSFELD's task will only have begun when the Bill has become law. The organization of his department will be scarcely less important than the completion of the law which that department will have to enforce.

THE MEGARA INQUIRY

THE chief impression which is produced by reading the report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the case of the Megara is that the familiar constitutional maxim which asserts the infallibility of the Sovereign has now been extended to his Ministers. It is well known that the King can do no wrong, but we were not aware until we took up this singular document that the Parliamentary officers of the Crown are equally beyond the range of suspicion or reproach. The reason why the King can do no wrong is, we are usually told, because, being a constitutional monarch, he acts under the advice of his Ministers. Whatever is done is in reality their doing, and the responsibility therefore rests upon them, and not upon their master. It appears that this principle is now to be carried at least one step further. The Ministers are responsible for the King; but then the non-Parliamentary officers are responsible for the Ministers. It is obvious that the principle is capable of indefinite expansion, and we are not surprised to find that one of the Megara Commissioners thinks that it ought at any rate to be extended so as to protect the Controller of the Navy. The Commissioners intimate that the administration of the dockyards is full of flagrant and scandalous abuses, that the Megara was unsafe when sent to sea last year, and had probably been unsafe for a number of years previously, and that the blame rests upon the shoulders of Sir S. ROBINSON and a string of subordinate officials, going down even to the engineers and carpenters of the Megara in her several commissions. Everybody, in fact, is censured, except the only officials who are directly responsible to Parliament and the country. The Controller is held to be mainly responsible for the disaster which befell the vessel, inasmuch as "it was for him to take care that the organization of his Department was such that all the duties connected with it were efficiently performed." He ought to have seen how the cement was wearing which was applied to the Megara, and to have insisted on a general examination of her condition while she was lying unemployed at Sheerness. Neither Mr. REED nor Mr. BARNABY is free from responsibility; blame attaches to Mr. H. MORGAN; Captain LUCARD incurred a grave responsibility; Mr. Wm. LADD, Master-Shipwright, and Mr. HENWOOD, Assistant Master-Shipwright at Woolwich, and Mr. STURDIE and Mr. MITCHELL, who held similar offices at Sheerness, are severally deserving of censure. Even the engineers and carpenters of the Megara are in some degree to blame, and Captain THURPE "also appears blamable" for not seeing to the stowing of the cargo before he left Sheerness. From this Report Mr. ROTHELY partially dissents. He is apparently quite willing that the FIRST LORD, the SECRETARY, and the other Parliamentary representatives of the Admiralty should be relieved from all responsibility for the disgraceful muddle and mismanagement of dockyard work; but he is of opinion that the Controller and the officers of the Constructor's Department should also have the benefit of this immunity. He argues that Sir S. ROBINSON's responsibilities extended only to the issue of general instructions for the guidance of the dockyard authorities, not to a minute supervision of their work. The mistake into which the Commissioners have fallen is, Mr. ROTHELY thinks, in not clearly distinguishing between the duties of the Controller and the dockyard officers, and in making him responsible for acts of which he had not, and could not, have any knowledge. We are not quite sure whether there are any powder-monkeys now in the navy, but if there are, they could easily be proved, by an exhaustive process of reasoning in this style, to be the real culprits.

The Commissioners in their history of the Megara go back to 1859. She was then in a very unsatisfactory condition; her bottom plates were much corroded, and the decay was spreading. She was patched up with DAY's cement and continued to carry troops down to the beginning of 1864, when she was pronounced to be unfit for a troop-ship and was ordered to be fitted up as a store-ship. She was thoroughly refitted at a great expense, and SPENCE's cement was substituted for DAY's cement. In 1866, some of the plates being very thin, she underwent further repairs which were to keep her fit for another eighteen months or two years' service. There were some slight repairs in 1867, and more serious repairs in 1870, when her plates were again reported to be very thin. It is clear that as much money was spent in patching and cobbling the Megara as would have built a new ship. She was always having something done to her, and yet never gave satisfaction. It is not surprising that in 1870 Sir SYDNEY DAKES should have remarked that she was the most expensive vessel that could be employed for freight. The Director of Transports concurred in this opinion; the expense of the Megara was so much out of proportion to the value of her services that it was a mystery why she was employed, and he assumed that "some special reason existed for keeping her in commission." Whether there was any truth in this supposition, or what kind of "special reason" is here referred to, the Commissioners do not say; but a good deal of light might perhaps be thrown on the management of the navy if this point were cleared up. It was now resolved to pay off the Megara as "a most extravagant ship, and quite useless as a transport"; but on a representation from Sheerness that she had another year's work in her, she was kept ready for sea, and in the beginning of January she was ordered to Australia with troops. It was on this voyage that she sprang a leak, and had to be run ashore on the Island of St. Paul, where she was abandoned. Besides the hole in her bottom through which the water came, there were three deep indentations not far from it, which were so nearly eaten through that the iron with a slight pressure bent like tin; in fact the plates for five or six feet around the leak were corroded, and they were dangerously weak over an extent of from two to three feet. This corrosion appears to have been due to the continued action of bilge water on the unprotected iron, and must have been going on for some years. The Commissioners express a decided opinion that the state of the Megara was such that she ought never to have been selected for the voyage to Australia, and that, as a matter of fact, she was an unsafe ship when she left Sheerness, and had probably been so for some years. There can be little doubt that the loss of this vessel was due to her not having been properly cemented so as to protect her from the corrosive action of the bilge-water, and that this action would have been discovered if she had not been allowed to go for six or seven years without being thoroughly overhauled.

The Report of the Commissioners leaves us in some doubt as to the functions and uses of what are called Parliamentary officials. It has hitherto been supposed that they are responsible for the management of their respective departments; that they exercise a vigilant supervision over the permanent officials, lay down general rules as to the manner in which work shall be done, and see that it is done punctually and efficiently. They are of course dependent to some extent upon their subordinates, and they are liable to be misled or deceived without any blame to themselves; but if it is proved that the general management of affairs under them is unsatisfactory, they must, on the principles which have hitherto been accepted, be held responsible for it. If it is true, as the Commissioners assert, that the administration of the dockyards is loose and inefficient; that vessels are imperfectly surveyed; that the officials follow a blind routine in the discharge of their duties, and that their chief aim is to shirk work and responsibility; that the Secretariat arrangements at the Admiralty are insufficient, and that its mode of registering correspondence is shamefully defective; that the checks by which responsibility is to be enforced are little better than nominal; that the records of ships are worse than useless, because they are imperfect and misleading; that estimates are carelessly prepared without reference to what has previously been done; that reports from the dockyards are accepted without being tested; that it is scarcely possible to trace the details of the actual work done under each estimate; that a crazy ship may go for six or seven years without being properly overhauled, may be employed long after she has become unsafe, and may at last be despatched to the other side of the world with three or four holes all but eaten through her bottom, and with her iron plates in such a condition that they bend like a bit of tin—if these things are true, most people will be disposed to think that the FIRST LORD and the SECRETARY of the Admiralty must in some degree be responsible for such a melancholy state of affairs. The Commissioners do indeed go so far as to hint that the System of Administration, as they designate it with solemn capitals, is not exactly all that could be desired; but they shrink from piercing through the System and transfixing the Parliamentary heads of the department, who, whenever things go well, take the credit of it, and when things go wrong shirk all responsibility. How is a line to be drawn between the Controller and those above him? It is held that "it was for the Controller to take care that the organization of his department was such that all the duties connected with it were efficiently performed"; but this is pretty much the language in which uninstructed people would be apt to describe the functions and responsibility of the Parliamentary officials.

Either the accounts of the dockyards are or are not properly kept; if not, the Fraser and his colleagues are to blame; on the other hand, if they are properly kept, "my Lords" and their Secretary ought to have discovered how much money was being wasted on a troublesome, costly, and useless vessel which, as the Commissioners admit, it would have been sound economy to get rid of long ago. Again, it either was or should have been known to the Parliamentary officials that for a number of years the Megara had never been properly overhauled, and in the absence of any distinct record on the subject, they should have given the crew and passengers, and not the vessel, the benefit of the doubt, and should have ordered an examination. It was at any rate known at Whitehall that the engines of the Megara were good only for a year when she was despatched on a voyage which, going and coming, would have occupied nearly that time. The whole history of the Megara is a history of false economy and parsimonious extravagance. She was continually being cobbled and mended when it would have been cheaper to break her up and build a new ship; and at the same time the repairs were so insufficient that the vessel must have been unsafe for some years past. It is impossible to read this Report without coming to the conclusion either that Parliamentary officials are useless and had better be got rid of, or that there is a serious omission in the finding of the Commissioners as to the persons upon whom blame rests for the loss of the Megara.

THE USES OF TATTOOING.

THE great moral of the Tichborne case, though we have not as yet seen it mentioned, is the desirableness of tattooing youthful heirs. Every young gentleman who has a fair prospect of inheriting a title or an estate should be indelibly marked in his infancy. It would be easy to arrange the marks in such a way as to defy the ingenuity of forgers. It might be contrived, for example, that a pattern should be made by a machine on the skin like the complex device on a bank-note. The original instrument would then be laid up in the family archives, and could be produced in case of necessity. A very little ingenuity would suffice to perfect this rough suggestion; and it would be inexcusable not to bestow as much care on securing the identification of a human being as is generally bestowed upon our shirts and tablecloths. Before long we expect to see an advertisement in all the papers, "Do you tattoo your children yet?"

The advantage of such a plan is obvious; but it is a melancholy proof of the feebleness of the human intellect and of human language. We talk in all manner of superlatives about the marvellous powers of style possessed by our great writers. Shakspeare is supposed to have had a talent for description; and nobody could ever hit off the external features, at least, of a face with greater skill than Dickens. But if we could imagine Shakspeare and Dickens rolled into one, and set them to describe a person so that he might be recognizable from the description alone, would not the task exceed the powers even of such a combination? We suspect that the dullest police officer who could measure a man's height, and take a note of a broken nose or a cast in the eye, would supply far more serviceable information than the greatest artist in words could extract from characteristics not accurately measurable by a foot-rule. Language at its best is a coarse and clumsy instrument to paint the infinitely varying and minute peculiarities upon which our recognition of a human countenance depends. You may walk in the streets of London for a day and not meet two people whose noses are indistinguishably alike; and yet the whole catalogue of phrases applicable to noses—short, snub, aquiline, and so forth—would scarcely do more than enable you to mark unmistakably the difference between the organs of the late Duke of Wellington and of a negro. The chances are, therefore, that even if a witness could distinguish one countenance from another beyond all possibility of doubt, he would be utterly unable to convey to other persons the differences on which his recognition depends. If another witness, who was either dishonest or whose perceptions were blunter, chose to contradict him, we could not look into their minds in order to inspect the ideal patterns by comparison with which the difference or the identity was established; and there is no art of verbal photography. Our perceptions altogether outrun our powers of utterance, and it is only to a very limited extent that we are capable of communicating ideas. We can no more define in words a colour or a sound than we can point out with a walking-stick the minutest markings on a butterfly's wing; and it would be vain therefore to attempt the description of voices and complexions which we instantaneously recognize when heard or seen.

If, however, tattooing is desirable to supply the deficiencies of language, it is still more imperatively required to supply the deficiencies of the intellect which uses that imperfect instrument. Our language cannot render our perceptions visible and audible; but even if it could, they would supply a most treacherous ground for positive conclusions. Everybody has remarked since the speech of the Attorney-General the curious process by which the believers in the Claimant were converted; how, when a single trick had been successfully played off upon them, their vanity became interested in believing the whole story, and their intellects succeeded in representing every new fact as somehow confirmatory of the foregoing conclusion. The lesson was an instructive one in many ways; for the secret of the Claimant's power was precisely the secret upon which all spiritualist and other impostors depend for success. A man is first asked whether he has been the victim of a hoax, or the laws of nature have been suspended. Naturally he prefers to believe that the laws of nature have been suspended; and from that moment he becomes unintentionally the ally of the impostor, and develops a strange ingenuity in evading all difficulties and seizing every bit of evidence that seems to make in his favour. When we have once come to appreciate this process, we see how erroneous is the ordinary assumption that people habitually speak the truth and are tolerable judges of evidence. David tells us that he was hasty in asserting that all men are liars; but he might have said deliberately that most men are either liars or the unconscious accomplices of liars. The quantity of sheer unadorned lying which exists in this world is, we suspect, greatly underestimated by most people; and of the quantity of false statement which is not quite lying, because it begins by self-deception, few persons have even a faint conception. The reason of this seems to be simple enough. For practical purposes we are obliged to assume that people speak the truth. A certain quantity of mutual trust is necessary in order to carry on the business of life; and we naturally make the mistake of confounding a provisional assumption which for ordinary purposes is accurate enough with a statement of actual facts, and then apply it to cases where it is more frequently falsified than verified. We infer from the practical necessity of trusting people in trifles that they are always trustworthy even in serious matters; and thus we exaggerate beyond all bounds the weight which should properly be attached to a simple unsupported assertion. If a respectable person, that is to say, a man in a black coat who has not been convicted of picking pockets, tells us the wildest story of ghosts or rapping tables, the one hypothesis which the ordinary mind altogether refuses to admit is the surely not inconceivable one that he is a liar and a cheat. It is thought to be almost paradoxical to assert that any one, outside of the criminal classes, is ever guilty of downright falsehood. The weakness is certainly amiable; and yet it may fairly be doubted whether a capacity to tell the truth and nothing but the truth is not as rare as the habit of unequivocal lying.

It seems, then, at first sight rather singular that personation is not a more common trick than it appears to be in fact. For this is one of those cases in which there is a natural predisposition among persons of ill-regulated minds, or, in other words, among the great majority of the human race, to go half-way to meet the impostor. Even where no claim has been actually put forward, the popular imagination is ready to invent an appropriate legend in order to satisfy its own natural longing for the marvellous. The history of simpler times is full of such occurrences. Whenever a great hero died in an obscure manner, a legend immediately grew up, telling how he was waiting in some enchanted land or beneath the roots of some mysterious mountain for the day when he should once more reappear in his ancient glory. Sometimes a clever pretender took advantage of this state of mind, but the legend was able to maintain itself even without such a nucleus around which it might crystallize. The poor Lady Tichborne, refusing to believe in the death of her son and always on the lookout for his return, is merely a type of the popular state of mind when any object of widely-spread interest has vanished from the world. Royal personages are now surrounded so closely by observers of all their actions, they are so much in the habit of being interviewed, even at the moment of death, that there is little chance of the uncertainty which is necessary to generate even a popular delusion. They are no longer withdrawn in a cloud from our midst like a Homeric hero from a battle, but take their leave of us in as public a fashion as that in which princes used to be snatched into the world. And yet, even in our days, there were probably large districts in France where Napoleon III. would easily have been accepted rather as a new avatar of the first Emperor than as his nephew. In families of a position beneath royalty there are of course more frequent opportunities for fraud; and now that a conspicuous example has been presented, we may possibly expect to see a repetition of the experiment. It is perhaps not quite out of the question that a new Sir Roger may yet start from the Australian bush or the backwoods of America. The profession of a personator is not altogether so disagreeable as many other modes of precarious existence. The claimant may be certain of a good deal of popular sympathy if he shows a moderate amount of skill in making out his case; some of the difficulties in his path have been buoyed out by the last adventurer; and if the worst comes to the worst, he will ultimately be provided for at the public expense. Probably after a short time the pangs of what serves him for a conscience, if he is rash enough to maintain such a luxury, would be satisfactorily quenched. It is a question which can never be satisfactorily answered, but which appears to be open to discussion, whether the Claimant himself did not at some time or other really believe himself to be what he professed. George IV. it is credibly said, believed himself to have been at the battle of Waterloo, by dint of telling the story often enough. There is certainly a period at which a liar of the first water, a man who has that passion for falsehood which great thinkers have for truth, gradually loses the power of distinguishing between fact and fiction. Garrick maintained that, for the time of acting, he believed himself to be Richard III. A man who systematically represents the part of somebody else may end, after a sufficient course of lying and dissimulation, in becoming puzzled as to his own identity. Everybody has sometimes been puzzled between the recollection of having done something and the recollection of having heard about it. How can we assign limits to such a process, or say confidently that we may not, by assiduous labour, generate a kind of permanent hallucination which will become to us a second nature? It has often been asked lately what is the value of our recollections of another person whom we have not seen for fourteen or fifteen years. We may go further, and ask what is the value of our recollections of ourselves? Are they not sufficiently shadowy to make it possible, by sufficient doses of what is at first deliberate falsehood, to render them altogether evanescent, and to substitute for them a set of fictitious recollections gradually acquiring firmness and consistency?

The question is obviously insoluble, because we cannot look into a rogue's mind, and it is precarious work to infer it from his outward words and actions. If such a feat could be performed, it would of course make the task of detection easier. Meanwhile we have the consolation of reflecting upon the advantages of the tutting. It is easy enough to persuade a large part of the world, and even, it may be, to deceive oneself; but after all there generally remain a certain number of hard insoluble facts which have an awkward way of cropping up without having been properly foreseen. The ease with which an impression can be made upon uncritical minds illustrates the ease with which a legend would spring up in ages before criticism was possible; but the difficulty of satisfying anything like a genuine inquiry remains so enormous that the chances must always be indefinitely great against permanent success. Luckily we have not yet reached the consummation of settling legal facts by universal suffrage and the average common sense. When that happens we may expect some very singular results, and nobody would know with any great certainty whether he was himself or somebody else.

THE SECRET POLICY OF THE VATICAN.

IT was probably beyond the expectations of Prince Bismarck himself to carry his School Inspection Bill in the Upper House by a majority nearly double what he had obtained in the Lower House. Indeed it was thought to the last moment doubtful whether it would be carried at all. It was distasteful to the Conservative party, and still more to the Court, though the King had given it his formal sanction. And it offended the keenest susceptibilities of the great body of the Protestant, no less than of the Catholic, clergy, though it was at the influence of the latter only that it was really aimed. The pending controversy on the relations of Church and State in Germany, of which this affair is one phase, is already producing quite a literature of its own, and we may gather from the work recently published by Dr. Fabri, an Evangelical pastor, under the title Staat und Kirche, some information as to the objections entertained by his co-religionists to the measure. He is alarmed generally at anything which may tend to loosen the union between the secular and spiritual authorities, and he is avowedly distrustful of the inherent capability of the Evangelical Church to stand alone. He fears that the political measures directed against the Ultramontane party will only be able to strike it through the sides of their Protestant rivals, and will thus in the long run promote the triumph of Roman Catholicism. He is also disposed to regard the policy of the Chancellor in his contest with Ultramontanism as hazardous for the interests of the new Empire itself, and thinks it too late now to assail the infallibilist doctrine or the system of Papal absolutism which it sustains—a view which is naturally controverted by some of his critics. His treatise, however, goes far to explain the sort of alliance, or at least armed neutrality, established between the extreme sections of Catholic and Protestant opinion, in their common resistance to Prince Bismarck's Bill. The argument by which the Prussian Minister conquered or disarmed the various and powerful forces arrayed against him was such as, once admitting the alleged facts, could hardly fail to control the suffrage of any national Assembly. Illicus intra muros peccatur et extra was the text and keynote of his discourse, and he certainly produced cogent reasons for believing that an organized conspiracy exists within the heart of the German Empire, designed to bring about its dismemberment. We need not repeat here what we have pointed out before as to the altered position of the Roman Court since Sadowna and Sedan, or the obvious grounds which induce it to make Prussia, to use Prince Bismarck's words, "the butt of its constant attacks," and to select Poland as the natural centre and base of operations. It is worth noting, however, that Mgr. de Ladachowski has been secretly made Primate of All Poland, which is the more remarkable as the dignity had been long extinct; and it has been for centuries the received policy of Rome to diminish or equalise all intermediate ranks of the hierarchy on the old Turquinian principle of cutting down the taller poppy-heads. Since the Ladonian Decretals found currency in Europe, the powers of archbishops and primates have been gradually curtailed, while their number has been multiplied, and the patriarchal office has been reduced to a mere titular decoration. It cannot therefore be without some special object that the Primacy of All Poland, including even its Austrian and Russian provinces, is suddenly revived in the person of the Archbishop of Posen. Still more significant are the letters addressed to Dr. Kosmin by Herr Windhorst, late Minister of King George of Hanover, and by Bishop Ketteler, which were read in the House by Prince Bismarck. Bishop Ketteler of Mayence, it must be remembered, is a man of mark in his way, and the recognized leader of the Gesamtdeutsche party among the German bishops. Even while he was supposed to be leading the minority at the Vatican Council, he was all along the tool or dupe of the Jesuits; and his real animus came out clearly enough in his violent attacks immediately after his return home on those who had before been weak enough to believe in the sincerity of his professed convictions, and were still courageous enough to maintain their own. We are not at all surprised to find him plotting—as Dr. Dollinger in his famous Declaration last year asserted that the infallibilists inevitably would plot—against the new Empire of which he is a subject, in the temporal interests of the Pope.

Apart from the exciting nature of the particular conflict now raging in Germany, the affair has a wider interest of its own, from the striking illustration it affords of the habitual policy of the Roman Court and its standing army, the Jesuits. It must be borne in mind that Rome does not profess to have any cause of complaint against the religious policy of Prussia towards her Catholic subjects; and, indeed, till a year or two ago the two Powers were on the most friendly terms. The King of Prussia, if our memory serves us, presented a magnificent Brussels carpet for the Council Chamber in St. Peter's. Indeed, the force and range of the resistance to Prince Bismarck's Bill was due in great measure to his strict observance of the acknowledged Prussian principle of religious equality. The backbone of the opposition would have been broken if his Protestant supporters had been consoled by the assurance that what was sauce for the Ultramontane goose should not be sauce for the Evangelical gander. But no such compromise was ever dreamt of. It is not the religious interests of Catholicism, but the temporal pretensions of the Papacy, to which German Catholics are required to postpone the unity and independence of their country. "In mere spiritualibus," as the old Prince Bishops used to phrase it in the days before the Revolution, they perfectly understood that Prince Bismarck had no desire whatever to interfere with them, but so far from being content with spiritual freedom, Rome has never for a moment allowed such considerations to stand in the way of her dynastic claims. It is notorious that the Catholic priesthood of Prussia hold a higher place in popular estimation than their brethren in Italy or France, and it is almost equally notorious that the clergy of North Italy are more respectable and more respected than those trained under the orthodox Governments of Rome and Naples. There is abundant Roman Catholic, and even Ultramontane, testimony to these facts; yet the Pope and his advisers would gladly throw Germany into a conflagration, and compel German Catholics to choose between treason and apostasy, in the forlorn hope of restoring the corrupt régime which made Rome the scandal as well as the centre of Christendom. There is nothing new in this, nor is there anything new in the school being employed as one of the main instruments of political propagandism. From the first it was the chosen stronghold of the Jesuits, and the present tone of Catholic society on the Continent, both clerical and lay, is in great measure due to their long ascendancy in the education of Catholic Europe. History testifies that even in the middle ages the terrible weapons of excommunication and interdict were far oftener invoked to crush a revolted city or enforce a disputed tax than for the preservation of piety or faith. After the Reformation other and less direct methods of influence had of course to be discovered, but the spirit remained unchanged. It is a curious fact that the Index Expurgatorius, which was a real power in Latin countries, has been worked at least as much in the civil as in the religious interests of Rome, and it protected them by killing all literary energy and taste, till Latin theology and French novels became the staple and almost sole commodity of Roman booksellers. Not unfrequently ecclesiastical have been deliberately sacrificed to political considerations, as when Clement VII. aided the Smalkaldic League against Charles V. The zealous champion of Catholicism and Urban VIII. found it convenient to support the Protestant schemes of Gustavus Adolphus. In later days Pius VI. and Pius VII. did not deny that "they regarded the quality of a territorial prince more highly than that of head of the Church, and felt bound to act accordingly." Those who guide the counsels of the Vatican at the present hour evidently share that view. To embroil the Continent, already exhausted by two destructive wars, in a fresh and deadlier conflict, for the possible chance of rebuilding the Papal throne out of the ruins, even were the plot to prove successful, would do little to advance the religious interests of the Church, which the Univers declared the other day had been "handed over to Satan" by the appointment of a French Ambassador to the Italian Court. We are aware that this perverse estimate of the relative value of secular and spiritual rights is not confined to the members of any one communion. Lord Eldon was looked up to by a large party in England as one of the main "pillars of the Church," though it was ill-naturedly observed that he should rather be called one of the buttresses, as he seldom entered its doors. But the principle has never been embodied on so gigantic a scale, or carried out with such unflinching consistency, as in what German writers call the "Catholic system" of the Papacy. And the system has inevitably shown itself too strong for individual Popes who might themselves be differently minded. When, for instance, "the good Pope Innocent XI.," as Dr. Döllinger justly calls him, endeavoured to restrain the immoral teaching of the Jesuits, they won an easy victory; and, what is more immediately to our purpose, when he resolved to respond through Bishop Spinola to the overtures of the German Protestants, he was obliged to let the Bishop act ostensibly in his own name only, "because the French cardinals in Rome opposed the scheme on the ground that a reunion of Protestant Germany with the Church would prove very awkward for French policy," and France was too important a Power for the Papacy to offend. In other words, it was against the political interests of the Vatican to convert to the true faith heretics whom it solemnly consigned to eternal perdition once every year for rejecting it. In our own day Rome has on similar grounds discountenanced the conversion of Mahometans. Renaudot says truly enough that the principal obstacle to the reunion of the Eastern and Western Churches is the demand of the former that some limits should be placed on Papal autocracy.

The chief instruments of this tortuous, but rigidly consistent, policy for the last three centuries, as we observed just now, have been the Jesuits, who are the real administrators rather than the servants of the Papacy. When the reigning Pope was, so to speak, in opposition, they had no hesitation in resisting him. Innocent XI. requested their General, Gonzalez, to write against the casuistical doctrine of "probabilism" then taught by the Order, whereupon they held an extraordinary Chapter for the purpose of deposing him. They further displayed their hostility to Innocent by supporting Gallican principles in France, and Jesuits actually had a hand in drawing up the Declaration of Gallican Liberties. In their foreign missions, and notably in China, they have owed much of their apparent success to very strange compromises with native superstition, for which the sanction of the Holy See has been either extorted or dispensed with. But, as a rule, the black Pope and the white Pope, as they are called in Rome, have pulled harmoniously together. And the maintenance and extension of Roman prerogative has been the supreme aim of their labours. It was for asserting the deposing power, and not for their religious belief, that Campian and his fellow-sufferers died at Tyburn. In these days the principle is no longer openly enforced, but it is quietly acted on by seeking to undermine Governments considered hostile to Papal interests. Infallibility is one of the weapons forged for carrying on this warfare, for it simplifies and strengthens the action of a centralized bureaucracy, and infallibility is the work of the Jesuits. In a pamphlet published last November on the Infallibility and the Modern State, Dr. Reinkens observes, and subsequent experience has strikingly confirmed his statement, that "in Germany, and especially in Prussia, the spirit of the infallibilist Roman Church is simply the spirit of Jesuitism, which is destroying the German Empire from within," and he shows that the poison has been secretly fermenting for the last half-century, and was noticed as long ago as that by Niebuhr, though recent events have served to precipitate the crisis. The school, the pulpit, and the confessional have all alike at various times been pressed into the service; but the Jesuits have always relied chiefly on their educational machinery, and the training of the people has become more important to them since they have lost the ear of kings. That they should ever obtain more than partial and precarious successes in their interminable struggle with the culture and social life of the modern world is not to be anticipated. But it is well to remember how considerable even yet are their resources, and how inflexible is their resolution in directing them to a single end. The perfection of piety consists, according to their code, in the absolute and entire surrender of the intellect and the will to superior authority. As the Jesuit obeys his General, so every Christian should obey the Pope, blindly and with an abject sacrifice of his own judgment. Every restriction on that supreme Authority is an abomination, every national law or constitution which asserts itself against the sole rightful Sovereign is a sacrilege and a treason. As Cardinal Pallavicini formulated the idea, the collective Church is a body inanimate without the Pope, but infused by him with a living soul; to him therefore belongs dominion over the whole Christian world as its head and master, whose authority is the sole foundation and uniting bond of all government, for he alone represents on earth de jure divino the sovereignty of God. And Gregory XIV. expressly recognized, in a Bull issued in 1591, the pre-eminent fitness of the Jesuit Order for ministering to the dominion of Rome, because, from its despotic military organization, it can the more easily be applied by the Pope to what purpose he will. Not one iota has been abandoned of the claims then made, nor are the disciples of Loyola one whit less ready to enforce them. The sudden collapse of the two great Catholic Powers is not so much a menace as a challenge to renewed energy in reconquering by force or fraud, or by a judicious combination of both, what the public opinion of a degenerate age is no longer willing to concede.

THE TWISS LIBEL CASE.

THE libel case which has for nearly a fortnight occupied the attention of one of the magistrates at Southwark Police Court is, from every point of view, so extremely unpleasant an affair that we are desirous of saying as little about it as possible. Of the case itself we shall only say that a solicitor named Chaffers was prosecuted by Sir Travers and Lady Twiss for having libelled them in a Statutory Declaration, asserting that Lady Twiss had formerly had a disreputable life under the name of Marie Gelas, and had been the mistress of Sir Travers before he married her; that the evidence, as far as it went, appeared to supply a decisive refutation of these charges; but that, before it was completed, the counsel for the prosecution intimated to the magistrate that Lady Twiss had determined not to appear again in Court, and had in fact left London, and that his instructions to proceed with the case had been withdrawn. It is deplorable that a high judicial officer should be subjected to grave imputations, affecting his personal character as well as his domestic relations, which he is apparently powerless to meet. The libel was directed against Sir Travers as well as against his wife, and, if he had thought fit, he might have continued the prosecution on his own account. He did not choose to do so, and the magistrate had no alternative but to discharge the prisoner, who was brought up next day on another accusation of attempting to extort money by imputing a bigamous marriage to a "gentleman of position." This charge collapsed as strangely as the first had done, and proved at any rate, as Mr. Benson remarked, that Chaffers is an adept in the terrible art of libelling with safety. How many more reputations he may have in his grasp it is impossible to say. He appears to have been able to exercise a cruel and malignant terrorism over at least two families; and, ignominious as his victories have been, there is perhaps some reason to fear that they may be an encouragement to unscrupulous men to imitate his example. It was not necessary to prove that his allegations were untrue in order to sustain the charge of malicious libelling, but it is not unnatural that persons who are thus attacked should shrink from appearing in Court unless they feel confident that they can successfully vindicate their characters. The reasons which shook the confidence of Sir Travers and Lady Twiss in their case, while to outward appearance it was proceeding in their favour, may possibly be known hereafter; but for the present it is enough to say that they undertook a prosecution which they had not the courage to maintain. It is impossible to come to any positive conclusion as to the truth or falsehood of the allegations against them. This is a state of things which will, we fear, be highly distasteful to a certain section of the public. There are people, we may be sure, who will go about asking what they are to believe, and who will be miserable until they have adopted a distinct and definite theory on one side or the other. There is no help for them, however; as long as the question remains in the position in which the complainants have left it, the public must submit, with as much patience as it can command, to this painful and embarrassing perplexity. It may be their misfortune, and not their fault, that they cannot at the present moment clear themselves from the scandalous imputations which have been cast upon them; but, until they have done so, society, without going into particulars, has of course a right to protect itself in its own way. In the observations which the magistrate addressed to Chaffers everybody will concur; whatever view may be taken of the truth of his story, he must remain an object of abhorrence and contempt to honourable men.

It is probable that until this case commenced few persons were aware of the terrible instrument which is at the disposal of any scoundrel who may choose to avail himself of it for the purposes of calumny or malicious libel. It appears that it is possible for anybody to step into a police-court and to make a solemn Statutory Declaration, conveying the most wanton and scandalous imputations on other persons, and to get it attested by the signature of a magistrate, without any attempt being made to ascertain the truth of the charges, or any notice being sent to the persons attacked, in order to afford them an opportunity of defending themselves. The signature attached to the document, and the solemn form in which it is drawn up, invest it with a quasi-judicial appearance which may delude ignorant people, and such a document may be in circulation for some time before it becomes known to those whose character and peace of mind are thus assailed. And even when the victim learns the blow which has been aimed at him, he can ward it off only by a painful and perhaps costly prosecution, one effect of which will be—thanks to the disinterested zeal of the newspapers—to publish more widely the calumnies which have been brought against him. There seems to be some doubt as to the exact meaning of the law with regard to Statutory Declarations, and the circumstances under which they ought to be received. Some of the magistrates appear to be under the impression that they are bound to attest any declarations which are brought to them in a proper form; and it is doubtful whether they even take the trouble of reading them. Of course the person making a declaration does so at his own risk, and he may be indicted for libel, or, if the declaration relates to any judicial procedure, and is proved to be false, for perjury. It is obvious, however, that the liberty of making declarations is liable to great abuse; and although it may be possible to have an offender punished, it would be better that he should in the first instance be prevented from committing the offence. It is difficult to conceive a reason why any one should be allowed to charge another person, in this solemn manner, with immoral conduct not amounting to legal crime, unless it is in some way or other connected with a pending suit. There is an old maxim that the greater the truth the greater the libel; and Mr. Benson thought it necessary to warn the "vulgar and uneducated mind" not to assume from the issue of the late inquiry that a libel may be circulated with impunity if it happens to be true. It is not desirable that encouragement should be given to the raking up of old scandals affecting private character, and even people who may have committed disreputable actions are entitled to protection from wanton and malicious persecution. Mr. Stapleton, we are glad to see, has given notice in the House of Commons of a motion for a Select Committee to inquire into the use and abuse of Statutory Declarations, and we trust that the result of the inquiry will be to place the law on a proper footing, and to prevent the repetition of such a case as that which has just been brought to so startling and painful a conclusion.

Whether or not a magistrate is bound to receive a declaration when presented for his signature, it is certain at least that the newspapers are under no obligation to report a case of this kind at full length. Now that the trial has terminated, the Times, which has every day published a long report of the proceedings, down even to the most minute and disgusting details, forbears in its leading article "to relate it in any greater length than is necessary to make its conclusions intelligible." It is stated that there are "more grounds than one" for this sensitive and high-minded reticence; and we can only hope that one of these reasons is a tardy sense of professional decorum. It would be unfair not to admit the good taste and propriety which are usually displayed in the reports of the Times; and we should be glad to think that this was only a casual error. A few short paragraphs would have been quite enough to indicate the nature of the charges in Chaffers's declaration, and the course of the case. It is impossible to doubt that the very full reports which have been published, by giving currency and an apparent importance to libellous imputations, must have rendered the sufferings of the persons who were vilified more painful and acute. As the Times observes, "Be Lady Twiss an angel of light, and the contrary has not been proved, she must have undergone unspeakable anguish from the moment that she became conscious of the defendant's malicious designs." It is evident that her anguish must have been greatly increased when she found that the newspapers were practically abetting her assailant by giving the almost publicity to his cruel aspersions. A general charge of immorality was laid enough, but when the defendant went into particulars which seemed to give an appearance of reality to his story, and when all his questions were published in the papers, it must have been a severe trial to the moral courage of the person attacked, even if innocent. We have refrained from indulging in any theory or conjecture as to this case; we express no opinion on any of the questions which were involved in the prosecution; but, speaking generally, we have a right to point out that when a man gets hold of an ugly secret or a trumped-up accusation, and desires to use it for his own purposes, it is the dread of publicity upon which he naturally works; and it is at first a temptation, and afterwards perhaps a consolation, to him to think that, even if he is prosecuted and convicted, the character of his victim will in all probability never be completely cleared. "Throw enough mud, and some of it will stick," is an old saying. There are always people who will persist in thinking that a serious charge would never have been made if there had not been some kind of foundation for it, and that the smoke betrays a hidden fire. Moreover the libeller will have had it in his power during the progress of the case to inflict the most terrible agony which perhaps it is possible for one human being to inflict upon another. Under such circumstances it is obvious that the newspapers are only playing into the hands of a man of this stamp if they advertise his libels in a prominent manner. For one case of the kind which gets the length of a public exposure, there may be, for anything we know, many that are compromised in fear of the publicity which is threatened, and which publicity the journals have, by their recent conduct, intimated that they are always happy to supply. Apart altogether from the injury which may be done by full reports of such matters, there are certain ordinary rules of decency which might have led the newspapers to abstain from going into all the unsavoury details of a shameful libel. It is not necessary to advertise the trifling and social peculiarities of prostitution, especially in periodicals which are intended for domestic circulation. The whole subject was nasty as well as painful, and on the score of its nastiness alone the newspapers would have done well to handle it as lightly as possible. No doubt there are people who take a pleasure in floating over gratuitous details and obscene suggestions, just as there are people whose diseased appetite prompts them to eat dirt or to do other filthy things. But this does not justify the press in pandering to uncleanness. The magistrate at Bow Street observed that he did not remember in the history of any criminal court anything so demoralising as the result of this trial was likely to be; and though this is certainly saying a good deal, there is unfortunately too much truth in it.

AN ORIENTAL ROGER

WHEN the Attorney-General referred to the pages of Gibbon or exhumed the forgotten records of French Courts of Justice for instances of audacious and unsuccessful imposture, he might have quoted a case which concerned ample estates, a fine social position, and an hereditary title, and which happened, in the memory of men still living, in our Indian dependency. The trial to which we allude sheds so strong a light on the social customs and observances of Hindoos, and on the judicial and executive administration of India before it was transformed by the touch of recent statesmen and legislators, that it could scarcely fail to attract interest even had the English world never been satiated with the adventures of Orton or Castro. Viewed by the light of recent disclosures, the case of the claimant to the Bardwan Raj seems doubly calculated to amuse and instruct.

Not quite seventy miles from Calcutta, amidst rice fields and villages half hidden by palm groves, lies the pleasant and popular station of Bardwan. Formerly traversed by the Grand Trunk road to Benares, it has of late years become a first-class station of the East Indian Railway, and it has now a branch which passes through the Raneeungee coal-fields and rejoins the old and main line at a spot about midway between Patna and Bhagulpore. Bardwan is not only the residence of the Commissioner of the division but the home of the Maharaja of that ilk. This gentleman is perhaps the richest landholder under the Government of Bengal. He pays annually into the Indian Treasury more than 300,000*l.* His rent-roll, after this deduction, has been estimated by competent judges at 200,000*l.* a year. His estates not only cover nearly the whole area of the Bardwan district itself, but extend into four other adjacent districts; and under a peculiar tenure, which we need not stop to explain, but which some fifty years ago was made the subject of special legislation, his rents are collected over this vast extent of territory with punctuality, cheapness, and ease. Many a hard-worked Calcutta official has been as glad of a trip to Bardwan as a Londoner of a visit to Hastings; and all Englishmen resident in the plains of the Lower Ganges have seen or heard of the splendid mansion of the Maharaja, his huge reservoirs equalling small lakes in size, his fish-ponds and summer-houses, his shrubberies laid out with some approach to elegance, and his Zoological Gardens in miniature, where the natives of Bengal may gaze with wonder on what to them are the strange forms of the lion and the giraffe. The Hindoo gentleman who at present owns this magnificent property is liberal in tone and feeling, and has given various proofs of his loyalty and goodwill to the State.

The origin of the case to which we invite attention was as follows:—In the year 1820 Tej Chunder was Raja of Bardwan. At that time his son Pratab Chunder, known as the young Raja, fell ill, and, in the presence of numerous relatives and dependants, was carried in a dying state to the banks of the Ganges, near Culna, a place some eight-and-twenty miles from his ancestral residence. There, in the sight of the holy river so dear to orthodox Hindoos, he departed this life; and, with all the solemn rites and customs suited to the occasion, his lifeless body was committed to the flames and reduced to ashes. We gather from the proceedings that the young Raja was unmarried, or at any rate it is tolerably certain that no widow performed the rite of suttee on the corpse of her lord, though about that period the number of women who in Bardwan annually submitted to this ancient and horrid tradition amounted to nearly a hundred. After the cremation the few remnants spared or calcined by the fire were collected and deposited in one of the halls of the palace at Bardwan, and a monument was erected over the spot. In due time the father followed his son to the river bank and to the funeral pile; and the property, which then vested in a minor and an adopted son, was managed by a native gentleman known throughout the case as Pran Baboo. Years passed away, and the inhabitants of the district had begun to forget the existence and death of the young Raja, who had never succeeded to his estate, when in the year 1835 a person suddenly made his appearance in the adjoining district of Bancoorah, and, giving out that he was the deceased Pratab Chunder, collected together a considerable number of adherents, and laid claim to the Bardwan estates. Now it so happened that the districts immediately to the west of Bardwan and Bancoorah had lately been the scene of insurrection by a tribe of aborigines known as the Coles, who had caused considerable excitement, and had only been put down by a large military force. The claimant was arrested by the magistrates of Bancoorah, arraigned for riot and tumultuous assemblage, and convicted and sentenced to six months imprisonment; and he was further required to find securities that he would not again disturb the peace of the country. Those who know the dogged pertinacity with which Orientals urge their own pretensions or invade the rights of others will not be surprised to hear that this lenient sentence by no means disposed of the matter. In the spring of 1838 the claimant, who had not been idle since the expiration of his sentence, again appeared in public with a train of some three hundred adherents; and this time he took up his station at Culna, in the Bardwan district, obtained money from various persons on divers pretences, served notices on the tenants requiring them to withhold payment of their rents to the manager or guardian of the minor, instituted a civil suit in the Supreme Court of Calcutta, within which city lay a fractional portion of the vast real estate, and so alarmed the magistrate that the military were called out and prompt measures taken to disperse the assemblage, and to apprehend its leader. Owing to a misapprehension of orders, the Sepoys fired on the multitude while the claimant was going about with a drawn sword near a shrine, and their shots killed one man and wounded three others. This unfortunate occurrence led to the preferment of an unfounded charge of manslaughter against the magistrate of Bardwan, who was tried in the Supreme Court as a British subject, and, as might have been expected, was fully acquitted of the charge. Meanwhile the Government got frightened, and entrusted the case against the claimant to the late Mr. E. A. Samuels, at that time magistrate of Hooghly, and afterwards distinguished in the Indian mutiny for his pacification of the province of Bihar. The pretender was arrested, and committed for trial at the Sessions' Court on the charges of fraud, imposture, and false personation; on that of obtaining money under false pretences, and on that of unlawful assembly, at particular specified dates, with intent to commit a breach of the peace.

The trial caused the greatest excitement in the Lower Provinces. Though held on the criminal side of the Court, it substantially and practically put in issue the right and title to the splendid Bardwan property. The proceedings occupied no less than thirty-one days. A throng of native witnesses, servants of the ancient house, family friends, record-keepers, officials, cultivators, and boatmen, was examined on one side or the other. The list was swelled by civil servants, independent Englishmen, officers of the Indian army, and medical men. One surgeon came to give evidence from the Presidency of Madras, eight hundred miles off. A gentleman afterwards a member of Council in the days of Lord Auckland and Ellenborough, and now still in office at Westminster, gave evidence against the Raja; and an action arising out of proceedings in which an active attorney had been arrested and confined by an over-zealous magistrate, was tried before Sir Edward Ryan, late Chief Justice at Calcutta, and now head of the Civil Service Commission. The case for the prosecution was plain and simple enough. The young Raja had died eighteen years before, like a good Hindoo, almost in the presence of a weeping parent, and in the sight of friends and attendants who might be trusted to believe their own senses. Here was no question of a departure for a distant colony, or of years spent somewhere across the ocean, in the plains of Australia or the Cortilleras; nor was there any doubt as to the heir's disappearance in one vessel on the high seas, and his miraculous rescue by another. The Raja, if he really died, died in one of the most populous districts of Lower Bengal, on the spot which would naturally be chosen for such a purpose, just as Meg Merrilies chose to free her spirit in a particular position in the ruined hamlet of Derncleugh. And what, it will naturally be asked, was the story set up by the claimant to account for his restoration to life and health?

Pras Baboo, whose management of the property we may admit to have been extremely unpopular, had, it was said for the claimant, prejudiced the father against the son, and had even attempted to poison the latter. Estranged from his nearest relative, the young Raja spent years in immorality and vice, and at last, in the act of committing some extremely heinous offence, was struck by sudden remorse, somewhat after the fashion of Dickens's stage hero, who, when about to blow out his brains, heard a clock strike ten, remembered that he had heard that hour strike in the days of his innocence, and became a virtuous and reformed character ever afterwards. Consulting the oracles of his religion, the young Raja was enjoined to absent himself for fourteen years, and to perform pilgrimages incognito; and in this view he feigned a mortal sickness, was conveyed to the river-side, and requesting the bystanders to withdraw, in order that he might offer up his soul to heaven, dived into the stream, was received into a boat, and left in his room a huge chest filled with shells, which the bystanders reduced to ashes under the belief that it contained the corpse of their young master. The sequel of the story was that, accompanied by one devoted adherent, he washed away his stains in the Brahmaputra, visited hallowed shrines as a pilgrim, travelled in Cashmere and the Punjab, and finally returned to claim his own again. The accused made no attempt to prove his version of the actual disappearance, but called numbers of witnesses to prove his identity. The prosecution, which was placed in the hands of a professional lawyer, undertook, on the other hand, to show that the so-styled Raja was one Kistoll, alias Alak Shaha; that he was well known as an inhabitant of the neighbouring station of Kishnagur; that he was a person of considerable abilities, and capable of influencing, and even fascinating, others; and that he had been in the habit of going about the country in the guise of a religious mendicant, and of occasionally representing himself as an incarnation of the Deity. As the case turned mainly on the question of recognition, identity, and similarity or dissimilarity of features, the style of examination and argument may readily be conceived. Indeed, when we read of ancient almsmen exchanged for corpulency and unwieldiness; of marks on the face and the body, attributed by the contending witnesses to wholly different causes; of past events detailed with minutest particularity; of recollections as to furniture, dimensions of houses, and even pictures; of a Major of infantry and a Surgeon of light cavalry who swore confidently that the claimant was the rightful heir; and of such witnesses as the late Dwarkanath Tagore and Mr. M. T. Princep, who were perfectly convinced of the entire want of resemblance, we seem to ourselves not to be poring over the records of a case which not one Englishman in a hundred has ever heard of, but to be present at the great cause célèbre which has tried the patience of a jury and furnished comment and conversation to countless households for the space of nearly a year. All agreed that the real Raja had a scar on his back, which had been caused by the bite of a horse. The pretender had just such a mark; but, said the prosecution, it was the effect of his falling on a piece of kanter as he galloped. One witness thought the Raja had an equine nose, and another that he had a Grecian one. It was urged in the claimant's favour that he laughed like the Raja, and cleared his voice before he spoke; and that he perspired freely in the cold season, when the skin is usually dry. It was contended against him that he had six toes, and that the deceased had only the same number as other people. One man declared that he resembled Wilmamditzen, the celebrated King of Ougoin, contemporary with the Emperor Augustus. Another was of opinion that he was much more like an evil spirit. Then the prisoner had a scar on the ear, the remains of an ulcer in his mouth, a mark on the wrist, and a peculiar speck in one of his eyes, of a mahogany colour, only visible when he raised his eyelid. Again, in the course of the contest, which was very ably fought on both sides, reference was made to the precedents of unsuccessful impostors in other countries; to the French case of Martin Guerre in the sixteenth century, the particulars of which were given some time ago at full length in the Times, and to that of François Noyen in the same country, which occurred some time in 1762.

The result of the case was the conviction of the pseudo-Raja, but not by the Court which tried him, owing to the following legal difficulty. Until the promulgation of Lord Macaulay's Penal Code in 1860, the substantive criminal law regulating trials of persons other than Englishmen in all the Courts of the interior, save and except those established by Royal Charter, was the Mohammedan Code. We found this in force when we took on ourselves the actual duties of civil government, and, with a pardonable wish to make no violent or summary changes, we continued to try and punish criminals under it for some seventy years. It is true that its barbarities were softened and its deficiencies supplied by a series of equitable statutes; but as the basis there remained the law which had been promulgated, at one time or other, from Isfahan to Cordova. Under this system there was associated with the Sessions Judge on all commitments a dignitary termed a Moulavi, or Doctor of Mohammedan Law. His duty was to state whether an offence was punishable under the dicta of Arabic sages, and also to deliver his opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused. If the Moulavi concurred with the Judge, the latter then proceeded to pass his own sentence only, as the deliverance of the Court. If the two differed, the trial was referred for the final orders of the old Sudder Court. The Judge found the accused guilty of false personation and illegal assemblage, but acquitted him of obtaining money under false pretences. The learned Mussulman would have acquitted the claimant on the charge of personation, for a reason which could only have occurred to the Oriental intellect—namely, that as it had not been proved who the defendant really was, it was not proved satisfactorily that he falsely personated the Raja. In other words, if it were not shown that Castro was really Arthur Orton, it could not be judicially decided that he falsely personated the deceased Tichborne.

Kistoll, alias Alak Shaha, after a fruitless attempt to appeal to the Privy Council, underwent his sentence, died subsequently, and is now almost forgotten. The sentence, we should state, was six months' imprisonment and 100*l.* fine. But the proceedings, as we have said, are curious and significant. The trial is an instance of the extreme audacity of a clever impostor, and of the credulity of persons who might otherwise have been thought proof against delusion and glamour. It illustrates also the conservative tendencies of the Indian Government, and the caution with which legislation dealt with ancient institutions and forms. It likewise furnishes a warning against rash zeal. We have referred to an action in which the magistrate who first attempted to arrest the prisoner was fined. The English attorney who conducted the claimant's case ventured into Bardwan, and was there arrested on the absurd charge of sedition, treated with some unnecessary rigour, and imprisoned, quite contrary to law. For this the magistrate was fined the sum of 200*l.* in the Supreme Court. We can best illustrate this part of the Bardwan case by supposing that one member of the firm conducting the case of the Tichborne Claimant had gone down into the country, had there found his Roger going about with a posse of discharged servants, professional vagrants, and pouchers from the estates, and had there and then been lodged in a gaol in Devonshire or Hampshire, on a charge of sedition against Her Majesty's Government, by some excited and indignant Justice of the Peace. The conclusion to be drawn from the proceedings which we have above analysed is obvious enough. From time to time craft and cupidity will be excited by such a tempting prize as a magnificent property, the heir to which died at a distance from home, or disappeared mysteriously by water or land. And the same odd coincidences will occur, and the same style of reasoning be resorted to, whether the trial be conducted in a Roman basilica, before M. le Président, before an Indian magistrate, or before a British jury.

THE COMPLETION OF ST. PAUL'S.

A RENEWED interest in the great scheme for the completion of St. Paul's following upon the Thanksgiving in that Cathedral was so naturally and obviously to be looked for that the chief concern of right-thinking men must have been lest the proceeding should bear the appearance of coining a new cause célèbre. Happily the general reticence, till after the Thanksgiving of those most interested in the subject has fully prevented any such blunder, and we may now regard the completion of the Cathedral of London on its own merits, as well as in connection with the ceremony of which it is likely to become the shining memorial. For us the question is anything but a new one. We took a real interest in it years ago, when Dean Milman first broached the conception, and at the time of that more systematic revival of the project which coincided with Dean Mansel's accession we were foremost in advocating its claims. We may therefore be now excused for not tarrying to prove again how desirable it is that St. Paul's should be completed, and how disgraceful it is that its completion should have been so long delayed. The meeting which took place at the Mansion House on Monday was an eminently practical one, and we cannot do better than follow in the lines of the arguments there brought forward by giving some reasons why persons who are generally inclined to sympathize with the undertaking should accept the cautious and tentative policy adopted by its leaders, in their previous lack of means, as the best guarantee for a thorough, because calm and thoughtful, administration of the more abundant funds which are now pouring in. We believe that the reasonings of those who seek excuses for not helping a work which they will not in terms condemn are founded upon some demand for a "complete plan," which they profess to say ought to be forthcoming.

To those who urge this claim as a condition antecedent to their vouchsafing any help, we would point-out that what they ask for is impossible, except upon a scale and with a minuteness of detail which could not be attempted without a most wasteful consumption of time, money, and thought. The plan, complete or incomplete, of a new building is a simple affair; it is the presentment of something which actually does not exist. The plan for the restoration of some edifice which is at present gutted or ruinous is equally simple. But St. Paul's is not a new building, neither is it gutted or ruinous; while the larger portion of that rearrangement of fittings which its completion involves has been already effected in the restoration, with some necessary modifications, of the stalls and organ. Any "complete plan" must now deal with vertical, and not horizontal, spaces. It must sum up that substitution of marble for stone, of gilding for ingrained dirt, of windows richly glazed and carefully tinted for squalid casements, of mosaics or frescoes for naked panels, which is wanted to make Wren's masterpiece what Wren himself desired that it might become, and to render God's chief house in the largest and richest city of the world worthy of its dignity and its destination. A complete plan of so large and intricate an undertaking can only mean an indefinite number of cartoons, embodying in the fullest detail the iconography and the ornamentation of every panel, every window, and every moulding. But if this is to be done, the artist of each portion of the complicated whole must be at once chosen, and must—at an outlay which we would rather not forecast—be commissioned to stereotype his first conceptions to the restriction of the fuller thoughts of coming years. Otherwise, the complete plan will have to be drawn out, not by the artists to whose ability the permanent works are to be confided, but by some prophet of whose inspirations the selected artists will have subsequently to make themselves the exponents.

The Executive Committee, we are glad to learn, have refused to curry popular favour by the crude production of deceptive general designs based on so inartistic a principle. But they have done that which comes within the scope of legitimate forethought. They have so far matured their decorative scheme as to bring the vague projects of future embellishment into systematic unity, without hampering the free thought of the yet unselected artists. As we have shown, any series of laboured sketches now would either be fallacious or premature. But a connected scheme on paper, for the general iconographic treatment of the whole Cathedral in its future character of a grand pictorial presentment of revealed Christianity, could not be too soon completed, provided that the suggestion was not intended to bind any one, but only to exist on record for future consideration, and, it might be, modification. Such a document might become peculiarly useful as a standing protest against any capricious, haphazard, and fragmentary method of decoration, in which the donor of each patch would rather seem actuated by the wish to spoil his neighbour's contribution than to enhance the whole effect. The only difficulty about procuring such a scheme would be to find the man competent to prepare it; and here we think the Executive Committee, acting in concert with their architect, Mr. Penrose, have been very fortunate. The adviser whom they called in was Mr. Burges, who is well known for the research and enthusiasm with which he has added the study of iconography to that of architecture, and to whose capacity, some years ago, the authorities of Cologne paid the high compliment of soliciting his advice upon the artistic treatment of their now completed cathedral. The response which Mr. Burges made to the request was, as intended, in the shape of a written report, dealing with the Cathedral as a whole, and suggesting a grandiose pictorial treatment of the whole fabric, so as (style and grouping being left to the future artists) to make it an artistic embodiment of the Christian revelation. This report is now the absolute property of the men who are conducting the completion, to use as much or as little as they may think fit. But, having it, they are not steering without a compass, and at the same time they have not put themselves in the false position of having prematurely committed themselves to those details of special treatment which any commission for sketches from a painter would involve.

Of actually completed work the restored stalls, with the organ put right and left at the entrance of the choir and immediately to the east of the dome, are an excellent foretaste. That position of the organ is peculiarly convenient, as it affords the means whereby both the instrument and the capitular stalls can equally be used for the ordinary services mainly held in the choir, and for those extra occasions on which the dome is crowded by vast congregations. The necessary sequel of the reorganised choir, the screen—probably of marble and metal, high enough to furnish the needful break between nave and choir, but light enough not to create any perceptible interruption of sight or sound—is not yet in its place, but we claim it as the next and most important instalment. Afterwards new ground will have to be broken, and we are glad to hear that, with the funds in hand, the Committee proposes in the first instance to concentrate itself upon the east end as the portion of the Cathedral mainly devoted to the purposes for which churches exist, and upon the dome as the grandest and most characteristic architectural feature of the fabric. As to the east end, we need only say that the prospect, visible all down the church, of the apse, with its conch aglow with rich mosaic, will transmute the physiognomy of the whole pile. Exception has been taken to the selection of Munich painted glass for the six windows of the apse, but for this the actual management is not responsible. Whatever may be the merit or the demerit of these windows, St. Paul's was, under a former administration, so far pledged to them, but the present Committee never had any intention of extending the use of Munich glass beyond the apse. For the completion of this part of the church a baldachino of worthy material, ample size, and graceful design, to surmount and enrich the altar, is plainly desirable, and no more worthy special gift could be offered by any one who desired to leave his special mark upon the work. As for the dome, the mosaic pictures—not satisfactory, it must be owned, as far as the two sometime executed paintings go—in the spandrels of the arches must be completed, and then will come the great achievement of replacing by bright mosaics those gloomy and depressing grisailles with which Thornhill, against Wren's protest, covered the interior dome. All these works will take time and money, but in the interval the Ecclesiastical Commissioners' grant will be available for the cleansing and reparation of the nave. We desire to be explicit in the assertion that ultimately the nave must be decorated if the national disgrace arising from the non-completion of St. Paul's is to be wiped out. But at present it may well afford to wait until those parts of the structure which have a higher practical and architectural value are first cared for. Now that the start has been made, we cannot bring ourselves to believe that the enterprise can miscarry. But the Committee must not be elated by a mere financial success, nor fancy that because money comes in easily it may flow out lightly. The task which they have undertaken is one of eminently anxious responsibility, and it demands from them an heroic determination not to be content with any results short of the very best. Byzantine or Gothic treatment is plainly impossible, while the modern art which will be adopted must on the one hand not break away from the naturalism which the Renaissance evoked, nor on the other hand must it condescend to the carnality of which the Renaissance was the pioneer. We cannot well conceive a more delicate and anxious problem than such an accommodation of naturalism and religious feeling, particularly when we remember that, as in all art there are both true merit and plausible counterfeit, so especially in religious art there is an unusual danger of pretty commonplace. The reason is clear. All other art is more or less cultivated from a desire, however mistakenly expressed, for art itself; but religious art (to the personal credit of its promoters) is to no inconsiderable extent promoted for the sake of abstract religion. Consequently the employer thinks of the subject to the exclusion of the treatment of that subject, and is too apt to rest content with vapid sentimentality. There may not be very serious harm in such results in country churches, where the choice would probably lie between art which is merely passable and no art at all. But any introduction of the "goody" element into St. Paul's would be fatal. The educated world claims art in the first place, but in the second place, and even more emphatically, does it demand high art.

THE HOME SECRETARY IN THE ELEVENTH CENTURY.

ONE of the ancient cities of England is seemingly, as indeed is only fair, about to be relieved at the expense of another. For some time past we have, by one odd chance or another, had our thoughts drawn very much to the north-western corner of England, to the famous City of the Legions. There seemed to be a kind of conspiracy to say strange things about Chester and Cheshire, their churches, their inhabitants, and their language. The venue is now changed, and that by no less a person than a Cabinet Minister, from the north-west to the south-west. The richest thing that we have seen for some time past is a saying, which may perhaps prove to be only the beginning of a series of such sayings, not about Chester, but this time about Exeter. If we were disposed to be hypercritical, we might, before we get to the south-west, look in for a moment at the south-east, and ask what were the exact feelings of the church and city of Canterbury at the time of the late national thanksgiving. If the clergy and people of the Kentish metropolis are at all given to antiquarian precision of speech, they might fairly have expected that the rite was going to be performed among themselves. The Queen's Speech announced that the thanksgiving would take place in "the metropolitan cathedral." We know very well that in modern slang this form of words means St. Paul's in London; but, according to all accuracy of language, it means, when uttered in the precincts of Canterbury, Christ Church at Canterbury, and nothing else. That church, the seat of the Primate of All England and Metropolitan, is "the metropolitan cathedral," and some other south of Humber.

The Bishop of London is Dean of the Province, but he is not its Archbishop; we cannot at this time of day fall back on the speculations of Gilbert Foliot and claim metropolitan honours for the see of London on the ground of its having been the seat either of a Welsh Archbishop, or, in earlier days still, of an Archdeacon of Jupiter. No doubt "metropolitan cathedral" had a grander roll than such a simple phrase as "St. Paul's," but those who put words into the mouth of their Sovereign should stop to think what those words really mean.

But this is by the way; we have simply turned aside to look in at Canterbury; our real course leads us to Exeter. With regard to that famous city Mr. Bruce has, in a late speech in Parliament, announced a discovery which is quite equal to that of the Gaelic colony at Chester. In fact the two discoveries are closely akin. It is the irrepressible Celt who comes unexpectedly to light in both cases. Mr. Bruce's discovery, which relates to a time long past, is not at first hearing quite so startling as the notion of a Gaelic-speaking population abiding at Chester in our day; but when it is carefully weighed, it is quite as wonderful in its own way. Last Saturday the Celts had a night of it, at least part of a night, all to themselves. The groans of the Britons went up against Mr. Homersham Cox and his County Court Judgeship, and, to do the Britons justice, they do not seem to have groaned for nothing. It certainly must be better, ceteris paribus, to have in a Welsh County Court a Judge who can speak Welsh than one who cannot. And it is pleasing to hear from Mr. Osborne Morgan that Welsh solicitors are men of high honour, and still more pleasing to be assured by Mr. Richard that "there is no body of persons to be found more loyal to the Crown and more faithful to the existing Constitution than Welshmen." But the Britons, and the Celts generally—for we suppose that Mr. Mac-Arthur belongs to another branch of the race, or possibly to a discreet intermingling of the two—had at any rate the discretion to keep themselves within our own times. Not so the Home Secretary. Himself once a Welsh member, as his own career in that character is matter of past history, he seems to look upon Welsh affairs in general as a matter of past history also. The appointment of Mr. Cox at once carries Mr. Bruce back to the reign of Henry the Eighth, and he tries to conceive what the effect must have been on the minds of the Welsh when they first had justice administered among them in the English tongue. We might stop for a moment to ask whether the Act of Henry the Eighth made any difference to those parts of Wales which had already been made into shires in the time of Edward the First; but, however this may be, the first appearance of an English Judge to administer English justice among a people who knew no English must, whenever it happened, have been somewhat startling. In Mr. Bruce's words:—

The English system of law was first applied to Wales in the reign of Henry VIII., and the effect produced upon the minds of a people speaking Welsh exclusively by justice being administered by English-speaking Judges and barristers must have been extraordinary. In process of time the worst features of the case had undoubtedly been ameliorated, but even at the present moment anomalies still existed which were startling.

Presently, in the middle of remarks more directly bearing on the case of the County Courts, we hear a little about the appointment of Welsh clergy and Welsh bishops, and after a while we suddenly get back to past times again. We make our way gradually back. Mr. Bruce "believed that at no time since the conquest of Wales by Edward the First had there been more Welsh-speaking people than at present." It is hard to find statistics on such a point, but there can be little doubt that what Mr. Bruce says is quite true. There has been a territorial advance of the English language since the time of Edward the First, but it has been so small that it must have been more than counterbalanced by the natural increase of the Welsh-speaking population in the course of six hundred years. Mr. Bruce then takes a leap across the Bristol Channel to trace out the fate of another kindred dialect. And here comes the saying which we have treasured up as the great marvel of all:—

It was hardly one hundred years since the Cornish tongue had died out, and in the time of William Rufus the population of Exeter was so equally balanced that service in the Cathedral was directed to be performed alternately in Welsh and English.

Now we must here stop to give Mr. Bruce in the most special manner that—not benefit of clergy, but—benefit of reporters, which it is only just to give on such occasions. Possibly Mr. Bruce never said what is here printed in his name; perhaps it is all a confusion of the reporter, or even of the printer. But somebody has said it; there it is in black and white, and it has Mr. Bruce's name at the head of it. We shall therefore, having no other name to put instead, go on speaking of it as a saying of Mr. Bruce's, only adding an explanatory clause to set forth that, by the words "Mr. Bruce," we mean whoever may turn out to be the real author of the sentence, be he Home Secretary, reporter, or printer's devil. Now this statement, rightly understood and looked at all round, distinctly beats the saying about the Welshmen of Chester being preached to in their native Gaelic. To confound two Celtic tongues in this way, though a very respectable blunder as things go, is certainly not to be set on a level with the notion of the manner of worship in the eleventh century which is implied in Mr. Bruce's Exeter legend. There is something so specially charming in the notion of William Rufus, or anybody in the days of William Rufus, taking such special care to have divine service in a tongue understood of the people. There is something so thoughtful on the part of those who ordained it, so accommodating, and even self-sacrificing, on the part of those who submitted to it, in the perfect equality thus established between the two rival tongues. To be sure the system of alternate services would have this disadvantage, that on each alternate day the Englishman or the Briton would have to choose between not going to church at all and going to a service which he did not understand. But then he might have comforted himself with the thought of his high privilege as a man of Exeter in getting even alternately a service which he did understand, in days when all Western Christendom out of Exeter, Englishmen, Britons, and everything else, had no chance of anything better than mass and vespers in unintelligible Latin. The difficulty about the alternate services might have been got over either by giving one of the nations a separate church, or by dividing the cathedral, as was done in a later age, into Upper Peter's and Lower Peter's. But to have let one nation keep the cathedral, while the other had to put up with St. Oswald's or some other inferior building, would have been a breach of the perfect equality between the two. And to cut the church in half, as the Puritans did, might have been thought likely to spoil the proportions of the building. The alternate system therefore clearly had something to be said for it. But, as described by Mr. Bruce, it had an obvious weak side. Even foreigners and conquerors have souls; and it seems hard that, while so much care was taken for both the English and the Welsh population of Exeter, no heed at all was paid to the spiritual wants of that class of the inhabitants who spoke French. Mr. Bruce's whole context shows that the word Welsh is not meant in a sense which would take them in, but that it is used in its common meaning of British. Yet in the days of William Rufus there must have been many French-speaking people in any great English city. The garrison of Rougemont had indeed their own castle chapel; but there must have been French-speaking merchants and others—French-speaking municipal dignitaries are not unlikely—who might, at the time when their tongue was so much up in the world, have not unfairly asked for a share in the cathedral alongside of their neighbours of the two conquered races. It may be that their exclusion was owing to the personal character of the reigning Bishop. Osbern, Bishop of Exeter in the days of William Rufus, was a man who stood almost by himself. He was a Norman by birth, a brother of the famous William Fitz-Osbern, Earl of Hereford. But while other Normans in England remained Norman, while many Englishmen were doing their best to turn themselves into Normans, Bishop Osbern, by the opposite process, turned himself into an Englishman. He put on the manners and feelings, and no doubt the language also, of his adopted country. Such a man might be even more likely than a native Englishman to shut out any French element from intruding within his church. And the special care for the Britons might have been handed on from the days of his predecessor Bishop Leofric, who, though English by name and German by education, is said to have been a Briton by birth.

From one point of view then, a purely local and temporary point of view, there is a certain degree of likelihood about Mr. Bruce's description of the ecclesiastical state of Exeter in the days of William Rufus. The state of things which Mr. Bruce describes really fits in very well with the personal position of two successive Bishops of Exeter at the time of which he speaks. But the arguments on the other side are overwhelming. We suspect that Mr. Bruce's description is a case of knowing too much—knowing too much within a narrow range as to time and space, and not taking a wider view of things in general. Such partial knowledge, the little learning of the poet, is proverbially dangerous. It would have been better for Mr. Montague Guest if he had not known the true original meaning of the word wife. So it would have been better for Mr. Bruce—for Mr. Bruce, we mean, in the Parliamentary sense which we have already defined—if he had been less familiar with the personal characters of Bishops Leofric and Osbern. From such a narrow range of study he has wrought out an a priori picture of what Exeter was likely to be in their days, without stopping to think whether the general condition of England and the world was such that things could be as he painted them in one particular city. We leave out of sight the small difficulty that no contemporary authority, indeed no authority at all, as far as we know, gives any account, the least like that which has been given us by the Home Secretary. We will meet a priori argument by a priori argument. Is it really possible that Mr. Bruce or his reporter—we might almost say that the printer—can have forgotten that in the days of William Rufus, and for a long time before and after, Divine Service was celebrated throughout the whole West in the Latin tongue? At a very early page of all our Prayer-books we find the complaint that "The Service in this Church of England these many years hath been read in Latin to the people, which they understand not; so that they have heard with their ears only, and their heart, spirit, and mind have not been edified thereby." One would need the very strongest evidence to prove that the Church of Exeter stood alone by itself in following a different and more reasonable usage, and that either an English or a Welsh version of mass or vespers was in use there or elsewhere. The notion, in short, is simply grotesque; it is a sign of the careless way in which even public men on public occasions allow themselves to speak. Nay more, it is one of the most amusing cases of a confusion which we have come across for some while. Mr. Bruce had evidently lighted somewhere on the statement that Exeter was once jointly inhabited by an English and a Welsh population. And so it once was, but it was a long time before the days of William Rufus. The one writer who tells us anything about it is William of Malmesbury, who speaks of the equal occupation of the city up to the time of Æthelstan, but adds that Æthelstan drove the Welsh out, and made Exeter purely English. And we are sorry to add that this our one authority speaks of the Welsh part of the inhabitants in words which we are afraid to quote, for fear Mr. Morgan or Mr. Richard should chance to read what we are writing. As there is really no other source whence Mr. Bruce could have got any notion at all of a joint English and Welsh occupation of Exeter, we are driven to suppose, strange as it is, that he has somehow confounded the days of Æthelstan with the days of William Rufus, and has somehow forgotten that the only mention of the Welsh inhabitants is the mention of their being driven out. Whence the notion about the alternate Welsh and English services came into any man's head we have really no guess to offer, beyond the somewhat far-fetched one which we have already risked.

Why do our public men talk this kind of stuff, which might so easily be avoided, either by getting up the subjects about which they talk or by not talking about them at all? Mr. Bruce's speech is sensible enough as regards the appointment of Mr. Hlomersham Cox. But what light can be thrown on the appointment of a County Court Judge in Montgomeryshire in the reign of Victoria by questions about the language used in divine service at Exeter in the reign of William Rufus?

PROTECTION OF PACIFIC ISLANDERS.

THERE can be few more painful pictures than that which has been lately exhibited of the South Sea Islands, where some Englishmen labour to deliver the souls, and others to enslave the bodies, of the natives of Polynesia. It is strange that this country should send both the missionary and the kidnapper to the antipodes and should furnish simultaneously examples of exalted piety and of brutality and avarice. The murder of Bishop Patteson was provoked by outrages inflicted by Englishmen on the South Sea Islanders, and we cannot help feeling that that savage race has suffered at least as much as it has profited by its contact with civilization. A writer in a New Zealand newspaper, after describing the circumstances of the Bishop's death, remarks, "So much for your kidnapping vessels and your civilized white men. A vessel was here and took away some natives, and otherwise abused them. We being the next vessel, and the Bishop being the next white man that came this way, the natives were sure to be avenged. There is not an island we were at this cruise but we heard of vessels being there and taking away natives." The existing law has proved inadequate to restrain kidnapping, and we learn that a captain of the Royal Navy, having assisted the Consul at Fiji in arresting a vessel engaged in what is in truth a slave trade, found on bringing her to Sydney that she must be discharged, and that he was perhaps liable in damages for detaining her. The Attorney-General of New South Wales advised the Government that it was "very evident" that the captain of this vessel was engaged in the forcible abduction of natives from their homes with a view to their being taken to and left on other islands and places against their will; but it was not proved that this was done in order that these natives might be dealt with as slaves, and therefore the existing law did not apply. The Attorney-General further suggested that it might be advisable for the naval officer who had detained the ship to institute proceedings at his own expense in the Vice-Admiralty Court, in order to procure a certificate that there were reasonable grounds for the seizure. If this course were not taken, the officer might have an action brought against him by the owner of the vessel, "notwithstanding the meritorious endeavour made by him to suppress such disgraceful practices as the captain appears to have been guilty of."

Unquestionable testimony to the existence of the practice of kidnapping is furnished by Bishop Patteson himself in a memorandum concerning the means frequently adopted in the islands of the South-West Pacific to procure labourers for the Queensland and Fiji plantations. Whatever measures, he says, may be adopted to secure humane and just treatment of these islanders while in Queensland or Fiji, there is no check whatever upon the proceedings of the men engaged in procuring supplies for the labour-markets of these plantations. No regulations can prevent men, who are bound by no religious or moral restraint, from practising deception and violence to entice or convey natives on board their vessels, or from detaining them forcibly when on board. Much was said about engagements and contracts being made with these islanders. But the Bishop did not believe that it was possible for any of the traders to make a bona fide contract with any natives of the Northern New Hebrides and Banks and Solomon Islands. He doubted if any one of these traders could speak half-a-dozen words in any of the dialects of those islands, and he was sure that the idea of a contract could not be made intelligible to a native without a full power of communication with him. The Bishop seems to have been aware that while he was labouring in the Lord's vineyard, the Devil's kitchen was in his immediate neighbourhood. Something had been said about the benefit to the islanders by bringing them into contact with civilization. What kind of civilization they might see on the plantations he did not know, neither had he seen many natives who had returned to their homes. But he could not remember any instance of any one of these natives exhibiting any proof of his having received any benefit from his "contact with civilization," much less of his conferring any benefit upon his people. The Bishop appropriately refers to the African slave trade, which might have been described as a process for bringing negroes into contact with civilization. That trade was nevertheless put down as a thing evil in itself, a disgrace to humanity, and a practical repudiation of Christianity. It is remarkable that the Bishop protested, as if in anticipation of his own fate, against any punishment being inflicted upon natives of these islands who might cut off vessels or kill boats' crews, until it should be clearly shown that these acts were not done in the way of retribution for outrages first committed by white men.

The lamented Bishop has forcibly answered the argument derived from the supposed benefit to these islanders of "contact with civilization." It may be usefully remembered that this argument was employed, much to his own satisfaction, by the pious princes of Portugal who first established the modern slave trade with Africa, and it would have been entirely conclusive with these Englishmen who under Queen Elizabeth engaged in the same business, if indeed they had ever had any misgivings, which they probably had not, as to the moral and religious character of the enterprise in which they were engaged. They enriched themselves at the same time that they extended the influence of Christianity, and thus by a fortunate arrangement they were able at once to serve God and mammon. If we look at the other side—for of course there is another side—to this question of deportation of South-Sea Islanders, we shall understand how the African slave trade was regarded by Englishmen who were engaged in it. Negro labour was wanted in the West Indies, and negroes were much better fed and treated on a plantation than they would have been in Africa. As regards suffering on the voyage, that was greatly mitigated by the desire of the captain of the slave to deliver his cargo of human cattle in good condition; and as to the severity of punishment for idleness or insubordination, of which the Abolitionists made so much, if you once assume the necessity of a system it is surprising how soon you learn to acquiesce in whatever appears requisite for maintaining it. The officers of our army and navy in the great war were humane gentlemen, yet they administered a discipline which now appears to us barbarous. Of course, in the slave trade, as in these deportations, whatever could not be proved was denied. We find in the recent Blue Book a statement of a girl who was deported which looks very like truth. There was only one person on board the vessel who could speak her language, and he told her that if when she got to Fiji she said that she had been stolen, she would be flogged. An Englishman or American who engages in such a business soon hardens himself to its supposed necessities; and when we read of the conduct of Spaniards who compelled the American Indians to work in gold or silver mines, we may moderate our indignation by remembering that deportation has been declared indispensable to the prosperity of cotton and sugar growing in Queensland and Fiji. A speaker in the Legislative Council of New Zealand expressed his belief that no compulsion had been used in the introduction of islanders into Queensland, and he laid particular stress upon the fact that an English nobleman was governor of that colony. We are quite sure that Lord Normanby is thoroughly earnest in all his expressions of anxiety for the protection of these islanders; but it is manifest that the mischief, if there be any, is done to them before they reach Queensland. The supposition that these islanders enter freely and intelligently into contracts for their own deportation is rather weakened by the statement that the agent holds up three fingers to a native who signs, or is believed to sign, assent, and this is understood to mean an engagement for three years' work in a plantation. If the native alleged that he meant to stipulate for three meals a day, his interpretation would be as plausible as that of the agent. The difficulty of ascertaining what agreements have been made, and how they have been performed, will be diminished as knowledge of the languages of the islanders increases among Englishmen. In this respect, as in many others, the loss of Bishop Patteson will be long and deeply felt. We must remark, however, that the testimony even of the most pious and devoted missionary ought to be accepted with some caution in proof of a charge of kidnapping against an emigration agent, and it would be satisfactory to place a control over these deportations in the hands of some officer of Government whose means of knowledge should be ample and his impartiality unquestionable. In imposing penalties the accused would have the benefit of any doubt; but unless a free contract were clearly proved, it would be both policy and justice to give immigrants an opportunity of returning home.

Complication is introduced into this subject by the fact that Fiji has sometimes a Government and sometimes not. The Government, when there happens to be one, must of course be addressed by other Governments in usual form, and thus the Foreign Office, as well as the Colonial Office, emits and receives despatches which are necessarily published in the blue-books. We are happy to learn from a despatch of the Prime Minister of Fiji to Lord Granville of the 8th of June last, that "the assumption of responsible government in Fiji affords its Ministers an opportunity of seconding the efforts made by the British Government to place the introduction of Polynesian labourers under salutary regulations." Mr. Sydney Charles Bush, Premier of Fiji, had much pleasure in communicating to Lord Granville, and doubtless Lord Granville had equal pleasure in being informed of the intention of His Majesty King Calakau's Executive to deal with this question without delay, and to frame proper regulations for the management of Polynesian labourers within the King's dominions. The Government of King Calakau, and the English and American planters who work that convenient machine, have not discovered the importance of this subject at all too soon, because the civilized world could tolerate the failure of cotton-planting and responsible government in Fiji rather than the continuance of the atrocities by which labourers for these plantations have been hitherto procured among the other islands of the South Pacific Ocean. It would not suffice merely to suppress the business of deportation under the British flag, because it appears that vessels carrying the flags of France, Germany, and the United States have been implicated in similar proceedings. But it is the duty of this country to set an example by punishing its own subjects, and a Bill has been accordingly brought into the House of Commons for the protection of the islanders. There is another practice, called in the blue-book "skull-hunting," which is even more atrocious than that of kidnapping labourers, because it is difficult to understand how the most hardened avarice can deceive a ship's owner or captain as to the character of the act of conveying natives of one island to another in order that they may obtain skulls of its inhabitants as trophies of their cunning and audacity. We are not surprised to find that the sentiments of owners and captains of small trading vessels are represented by some of the Australian newspapers, who denounce missionaries as humbugs who pay when they can for native labour in "spiritual coin," and object to traders who offer hardware and calico for a day's work. The opposition between planters and traders on the one hand, and clergy on the other, dates from the time when a pious Bishop appealed to the Crown of Spain on behalf of the oppressed races of America. A protector of the natives is as necessary now as it was three centuries ago, and the question is still open to debate whether on the whole barbaric races have gained or lost by contact with civilization. The missionaries allege that every man or woman in the islands is married at an early age, and therefore deportation, even if really voluntary, involves rupture of the marriage bond. This, however, is perhaps an application of European ideas almost as premature as that which is involved in the supposition that all deportations are or can be based upon free contract. The planters of Queensland and Fiji may probably find their operations impeded by the legislation which is now proposed, but they may usefully remember that a prosperity created by means similar to those used formerly in the West Indies would almost certainly be followed by similar decay.

FIRE.

THERE are, as Mr. Henley lately remarked in the House of Commons, two sides to every question, and therefore we ought not to be surprised to find that something has been said in favour of the Match-tax which Mr. Lowe proposed, and which we had believed to be universally condemned. Mr. McLagan, in discoursing upon the origin of fires, attributes blame to people who use matches, and also to people who smoke cigars and pipes. Mr. Lowe's colleagues will certainly not be tempted by this unexpected laudation of the Match-tax to allow him to revive it, but he might perhaps obtain their consent to his making another equally bold financial experiment by proposing a tax upon smokers. This class, which Mr. McLagan describes as most indifferent to the comfort of others and to the consequences of their own bad habit, deserve, in the opinion of the speaker and of others like him, to be persecuted to the verge of extirpation. A proposal for taxing smokers would certainly be supported by a party which, although numerically small, is formidable for its resolute fanaticism, whereas the Match-tax was supported only by Mr. Lowe himself. The class of smokers in railway-carriages and other public places make themselves only too conspicuous, and therefore if a tax were imposed upon them it could not be evaded. Indifference to the comfort of others might continue to be displayed by the devotees of tobacco, but a sweet revenge might be taken by those whom he annoyed by calling upon him to produce his licence. A proposal which would excite the vehement hostility of a large class whom it injuriously affected would almost certainly be approved by Mr. Lowe, and therefore it is perhaps not impossible that he might adopt Mr. McLagan's hint and propose a tax on smokers. A speaker who followed Mr. McLagan in the debate remarked that the danger from lucifer-matches was increased a hundredfold when they ignited anywhere but on the box. Later in the afternoon Mr. Bruce arose and congratulated the House on the useful character of the discussion; but, considering that neither smoking nor the use of matches is likely to be restrained by law, we should like to be favoured with Mr. Bruce's notion of a discussion which is not useful.

The Report on which Mr. McLagan's Bill is founded appeared in 1867. It cannot be said that the habit of smoking, or that of using matches, has diminished in the interval. The need of legislation has certainly not grown less by the lapse of time; but, so far as we can discern, nothing would be even now proposed to be done if Mr. McLagan had not happened to take a special fancy to the subject. He is complimented on his able speech, and his Bill is read a second time, and Mr. Bruce promises him "every assistance." This, however, is one of the subjects which a vigorous Government would not leave to a private member. The Bill proposes to enact that coroners, or other officers to be specially appointed, shall hold inquiries respecting fires. The Bill does not interfere with the existing jurisdiction of Coroners, so that, supposing a fire to have caused death, there would be first the regular inquest by the Coroner on the body of the deceased, and then the inquiry under the Bill either by the Coroner or by a special officer. If a Coroner's jury return a verdict of wilful murder or manslaughter against any person under the existing law, that person may be tried upon the Coroner's inquisition; but the results of inquiries under the Bill would be valueless except perhaps as materials for articles in newspapers. It might be expected that when a considerable enlargement is proposed of the duties of an ancient officer like the Coroner, an attempt would be made to fit the proposed change neatly into the existing law. But this is the kind of work which a private member can hardly be required to undertake. The Bill provides that the inquiry shall be held by the Coroner without a jury. He is to take evidence and make a report, and to transmit the same to the clerk to the magistrates for the place where the fire happened, and that is all. There is a curious provision that "a Coroner, or any other person," shall not be liable to any action in respect of the making or publication "in good faith" of any report or evidence. As regards the Coroner, or any witnesses that may appear before him, this provision is unnecessary. But possibly it is meant to encourage the editors of newspapers to publish the Coroner's reports of inquiries, which otherwise would be in danger of mouldering in the obscurity of a magistrate's clerk's office. A Coroner, we will suppose, makes a report in which he expresses his opinion that a barrister set fire to his chambers through dimness of sight and unsteadiness of hand produced by copious potations. This report is transmitted to the magistrate's clerk of the district, and is also published in the newspapers. The law as it stands does not punish a man for coming home late at night and rather the worse for liquor and mismanaging a candlestick. The Coroner's report, therefore, would not be followed by a prosecution, in which the accused might establish his innocence; and if he attempted to arrive at the same result by bringing an action against a newspaper which had published the report, this provision of the Bill would stop him. If, however, the newspaper had published any comment on the report, it would depend for protection on the law irrespectively of this Bill. Supposing that the barrister had returned in perfect sobriety from a Social Science meeting, and that the fire had been caused by his laundress's negligent use of matches, the publication of this report would be rather hard upon the barrister; but he must submit to individual injury for the public good. The Parliamentary Committee on whose Report the Bill is founded recommended that where a fire has been proved to have been caused by the culpable carelessness of any person, "such person should be deemed guilty of a punishable offence." But Mr. McLagan has not attempted to embody this proposal in his Bill, and indeed he would require the "best assistance" of Mr. Bruce to enable him to do so in a manner satisfactory to lawyers. Among usual causes of fires are leaving clothes to dry or placing wood upon the hob at night to be ready to light the fire in the morning. The people who thus cause fires usually suffer by them in property, and perhaps in person, so that we need not greatly regret that the law cannot be made to reach them. But Mr. McLagan might, if he had thought fit, have introduced a clause into his Bill making reading in bed a misdemeanour, punishable by imprisonment. As his Bill stands, it will only incur the penalty of being commented upon in a Coroner's Report. The subject of matches appears to be beyond the control either of civil or criminal legislation. The Committee of 1867 was of course presided over by Mr. McLagan, who has been waiting patiently until the Reform Bill and the Irish Church and Land Bills having passed, the House of Commons has leisure for legislation on the "dangerous and careless use of lucifer-matches." We find, on turning to the Draft Report which Mr. McLagan submitted to the Committee, that it contained a statesmanlike exposition of the principles which ought to guide Parliament in dealing with the trade in matches. "It has been suggested," says the Report, "that a tax should be laid on lucifer-matches, or that all those selling them should take out a licence for so doing." The Committee think that either of these suggestions would seriously interfere with a most important branch of industry without producing the desired results. "They would rather recommend that the attention of the public should be directed to the much greater safety of those matches which ignite only on the surface of the outside of the box in which they are contained, and it is hoped that through time these matches will come into general use, and entirely supersede those which ignite through friction on any rough surface." We regret to say that this gem of Parliamentary composition has remained unnoticed in a blue-book now nearly five years old. Mr. McLagan's colleagues on the Committee first proposed to amend his paragraph, and then struck it out altogether. Perhaps they thought that a Report of a Committee of the House of Commons ought not to be made the means of puffing a particular manufacture. If the Report had passed as the Chairman drew it, the next step would probably have been to move a resolution of the House of Commons that the only safe matches are those which light upon the box. The amendment proposed to the paragraph was as remarkable as the paragraph itself. "Your Committee are of opinion that the imposition of a small tax on common lucifer-matches (those which ignite by friction almost anywhere, and are consequently so dangerous in the hands of children and heedless persons) would produce a considerable revenue, and by slightly increasing their price produce a more careful use of such matches." We must say that a House of Commons to which such a Report as this could have been addressed would have called loudly for reform. But the absurd paragraph and the equally absurd amendment were alike rejected by the common sense of the majority of the Committee. The amendment was in substance adopted into Mr. Lowe's Budget of last year, and the paragraph which embodied Mr. McLagan's favourite idea was not forgotten in the debate of Wednesday last.

Fraudulent incendiarism is doubtless an increasing crime. It is favoured by the reluctance of Insurance Companies to acquire a character for disputing claims, and it is likely to be checked by the inquiries which this Bill would authorise. Some years ago Coroners assumed to investigate the causes of fires as part of their ancient jurisdiction. But the Court of Queen's Bench decided that this jurisdiction did not exist. Mr. McLagan described his Bill as establishing that as law which this decision set aside; but this is hardly correct, because, if the Coroner proceeded, as in case of an inquest into the cause of death held super vium corporis, he would summon a jury, and with their assistance prepare an inquisition upon which an accused person might be put on trial, as in a case of murder. A Coroner exercising his ordinary jurisdiction enjoys the same immunity from actions for libel as other public functionaries; and if a newspaper publishes and comments on the proceedings at an inquest, it obtains by law or custom a sufficient protection from vexatious litigation. It is proposed by Mr. McLagan that a Coroner shall exercise this now or restored jurisdiction with all the powers and privileges which he usually enjoys; and if this proposal has been imperfectly effected by the Bill, it will be the duty of Government either to stop the Bill or to improve it.

FAULTS OF VISION IN TURNER AND MULREADY.

ARTISTS naturally flocked in unusual numbers to hear M. Liebreich discourse last week at the Royal Institution on "The Effect of certain Faults of Vision on Painting, with especial reference to Turner and Mulready." The lecturer is well known as an oculist, and so high is his repute in Paris that M. Thiers the other day, when suffering from an affection of the eyes, asked him to come over from London. M. Liebreich therefore takes a pathological view of art; indeed, we were almost prepared to hear from him that art genius is but a form of disease. Yet much of his lecture was not only startling, but true. It seems indeed little else than a truism that short sight and long sight, that keen sight and dim sight, must affect an artist and his work. It also is easy to believe that the eye with advancing years undergoes functional and structural changes which impair the clear definition of outline, or throw disorder into colour. The lecturer's attention was first directed to these chronic changes by two pictures by Mulready, both in the Kensington Museum—replicas known respectively as "Brother and Sister," and "The Young Brother," painted at an interval of twenty-one years. The earlier work is comparatively grey, tender, and quiet; the later is hotter, deeper, stronger; and the theory is that the painter's eye with advancing age lost its normal condition, that the lens became coloured, or rather discoloured, as by a yellow film. The possibility of such a change need not be called in question, but the specific case adduced is far from being sufficiently strong or conclusive. We have again examined the later work, executed at the age of seventy, and we fail to find loss of power or want of balance. We may mention also that Mr. Ruskin, who denounced the picture when exhibited in the Academy as frivolous in motive, recognized "an exquisite play of colour in the flesh," and admitted that "the colour of the whole was pure."

The pictures of Mulready, which extend over a period of more than half a century, are in fact singularly exempt from discrepancies or abrupt transitions; the shadows may be too purple, the lights too ruddy, but these defects were from the first inherent to a manner which the master year by year studiously matured. We remember with interest a conversation with the painter shortly before his death, the drift whereof was to show that such works as "The Choice of the Wedding-Gown," painted at the age of sixty, and perhaps the artist's masterpiece, had been long and anxiously considered, that the method employed was most deliberate, that the forms and the colours were balanced and adjusted with anxious forethought. We confess therefore that we have some difficulty in realizing the "faults of vision" imputed to Mulready; not indeed that he had no faults, for, just as every mind is supposed to be insane on certain points, so it may be assumed that all vision is in some degree distorted or discoloured. But the question strikes us as one of original idiosyncrasy rather than of accidental insanity or disease. Yet the theory, whether sustained or refuted by the facts adduced, seems to admit of easy illustration or explanation. Let us suppose a person to put on a pair of yellow spectacles. The effect is assumed to be, and we think correctly, that the yellows in a landscape or in a picture, unless extra strong, would be scarcely recognized, and that the blues also, unless very decisive, would be neutralized. The consequence seems to follow that the painter would throw ultra force into both yellow and blue; though against this supposition it must not be forgotten that the spectacles, or the crystalline lens as the case may be, would discolour precisely in the same degree the tones in nature and the pigments on the palette. At all events, the lecturer is, we think, wrong in his choice of painters; Mulready, as we have shown, does not serve his purpose, while Turner, as we shall see, is adduced in support of a distinct theory.

Turner, it might have been supposed, would serve as an ultra example of the assumed law that in late life the lens of the eye becomes preternaturally yellow. It is hard indeed to conceive of a more painful contrast than that presented by grey, pearly works such as "The Frosty Morning," exhibited in 1813, and inflamed and fevered compositions like "The Angel Standing in the Sun," painted thirty-three years later. There is a disease called colour blindness; but Turner's affection was nothing short of colour madness; his latest works are incoherent ravings. M. Liebreich, however, did not dwell on these obvious aberrations; he insisted chiefly on certain supposed malformations in the cornea or the lens whereby perpendicular lines are elongated, and horizontal lines broken in their continuity, so that all forms become blurred and indistinct. The lecturer amused, if he did not convince, his audience by experiments which seemed to show that a change of lens transmutes an early Turner into a late Turner. The speculative oculist might have further fortified his case by adducing the change in the manner of David Cox; the early drawings of this artist are sharp in touch and defined in outline, while his later effusions are vague as clouds in dreamland. It may be objected that it is not easy to understand how Turner could for many years remain oblivious to the startling fact that the sun and the moon were no longer for him round. An artist of the smallest common sense would at once put his picture right. And thus once more we recur to the doubt whether Turner and Mulready did not deliberately, and with definite purpose, contract the mannerisms which the lecturer would identify with physical disease. Certainly the elongation of trees into the upper sky served a purpose, just as the tall and attenuated trees of Raffaello and Perugino aided the general composition. Again, long reflections in Venetian waters, and a soft haziness of outline in the palaces and gondolas, with a scintillation of colour at given focuses, though a treatment often pushed to excess, had an obvious intention. Turner strove to paint sunlight, he endeavoured to put upon canvas an atmosphere palpitating with heat, sunbeams wherein every dancing mote was burnished gold or fervid fire. We remember sailing on the Bay of Naples when, for the space of half an hour, this peculiar effect passed over the waters. The remark was made, "Nature has at last reached Turner"; for a whole life the artist had striven to realize this poetic aspect, which perhaps few besides himself had cared to analyse and understand. It requires care then lest, as we have said, genius itself should be denounced as a disease. What would become of poetry or art if oculists should insist on treating as a serious malady "the eye with fine frenzy rolling"? The lecturer spoke with pity of congenial minds that received with rapture the last extravagance of Turner or Beethoven. Some compassion, however, might fairly be extended to cold critics who deny to an artist or his work a soul because of some small fault of vision. Byron may have been the worst of critics; certainly he was neither calm nor cool; but, what was better, his imagination took fire when brought into contact with the beauties of nature or art. Yet we fear he might have alarmed his oculist when, in the presence of the Venus de' Medici, he exclaimed, "We have eyes, blood, pulse," "the heart reels," "dazzled and drunk with beauty." The relation between the passions and the arts has never been rightly considered. History, we believe, would show that great artists have strong passions; and especially an eye for colour is identified with fervid imagination, the love of music, and lives brimful of pleasure. Titian and his brethren of Venice are cases in point. But Titian's eye did not conform to the law laid down by the lecturer; it became grey instead of yellow, as may be seen by a picture in the Academy of Venice, painted beyond the age of ninety. In fact, the strongest colour pictures have been given to the world not by old men, but by men in their full prime faring sumptuously. The Venetians were addicted to festivity; Rubens lived as a prince. The lecturer's theory is not borne out by the majority of painters in their decline; for the most part when the sun of life sets the horizon is grey; seldom are the heavens golden.

M. Liebreich stated that he could walk through a picture gallery, and point out the disease of the eye under which the painters were severally suffering. In France he naturally pitched on M. Ziem, whose furiously coloured Venetian scenes might indicate an abnormal condition as incurable as that of Turner. In London it would appear that artists' eyes are far from what they should be. The lecturer says that in our Royal Academy some pictures show a vertical eye, others the horizontal blur, while other compositions are distinct and detailed, generalised and slurred according as the painter may be far or near sighted. One example more egregious than the rest was pointed out; an artist, it would appear, had painted not only houses in sunshine red and in shadow green, but had actually thrown a green shade on the backs of some cows. The lecturer stated that he had had occasion to examine the eyes of various artists, and we can well believe that a short-sighted or long-sighted crystalline lens would show itself in the distinctness, or the want of distinctness, in the distance or foreground of a picture. But here we may observe generally of the oculist's supposed discoveries that what is not new is true, while what is new is at any rate dubious. We may further remark that the inconvenience of short sight has been so fully recognized that a considerable percentage of our population have already provided themselves with the simple optical instrument known as a pair of spectacles. In like manner the dimness of vision consequent on old age has been equally ascertained and ameliorated. In England, at any rate, we scarcely needed the appearance of prophet or philosopher to tell us of these but too obvious infirmities. It would be more to the purpose if the precise organic causes of complex conditions, such as colour blindness, could be demonstrated. The number of persons who are incapable of distinguishing between the complementary colours of red and green is so considerable that art must suffer, and some practical functions in life may occasionally fall into confusion; yet a man who finds himself blind after any sort will scarcely choose as his calling the painting of pictures or the working of railway signals. But how a person may to the end of his days be the victim of his vision receives amusing illustration in the well-known story that once upon a time John Dalton walked into the Quakers' Meeting at Manchester with a pair of flaming red stockings beneath his knee-breeches. The British Association, we believe, took the incident into serious consideration; but unfortunately M. Liebreich was not present.

Many important points the lecturer could not even glance at in the brief space of sixty minutes. It was unfortunate, for instance, that he made no allowance for the distinction between art and nature, especially in the province of colour. Notes which we have taken on the frescoes in the Vatican show, for example, that Raffaele, in the painting of draperies, used red as the shadow of green, and the Venetians capriciously, or rather purposely, sported with pigments prismatically, and never aimed at literal imitation of nature, except in a transcendental sense. We have often wished for a machine whereon, as upon a disc, we might whirl a Venetian or some other radiant composition round as fast as a spinning-top; thus all the colours would be blended into one prevailing tone, and that tone, if the lecturer's theory be correct, should correspond with the colour of the artist's eye lens. Such an experiment would probably go to prove that Turner had in late life a jaundiced eye; but if a picture of the middle period, such as "Crossing the Brook," were put on the wheel, the resultant tone would be a bluish grey, which might come to near accord with a normal eye balanced to white light. Human vision and outward nature are in complete and exquisite keeping; in fact, however positive and prismatic are the colours present, there is always a struggle and seeking for repose in white light and grey shadow; nature and art alike need the balance of a completed chord. In what way want of balance in a painter's vision may be set right it is not very easy to say; for disease or age there can be but palliatives; for a lens too yellow, glasses of a complementary colour—some tone of purple—might be recommended. But nothing is more easy to set wrong or more difficult to put right than what is technically known as "an eye for colour." Even a cold in the head will throw a painter's colour all out, and drink, late hours, and other dissipation deteriorate his pictures as much as his character. A sensitive eye for colour is, in fact, often the slave of the stomach, the victim of diseased digestion. But when faults in art vision are not organic, but merely functional, they may be rectified by any régime which improves the general health. We have known, for example, that a walk before breakfast clears the eye for colour; and a painter the other day told us that when jaded by overwork nothing so soon restored his sense of harmony as a turn into his conservatory; the complementary relations between a leaf and a flower, as in the common red geranium, range through the entire gamut; to pass the eye over such contrasted harmonies is like practicing scales. It is no new idea that all the senses are one and indivisible. Professor Hamilton, in fact, held with reason that every sense is but a phase of touch. At any rate an artist's eye for colour does not seem to be so much an isolated instrument as an organ which represents the whole man. The metaphors used in ordinary speech indicate that colour may be subject to every sense and respond to each mental emotion; thus we speak of hot and cool colour, of quiet and even of loud colour, also of sweet, delicious, and luscious colour; and then, again, colour may be passionate and voluptuous, as in the figures of Etty and the works of the Venetians generally. It is evident that M. Liebreich has treated of but a small section of a large subject, and, while thanking him for his suggestive discourse, we incline, after weighing the evidence, to return the verdict of not proven.

REVIEWS.

DU SAULLE ON PERSECUTION-MADNESS.*

THE able work of Dr. du Saule throws the light of the widest and fullest knowledge of mental disease upon one of the special phases of the constitutional tendency to madness. There is a whole group of cases in which the morbid and uncontrollable craving for secrecy and self-concealment comes as one of the symptoms or indications most frequently to be observed, and requiring to be most definitely analysed in relation to the influences generally predisposing to aberration. The author's official position as physician to perhaps the most important lunatic asylum in Europe has afforded him exceptional advantages for the study of this branch of morbid psychology, while the long list of books in which he has embodied the results of his experience will be some proof, to those to whom the name and services of the writer are less known than they are in his own country, of the zeal and industry which he has during many years brought to bear upon his task.

From the earliest times it had been the custom to distinguish the two broad classes of general and special madness. It became later the fashion to subdivide the victims of partial madness into those whose notions took a joyous or lively turn, and those who became sad or brooding. By Pinel all the cases of partial insanity were brought together, without distinction, under the common category of melancholy. Esquirol, aiming at greater precision, recognised two forms of partial disorder, which he termed lypemania and monomania; but in the application of his method he left so great an element of confusion that Baillarger, with a view to obviating it, proceeded to subdivide Esquirol's lypemania into two classes—first, that of the depressed and moody, liable to develop in extreme cases into utter stupor or insensibility; secondly, that in which melancholy took a more acute character, issuing in various forms of active monomania. Scientific precision, however, it was clear, called for a further step onwards in the pathology of the subject. It was of importance, at all events, to detach certain natural groups or classes from the too wide and crowded divisions under which the authorities had drawn up the increasing ranks of the insane. To one of these the able monograph of M. du Saule, Le Délire des Persecutions, is devoted. The idea of being persecuted, of having one's steps dogged or haunted by enemies, frequent as it is in its occurrence, and clearly as it is distinguished by its symptoms or characteristics, is included by implication in the melancholy of Pinel, the lypemania of Esquirol, and the sad or gloomy monomania of Baillarger. M. du Saule proceeds to trace it throughout. He studies it in its various aspects by the light of all the phenomena which bear upon it, and he makes of it a species of madness by itself, invested with the importance due to a class of mental disorder which in Paris alone extends on an average to five hundred cases a year. His book has been compiled, he tells us, from his notes of lectures to the practical class of the hospital, published at the request of the physicians and students, founded upon a personal study of cases at the municipal asylum, and aided by the unpublished observations of twenty years left by Professor Lasègue. The registers of the Prefecture of Police, as well as those of the Bicêtre, supplied a further quantity of material, out of which, after careful elimination, a large mass of scientific facts has been brought together full of deep and lively interest to the public, while of the utmost significance and value to the philosophical student of mental disease.

What are the general signs or symptoms which betoken what, for lack of a neater term, we must call "persecution-madness," or the notion of being for ever threatened, watched, or haunted by secret foes? The observations of M. Lasègue, strengthened by those of Dr. du Saule, make it possible to trace these in numerous instances from the first moment that the idea of persecution fixes upon a mind which has hitherto shown itself not otherwise than sane. From the moment when the cloud of suspicion crosses it, the element of insanity gives to the feelings and the conduct of the victim a direction wholly different from that which would be followed by a person of sound intelligence. The suspicions and fears which prompt a sane man to seek the cause or motive of his being followed or haunted, to trace the authors and instigators of his persecution, to meet and rebut their plots or charges, and with this view to invite the counsel and co-operation of others in unravelling and exposing the conspiracy, lead the victim of mania, on the contrary, even if he invites confidence and sympathy, to start with an absolute conviction of the fact, so as to need no proof of the existence of the conspiracy against him. Though he may protest that he knows nothing that he has done to call for it, his wonder at its existence never goes beyond the point of protest and complaint. The smallest circumstances confirm his suspicions; the very attempt to combat and dispel his illusions only gives them a new quarter on which to fix. What was at first a vague sense of uneasiness, a general idea of things going wrong, settles itself by degrees into a definite channel, in which the whole thoughts and emotions get absorbed. In some cases real and grave misfortunes or mental shocks have gone before and predisposed to this alienation of the reason. But in others no predisposing cause is to be traced. The vague presentiment of threatened evil will indeed be filled up by the mind in some way connected with previous habits, experiences, or pursuits. Commercial rivalry will be the bugbear in one case, political opposition and cabals in another, mysterious diseases, occult poisonings, sudden fits or accidents will harass a third. If he does not actually hear voices in the air, or see palpable shapes which mock or menace him, the most trivial incident has a meaning for one so possessed. The smile or laugh of a passer-by is taken as a personal insult. Any casual remark will seem to apply to, or to threaten, him. The tolling of a bell sounds his death-warrant, or the moaning of the wind his funeral elegy. A group standing near will be proof enough of a deadly conspiracy. If given to scientific pursuits, he will perhaps think himself the victim of some subtle influence, electric or chemical, or he may suspect his food to be drugged, or secret mechanism to be placed under his bed. In the middle ages the wretch thus persecuted would believe himself to be possessed by demons or evil spirits, to be under the spells of sorcerers or witches, or sold to foul, malignant, and unearthly powers. In these days the imaginary foe more probably takes the form of secret societies, or occult social or political enemies. Sometimes a single enemy attracts the whole force of suspicion, jealousy, or hate, in which case murder is the too common result of the madman's passions. The murder of Archbishop Sibour was the result of this brooding on the part of Verger over his imaginary wrongs:—

* Le Délire des Persecutions. Par le Dr. Léonard du Saule, Lauréat de l'Institut de France, Médecin de l'Asile de Bicêtre, &c. Paris: Henri Plon. 1871.

Si le délire revêt enfin la forme la plus grave et la plus terrible, le malade se complait dans une solitude calculée: il se soustrait à toute préoccupation étrangère, s'éloigne du commerce des hommes et s'isole absolument du contact des affaires mondaines. Ayant peur d'être empoisonné, il change chaque jour de fournisseurs; il achète et prépare lui-même ses aliments, et va se délecter en tapinois à la borne-fontaine, car qui sait ce que renfermerait une bouteille? Soupçonneux, sombre et taciturne, il fuit le bruit et la foule; il se met aux aguets, épie et commente les actes, les paroles, les gestes ou le regard de ceux qui l'approchent, et, au milieu des trames d'un qui-vive perpétuel, il reste volontiers à l'affût de la méchanceté nouvelle qui va être imaginée contre sa personne. D'une longanimité en apparence résignée, il assimile silencieusement les hostilités qui l'atteignent et il les échange avec la secrète préméditation d'une terrible représaille à venir. Il y a plus: il se construit in petto son propre piédestal, et, dans son échange constant de communications intimes avec lui-même, il s'émoussaille des colères qu'il allume, des ressentiments qu'il suscite, des orages qu'il déchaîne. Ne le consolez pas; jaloux d'une douleur qu'il savoure, il la veut sans partage et se séquestre avec elle.

Un jour cependant, la mesure est comble et l'exaspération arrive. La résignation apparente a fait son temps, l'heure de la rébellion a sonné. Deux moyens, tout d'abord, se présentent: sortir volontairement de la vie, et, dans une déclaration suprême, rejeter sur ses ennemis la déshonorante responsabilité de ce suicide lentement provoqué par eux seuls, ou s'armer d'un fer homicide et assassiner le chef supposé du complot, dont une opiniâtre hallucination de l'ouïe a dévoilé toute la trame.

In the numerous cases by which M. du Saulle illustrates and enforces his views of this kind of mental alienation, almost every phase which the morbid imagination in question is wont to assume will be found exemplified in actual experience. Suicide in perhaps the majority of cases forms the readiest and most common mode of the victim's attempted escape. In others wild and often ingenious modes of flight and concealment are his resource. We are not going to speculate upon the possible solution that may thus be found for a mysterious disappearance which of late agitated society at home, confirmed as this hypothesis might be by the report of "wander-madness" manifested by Bauer, the missing Russian, at a former period of his life. We are far from laying it down that the explanation of his strange conduct will ever be traced to an ubullition in a particular form of what we have been taught by Dr. du Saulle to regard as persecution-mania. But with the facts before us which our author's wide experience has brought together, and with the pathological reasoning which he has with so much consistency and force brought to bear upon them, we feel the less need to waste our energies of fancy or harrow up our feelings by raw head and bloody bones' apparitions of Russian Vehm-gerichts sitting in London, and of men hale of body and sound in intellect and will being spirited away from railway stations, with not a trace of their corporeal or worldly remains coming to light. It may be that the missing man is yet to turn up safe and sound, as in the ridiculous case of Speke. In the meanwhile, if we must needs choose between two hypotheses, we had rather look for the solution of the puzzle to the records and the principles of science, than to any wild theory of bloody rites whereby a relentless and invisible Skoptzina inflicts upon its members the alternative of an inscrutable death or of fidelity to the precedent set by one who has been canonized, for the first time within our knowledge, by the Spectator of February 17, as "St. Origen."

In an appendix to his work Dr. du Saulle gives us the benefit of his professional opinion as to the mental state of the inhabitants of Paris under the exciting series of events which marked the progress of the recent campaign and the siege of the capital. Contrary to what must have been the general impression, he is prepared with figures and observations which set aside the idea of any great and abnormal addition to the numbers of the insane. Political revolutions and catastrophes have no effect, he argues, save upon minds predisposed to disorder, in which case they only precipitate an inevitable result. Any other cause of excitement would have had an effect no less violent than that of the fall of a throne or a street fusillade. The greatest social disturbances have but a slight influence upon the mental condition of a people, for the simple reason that they are transient. From 1847 to 1854 the number of insane patients admitted at the Bicêtre varied no more than in proportion to the oscillation of the population of Paris during that period. In an asylum containing 1,000 lunatics, M. Morel could find but five who had gone out of their minds from political excitement. Such few cases as M. Belhomme had marked in 1848 were traceable, our author is convinced, to predisposition. A more prolonged and gradual influence is needed, he represents, to overthrow the normal power of the brain. That the cases of mental alienation throughout France have increased in a lamentable proportion he admits as a fact, but he attributes it to laxity of moral training, to vicious methods of instruction, to the want of all belief, to the low moral tone of literature, to the culture of egotism, and material indulgence of all kinds; to the thirst for gold, with its accompanying evils of reckless speculation, violent ups and downs of fortune, and frantic fear or hope, not to speak of excesses in drink and orgies of various kinds. In the terrible chronicle of the siege which Dr. du Saulle's professional figures supply, nothing is more striking than the number of young workmen between seventeen and twenty-two years of age brought in suffering from acute alcoholism. Inventors of all sorts of ridiculous schemes for annihilating the Prussians abound, but this the Doctor considers only the particular channel into which the situation turned the pre-existent tendency to mania. Upon women the effect in general is that of despair, tears, groans, and weariness of life. Here and there a Joan of Arc declares herself, but few cases of acute mania come upon the lists of the dépôt. The majority are traceable to what our author terms "physiological want"—literal loss of food, warmth, and sleep. In some the veritable persecution-madness appears in the form of fancying oneself haunted by the enemy, fearing to be shot as spies, &c., and not a few extra suicides ensue from this cause. Senile decay or idiocy is even more common, especially among the numerous poor thrown into the city from the banlieue. The most critical hour for the dépôt of the Prefecture was when the emissaries of the Commune broke in; Professor Laëgue was driven away, the director clapped in prison, and the almoner and eighteen Sisters of Mercy were expelled. Dr. du Saulle stuck manfully to his post. Among those who came under his care was the ill-fated President Bonjean, of whose mental state and heroic end touching details are to be read in Dr. du Saulle's narrative. Other names, among the rest those of Aasi, Lullier, Rosel, Urbain, Courbet are met with upon the physician's roll. Brief as it is, and limited to one aspect of a crisis in itself unique in history, this record is of singular value as that of one who was in a peculiar sense behind the scenes, and conversant in an exceptional manner with the internal springs of action.

THE LIFE AND REIGN OF EDWARD I.*

THE author of the Greatest of the Plantagenets looks back with satisfaction upon his work. He has laboured to restore Edward I. to his proper position in history, and has now the pleasure of quoting a number of writers of high reputation, who, if they have not quite gone his length in worshipping Edward, have at any rate admitted that he has made an able defence of the great King. He now comes before the world with a second work upon the life and reign of his hero, a revised and altered version, in which, as he tells us, "all the more important and controverted questions have been reconsidered, and the chapters which concern them almost entirely rewritten." Reconsideration, however, and the lapse of a dozen years have not cooled the ardour of the author's admiration for Edward, to whom he stands much in the same relation in which a preux chevalier stood to his lady-love. Against Scots, Welshmen, lovers of national independence, students of the Constitution, he is ready to maintain the honour of the object of his adoration. When he repeats the praise which Professors Goldwin Smith and Burrows, Dean Hook, and Sir Edward Creasy have accorded to his former work, it is evident that the great Plantagenet is foremost in his thoughts, and that he only records his own good deeds in the same spirit in which Boileau-Guilbert boasted of the exploits which proved his love for Adelaide de Montemarc. Everything which might—we will not say discredit Edward, because honest research can find so little to his discredit—but which might have ruffled his dignity, is passed over, or at least apologized for. Thus it is notorious that Edward, on one occasion at least, uttered an oath; the famous dialogue,—“By God, Sir Earl, you shall either go or hang,” “By God, Sir King, I will neither go nor hang,” well known as it is, could not be omitted in any account of the political struggles of 1297. But it is accompanied by a note to explain that the author, “remembering the constant and earnest attention to religious duties shown by Edward,” was at first “inclined to doubt whether the chroniclers might not be in error in ascribing this oath to the King.” On finding, however, that the Pope himself, in a public reception of Edward's ambassadors, asseverated “per Deum” that he would do the King justice, our biographer took comfort and came to the conclusion that “even religious men in those days thought it lawful to use language similar to that employed by Abraham, by Job, and by Nehemiah.” We are glad he has made his mind easy on the subject, else we should hardly have thought the matter worth so much consideration.

Other matters which were mentioned in his former work have been silently dropped in the present. We are still informed of the rejoicings of nobles and citizens at Edward's birth; but we are no longer told how greedily King Henry sought after presents for his firstborn, or of the sarcastic Norman who observed, “God gave us this child, but the King sells him to us.” Is this only from a desire not to repeat what the author had written before, or is it that he shrinks from introducing his infant hero under an aspect which is slightly ludicrous? After all, if Edward was sold to us, it may be pleaded that he turned out worth the money.

However, the author of the Greatest of the Plantagenets stands on a much higher moral level than most admiring biographers. He is not guilty of attempting to persuade us that wrong is right if done by his hero, or of emulating the writer of whom Macaulay averred that, if it were irresistibly proved that Lord Bacon was concerned in the poisoning of Sir Thomas Overbury, he would tell us that at the beginning of the seventeenth century it was not thought improper in a man to put arsenic into the broth of his friends. Edward, in fact, would hardly tempt a professed whitewasher of villains; for when the worst accusations that Scot or Welshman can bring against him are looked into, they simply come to this—that he was ambitious, and pursued his ends with a heartless disregard for patriots and their feelings. Even granting that he wanted, in modern phrase, to rectify his frontiers, to gain his natural boundaries, to effect the unity of Britain, the age has not yet come which is entitled to pass severe judgment on such wishes, or to inquire too strictly how they are attained. And he was not a conqueror from the mere lust of conquest. The author points out with truth, that in reality the conquest of Wales and Scotland, though "too often described as the end he had in view, was never desired by him; but to bring the whole land into unity, so far as to render internal war impossible, had been his object from the commencement of his reign." His biographer's task is only to set his actions in a clear light, and dispel the false ideas current as to his history and that of his opponents. It is a strangely hard fate that has overtaken Edward, and one which could never have been anticipated by his contemporaries, to whom he was "the flower of Christendom":—

* The Life and Reign of Edward I. By the Author of “The Greatest of the Plantagenets.” London: Seeley, Jackson, & Halliday. 3s. 6d.

Troust men of alle thinge,
Ant is were war ant wye.

That Welshmen and Scotchmen should heap maledictions upon him might have been looked for, but it could never have been expected that his own people, whose interests he had kept steadily in view, would, after the lapse of some four centuries, discard the testimony of writers of their own nation, and be content to take their opinion of their great King from the pens of his hereditary foes. The crime which is imputed to him—for his obnoxious tolls and talliages, of which complaint might be made with some reason, have left no great impression—is simply that he wished to make England strong and peaceful. As the first King since the Conquest who cared for the land and the people over which he ruled, he might meet with more generous treatment. Historical students, indeed, have by this time cleared their minds of Scottish romance, but it is not so easy to change popular ideas. Lovers of poetry think of the "ruthless King" of Gray, and the "fell Edward" of Scott; children adore the semi-legendary Bruce, and the English monarch who never watched a spider, and was never hunted with bloodhounds, has little chance of ousting his adventurous rival from their affections. But those who can free themselves from the fascination of the Tales of a Grandfather and the Lord of the Isles may profit by the clear and forcible statement of Welsh and Scottish affairs here given, on which points we go heartily along with the author. So far from Edward being an unprincipled conqueror, he acted throughout with remarkable honesty and openness. He claimed what there was at least good ground to consider his legal rights, and he claimed no more. The fact that he decided against the proposal of some of the competitors for the Scottish crown to divide Scotland into three—a scheme which would obviously have given great advantages to the Lord Paramount—is sufficient proof of the honesty of his dealings. The author has well shown how unreasonable is the charge of cruelty so often brought against him. Llewellyn was treated with leniency, and even with generosity; David, false and ungrateful, certainly deserved nothing better than to be left to the law; Wallace, the savage devastator of Northumberland, had a hope of mercy held out to him if he chose to submit. As for the accusation that Edward inflicted barbarous punishments, the writer truly remarks, "For more than four hundred years after Wallace's death no Englishman ever dreamed that there had been any peculiar cruelty in the mode of his execution." Edward's avowed intention of taking vengeance on all who were concerned in the murder of Comyn was simply the expression of a just and righteous indignation. We subjoin the author's observations upon this subject:—

Yet the death of that nobleman had deprived him of no favourite,—of no intimate personal friend or counsellor. Between this Scottish baron and the King there had been very little intercourse. For four or five years Comyn had kept the field against Edward, while Bruce had been professing the greatest zeal in his service. But Edward recognized in Comyn a frank and earnest opponent, who carried on the war until submission seemed to be a duty, and then surrendered his sword, accepted peace, gave his fealty to the King, and kept his covenant. And Edward saw this nobleman treacherously murdered by that Robert Bruce who had often sat at his table and professed attachment to him;—murdered, too, merely because he would not join in treason. Hence the King's vehement decision seemed at once to be taken, that for Bruce and his abettors there was to be no more mercy. The blood of Comyn should be fully avenged.

At the same time we are disposed to feel more sympathy for the Scots and the Welsh than the author would perhaps allow to be their due. Edward, indeed, was blameless in the matter; he found himself with legal claims over Scotland and Wales; he asserted them in a fair and legal manner; and it was not likely that he should have any respect for a love of independence which asserted itself by pillaging and devastating his immediate dominions. But it is fair to consider that the Welsh princes and people could not be expected to have any feelings of loyalty towards the alien King of an alien race. So, too, with Scotland. Ethnologically the so-called Scots might be Englishmen; but, as a matter of fact, they did not love their Southern brethren; and, judging from Peter Langtoft, the hatred was reciprocated. Of the merits of the question between the Crowns of Scotland and England, the ordinary Scot who followed Wallace would know nothing; but the presence of English soldiers would be a grievance that came home to him. As for the advantages of unity, they are at all times better appreciated by the stronger nation than by the weaker. "Scotland," says the author, "succeeded under Bruce in undoing all his [Edward's] work; but that Scotland was the better for such undoing is, we believe, wherever entertained, a most mistaken notion." "This irrational idea of 'Scottish independence' must have cost the two nations from Bruce's day to Elizabeth's at least a quarter of a million of valuable lives." As, however, the Scots chose to entertain this "irrational idea," it is matter for thankfulness that Edward did not live to conquer them. There was much wisdom in Arnold's remark that "Bannockburn ought to be celebrated by Englishmen as a national festival, and Athelstree lamented as a national judgment."

Neither can we altogether agree with the author when he decries the Barons of Hereford and Norfolk in order to exalt the perfect glory of their sovereign, and hotly contests their claim to the gratitude of their country. It is of course easy to insinuate doubts of the purity of any man's motives. It is easy to say that when Hereford and Norfolk deprived Edward of the power of levying tolls and talliages without a grant, they were only actuated by distastes of the war with France, and reluctance to part with their money. The author pleads that Edward had given the freedom which alone rendered the resistance of the Barons possible; that his character was such as to entitle him to the confidence of his people; that Hereford and Norfolk should not have deserted him at a critical moment, and that "prices and talliages" were of the nature of "requisitions," a word of mysterious sound which may cover anything. Yet the Long Parliament is not generally blamed as unpatriotic for pressing its grievances upon Charles I. at a time when he had two wars upon his hands, and knew not which way to turn for money; nor the Commons of a later period, when they refused to grant the Deliverer himself a revenue on the terms on which his predecessors had enjoyed it. We know that William, like Edward, felt himself an ill-used man:—"They trusted King James," he complained, "who was an enemy of their religion and their laws, and they will not trust me, by whom their religion and their laws have been preserved." But a conviction that Hereford and Norfolk were right in their principle need not make us unjust to Edward, who can hardly be blamed for showing some reluctance to give up a valuable prerogative.

The style of the book is not equal to the vigour of the argument; its worst fault being a habit of saying things twice over, and sometimes oftener. Edward once exclaimed, on being told that it was in his power to show mercy to some offender, "May pardon him! Why, I will do that for a dog who seeks my grace!" Fine as the sentiment was, it is not improved by being four times repeated. We also notice a serious inaccuracy—the confusion of the statute of Mortmain of Edward I. with the Act of George II., commonly but incorrectly known by the same name. "Henceforth" is the writer's summing up of the former statute, "no man should be allowed 'with dying hands' to will away his possessions 'to holy Church.' All such bequests were declared to be illegal and void." Now there is not a word about dying bequests in the statute of Edward; and thus a long disquisition upon the great King's religious feelings, setting forth how, though he could not throw off the belief of his age, and himself made large gifts for the good of the soul of his beloved Eleanor, he nevertheless saw the evil of permitting men on their deathbeds to will away their estates under spiritual coercion, has no foundation. An admirer of Edward might, one would think, have taken the trouble to read the statute he lauds so highly.

In spite of these drawbacks, the book is one of great interest and argumentative power. The author is never an unreasoning panegyrist; he is an advocate stating all the arguments on one side of the case. Whether he will succeed in bringing any Scotchmen to acknowledge their rightful Lord Paramount may be doubted; but we trust that he may be the means of teaching some misguided English to appreciate one of the greatest and most maligned of their Kings, and of convincing them that, so far from being cruel, crafty, and unscrupulous, Edward was in truth a man of singular conscientiousness, clemency, and honour.

THE THOROUGH BUSINESS MAN.*

WE were, we must confess, somewhat prejudiced against this book. The life of one thoroughgoing Methodist by another thoroughgoing Methodist did not at first sight promise to be very interesting to the general reader. We thought we had before us a huge tract—414 pages long—where it would be shown how Methodistical virtue is as bountifully rewarded here as it will be hereafter. The reward, we expected, would be proportioned to the size of the tract, and could even be roughly calculated beforehand. If, in a tract of four pages, a widow previously addicted to alcoholic liquors attends a revival meeting, gets converted, and is presented with a mangle, how much will a merchant receive whose history fills more than one hundred times four pages! Now, though there is certainly enough Methodism to satisfy even the most serious persons among that most serious community, yet there is a good deal else besides. And, though the ordinary unconverted and unrevived reader (if we may venture to coin the term) will skip a great deal of the religious experiences, still he will allow, we have no doubt, that both the author and his hero bear the impress of thorough sincerity. Mr. Gregory, in his biography of Mr. Walter Powell, a merchant of Melbourne and London, has aimed at showing that a man can be at the same time a thorough man of business and thoroughly religious, that he can rapidly make a large fortune, and continue to be one of the strictest members of one of the strictest Churches. We could have wished that Mr. Gregory could have cut down his memoirs to half the size. We must admit that he has not been nearly so long as he might have been, for Mr. Powell left behind him, when he died, a "journal of eleven folio volumes." It is something to have to cut down eleven folio volumes to one octavo. Nevertheless, if the octavo could have been halved, its readers likely enough would have been doubled. It is no doubt a most difficult matter for a biographer, who is almost always a friend, if not a relative, to distinguish between what will interest the general reader and what will interest only the little group of which the hero was the most conspicuous figure. If, as Molière used to read his plays to his housekeeper and watch what passages made her laugh, biographers would find some one to whom to read their manuscripts and watch what passages made him sleep, a great improvement might be obtained. However, Mr. Gregory has not in point of length sinned above all biographical sinners, and so we must not insist too much on this. Neither has he formed an exaggerated view of the man whose life he has undertaken to write, nor, as writers so often do, called upon the world to lament for the loss of a genius of which it hears for the first time. In his introductory chapter, in writing of his friend, he modestly enough says:—

* The Thorough Business Man: Memoirs of Walter Powell, Merchant, Melbourne and London. By Benjamin Gregory. London: Strahan & Co. 1871.

His career is the more instructive, inasmuch as he was not a man of genius or of splendid accomplishments, though of superior natural ability and conscientious self-culture. In short, he was not a prodigy, but a pattern. "Patient continuance in well doing" was the whole secret of his spiritual and temporal success. It can scarcely be an uninteresting or unproductive inquiry to ask what were the principles and habits by which he acquired wealth, retained wealth, and devoted wealth to its legitimate uses.

Mr. Powell may justly be regarded as a representative man—representative of a class which one would fain believe to be increasing, and destined to increase, notwithstanding the confessedly low state of mercantile morality; a class displaying all the energy and acuteness of self-made men, yet withal spiritually-minded, sensitively honest, benevolent, public-spirited, and bent on intellectual culture.

Walter Powell, like many another man who has made his way in the world, was the son of parents who were sufficiently intelligent and sufficiently well educated to give him some little store of learning and an eager longing after more, and yet were so poor that, after all, the chief schooling he received was the schooling of circumstances. His father and mother, when he was still an infant, had settled in Van Diemen's Land, which as a colony was, like our hero, also in its infancy. There they, with many others, had had great hardships to struggle against, and Walter received that stern training in economy which, more perhaps than anything else, leads to wealth. Happily, with finely-gifted natures this severe economy in youth leads not only to wealth, but also to a noble use of wealth, in manhood and old age. At the age of twelve, when he had learnt from his parents—for they were his only teachers—how to write a fair hand and keep simple accounts, he obtained a situation as clerk in the office of a Launceston merchant. "The sole companionship" he had in his master's house, where he lived for three years, "was that of a man servant who had 'left his country for his country's good.'" When he was fifteen he got a better post in an auctioneer's office, where from his master he received a thorough training in business, from his mistress a devotion to Methodism, and later on from the two their daughter as his bride. Some years before this latter prize was won he had given proof of his sterling qualities. Commercial difficulties had come upon the colony, and his employer, among others, was sorely tried. Young Powell himself was the first to insist on the reduction of his salary, and when urged by friends to seek elsewhere better pay, "quietly replied, 'My employer took me when I was at a loss for employment, and I shall not leave him till I see him re-established.'" He undertook at the same time the work which had heretofore been divided among two.

Mr. Gregory will, we trust, forgive us if we do not dwell with him on the Methodistical side of Walter Powell's character, which, at the period of his life at which we have now arrived, is very largely set forth. He was undoubtedly one of the most earnest of Methodists, but he was an honest man before he was a Methodist. No doubt he found in its regular system, in its "class meetings," in its "Band-meetings," in its constant mutual examinations, in its unceasing searchings into the conscience, much that suited his natural temperament. But as certainly, in our opinion, his natural temperament, morbidly sensitive as it was, was very far from being benefited by all this rigorous method in his religion. Mr. Gregory himself admits that "this intense and persistent self-scrutiny seems prodigious": and he goes on to say that "doubtless, in conjunction with all his other labours, it shortened the earthly life which it intensified and refined." Mr. Powell himself, when, thoroughly worn out, he was dying at the early age of forty-five, writes to a friend:—

My crime is that I have tried to do too much. I have wrought in my business and in the Church like a strong man, when I ought rather to have nursed myself. I could not believe my doctors that I was killing myself, till one day head and hand refused to work for me any more. That convinced me that I must relinquish all my offices in the Church, and set about repairing myself. I hope, in future, moderation in all things will be my motto.

Twenty or thirty years more of so valuable a life would not have been dearly purchased by a certain neglect of Methodism, and a certain devotion to the pleasures of this life. We are not ourselves quite sure that we could have severely condemned him if in his youth he had devoted himself in all moderation to "midnight dancing," even though it is "comprehensively and incurably bad." Mr. Gregory indeed does not disapprove of all amusements, and allows that "relaxation is a necessity imposed upon us by the Creator, and is therefore an obligation." But then by relaxation he means something quite different from what most people mean, as will be seen by the following extract:—

For all those quietude which Christian prudence induced him to forego, he found amply compensating substitutes in music, for which he had both taste and capacity, and of which he was passionately fond, in books, in swimming, in the public services of religion, and in "sweet counsel" with like-minded Christians.

It is no wonder that a man who was intensely devoted to the affairs of his Church, to the management of a large business, to his own self-culture, and to a great number of schemes of general public usefulness, and whose one bodily recreation seems to have been swimming, broke down early, especially when in the latter years of his life he settled in London. In Australia a man may not doubt get his daily swim most of the year if he lives near water. We should like to know, however, how many swims Mr. Powell had after he opened his new house of business in Broad Street Buildings, and lived at Lancaster Gate?

We must leave the Methodistical side of his life and turn more to the thorough man of business. Shortly after his marriage Mr. Powell removed with his wife to Melbourne, which at that date—1845—was a town of only some 7,000 inhabitants. There he had at first a most severe struggle; but with his "regularity, perseverance, punctuality, self-denial, economy, and industry," he gradually fought his way. Later on, when there came the excitement of the gold-diggings, he had the good sense to see that "his diggings lay at home," and in his business as an ironmonger he had a great sale among the miners. All his clerks and servants forsook him, and "every man his own clerk, every lady her own housemaid, was the order of the day." Overwhelmed as he was with work, he never seemed to forget schemes of public usefulness, but was occupied now in founding a church, now a school, and now an Immigrants' Home. Though this Home was founded by Wesleyans for Wesleyans, yet so long as there was room it was open to all sects. In the first fifteen months of its existence it gave shelter to 2,773 people, of whom only 1,335 were Wesleyans. In spite, or in consequence, of all his liberality he rapidly heaped up a large fortune. His biographer tells us that very early in life he rigidly set apart at least one-tenth of his earnings for benevolent purposes; but this was his minimum, which was always exceeded. His books after his death showed that he had spent on his orphan nephews and nieces nearly 1,200*l.* a year for many years, and that "during the decade 1850-60 he had expended on the average 1,600*l.* a year in private benefactions to individuals." On one occasion, through the death of a relative, he had come into possession of a considerable property, but he divided it at once among his "more necessitous relatives." On another occasion he sent "an anonymous donation of 250*l.* to Mr. Hargreaves, the discoverer of the Australian gold-fields, accompanied by a graceful letter, representing the donation as a scant offering of simple justice." In the distribution of his wealth he showed the same wisdom as he had shown in its acquisition. "His liberality was as practical and as business-like as it was unconstrained." He would only help those who were ready to help themselves, and where he did give, he gave "not only money, but also that which was far more precious—time, thought, and attention." To a young man he wrote:—"I will add fifty pounds to every hundred you have saved by the time you are twenty-eight; but if you do not depend upon yourself, you shall not depend on me. That would destroy all your energy, and make you worthless." He set his face steadily against that most immoral of all debts, a debt incurred for the furtherance of religion. "I have quite made up my mind," he says, "never again to subscribe to a chapel which will have a debt upon it." On another occasion he thus writes, in opposition to a proposal for "burdening a religious enterprise with debt, à la Polynesian Missions":—

You are not obliged to send more men than the fund can support, nor are the men, when sent, required, either by the Committee or their Great Master, to do more work than they are equal to. What is the use of preachers, any more than tradesmen, trying to do a large business with a small capital? That can only end in disaster. Let the missionaries do what work they are equal to. If they attempt more, they will accomplish so much less.

When we come to look into the causes of Mr. Powell's extraordinary success in business, we find that, in addition to habits of economy, punctuality, industry, and integrity, he had that wisdom which arises only from culture and from great breadth of thought. He was a good ironmonger; but what is really no less important for success in business, he was a man who had read widely and thoroughly. We see the cultivated side of his nature in the wise and liberal way in which he treats the people in his employment, trains up his partners, deals with his debtors, strives after every kind of knowledge, resists the temptation of too rapidly extending his business, and constantly insists that "the laws of success in business are as fixed as any other laws." "No man," he says, "can conduct a business well without succeeding in the long run." The remarks that he makes on these various points are often very shrewd and terse. For instance, "The secret of finding good partners," he says, "is training them." So well in fact did he train his people, that he can write, "I have half-a-dozen deserving young men now in my establishment that I would not hesitate at once to take in as partners, provided I required them." In dealing with defaulters his biographer says, "he never resisted the cry, 'Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all,' but he insisted on regular and regulated payments, at a ratio adjusted to the ascertained means of the debtor." He writes from England to warn his partners against overtrading, and against trying to change from a retail to a wholesale business. "You must take off your jacket," he says, "and go to the retail. You ask, 'What will the public think of it?' The public thinks of nothing but its own interest." He insists that "how every part of the business pays should be sifted with the greatest nicety," knowing well that a man who is not accurately informed in the statistics of his business is often losing heavily in some one article which once was to him a source of considerable gain. While scrupulously honest, and utterly incapable of using any unfair means, he maintains with just pride that "an honest rivalry in meeting the public wants is as noble in the competitors as it is serviceable to the community." He points out how valuable is the information that he is constantly obtaining as he travels through England, and urges his partners to have his remarks copied into a book, "the observations placed against each article they refer to, as the information is being obtained at great cost and trouble." In fact there is nothing, except perhaps uprightness, on which he insists more than on thorough and complete knowledge, and with him, as his biographer says, "Business was a fine intellectual exercise." Throughout his life he had never neglected self-culture, but when he was able to throw the chief burden of his business on his partners, and to get more time to himself, he entered on a methodical course of study. He began with the beginning, and, setting himself to master his own tongue, "in his fortieth year passed through a course of grammar exercises, and the schoolboy drudgery of 'spelling and meanings.' His next step was to familiarize himself with some of the greater masters of the English language." We cannot enter further into his course of studies, which seems to have been as soundly arranged and as thorough as his business. Unhappily those years of studious ease and cultivated retirement were not to be his, as death carried him off when he was but forty-five years old. He had lived long enough to show that a man may be a thorough tradesman, and at the same time an eager student, a sincere Christian, and a high-minded gentleman.

MRS. HOPE'S CONVERSION OF THE TEUTONIC RACE.*

WE see in this book with a good deal of satisfaction that the results of the recent scientific treatment of history are beginning to make their way into the regions where we should have least thought of looking for them. Mr. Dalgairns, who edits—whatever that most ambiguous of words may mean—this small volume, may be remembered by many Oxford men as a "convert," or a "pervert," or what some call, in more colourless sort, simply a "vert." Now, whatever we may say of the older and more steady-going type of English Roman Catholics, the type of Dr. Lingard and Dr. Oliver, the modern type of converts or perverts is the last class of people on whom we should expect to find that modern thought and modern criticism had made any impression. Yet the book before us shows that they have by some means or other made a very perceptible impression on its author. Mrs. Hope or Mr. Dalgairns, whichever it is, seems to go on the principle that the laws of modern criticism may be freely followed whenever they do not clash with the teaching of the Church; though we must confess that the teaching of the Church must here be taken in a very wide sense indeed. Even if we accept the infallibility of the Pope in matters of dogma, it does not seem at all necessarily to follow that we are bound to accept the infallibility in matters of fact of every life of a saint which some fervid votary chose to write either in earlier or in later times. The book presents a curious contrast. As soon as she gets within the region of hagiography, Mrs. Hope, or her spiritual guide, seems to make it a matter of conscience to believe every legend, however wild in itself, and however slight may be the evidence on which it rests. But, as long as she is without this magic circle, Mrs. Hope uses her faculties, and uses them to good purpose. She has gone to the right sources, and she has used the right method, on many of those branches of knowledge the scientific treatment of which has been reserved for our own day.

The subject of the present volume is the conversion of the Franks and the English, and it is to be followed, or perhaps it is already accompanied, by a fellow-volume on St. Boniface and the Conversion of Germany. Now, in dealing with such ticklish matters as the Franks and the English, we do not say that Mrs. Hope exactly reaches our own ideal standard; but we do say that, whenever she sets herself free from her self-imposed fetters, she comes far nearer to it than nine-tenths of the books of the kind which it is our hard fate to have to look through. In the early chapters on the Germans and their invasions of the Empire, we might find things to correct here and there, but the general treatment is thoroughly sound. Mrs. Hope has quite grasped the general character of the Teutonic nations, and their true position with regard to Rome and the world in general. We confess to having been agreeably startled when the book began with the Aryans and their migrations, bringing in the Teutons in their proper place as one branch of the great family. Of course there is nothing new in this. Mrs. Hope does not profess to make any new discoveries, and some of her statements and derivations are certainly open to dispute; but it is a great thing to find a writer of a book of this class so clearly grasping and so boldly setting forth truths which, familiar as they are to scholars, are still utterly unknown—or, worse than unknown, utterly misconceived—by most of the writers of our smaller literature. And it is something to find that an editor from the London Gentry of St. Philip Neri finds no reason to strike out the results of inquiries in such dangerous quarters. But it is rather provoking, after reading chapters like these, which show a striving, by no means unsuccessful, after a critical method, to turn to the tale of St. Ursula and the eleven thousand virgins, all told with the minutest detail and the most solemn conviction of its truth. Mrs. Hope goes on to tell all the stories of the early Benedictine monks, and again those of Columban and his followers, as if every word was the most undoubted historic truth. Every tale about a wolf or a bear carrying the saint's baggage, or otherwise doing his bidding, is accepted with all gravity as a proof that the saints really had an extraordinary power over the animal world. Now these tales are by no means to be despised. They illustrate the religious sentiment of the age, and they often throw an incidental light on its manners and even on its political history. Moreover, looked at as the play of a devout fancy, the stories are often exquisitely beautiful, and in some cases it is not hard to see the groundwork of fact out of which the legend grew. Take, for instance, a class of stories in which Mrs. Hope evidently delights, those in which the tenderness of the saint towards animals forms a protest against the savage sports of the time. The wearied stag seeks refuge in the cell of the saint, and the hunters, at his rebuke, turn back from pursuing their prey. This is quite possible and quite likely; its frequent appearance in legend may even be taken as a sign that it has really happened; the only thing is that it is described as happening so often that we begin to doubt about its historic truth in each particular case. But when we are told that not only human hunters, but wolves, yielded in the like case to the saint's rebuke, then our faith begins to fail us. Such a story may have grown, by the usual process of legendary growth, out of the other class of tales which we have just mentioned. Or it may be a mere allegory. Or it is just possible that it may have in it a real groundwork of fact. The strange dread of man which seems impressed on wild beasts may have caused the wolf to turn back at the threshold of the saint, and an easy improvement on the part of the second teller of the story would be almost sure to turn this into an actual obedience of the wolf to the saint's bidding. When the tale had got thus far, it was easy to change negative obedience into actual service, and so we get the stories of bears carrying baggage and the like. But mark the difference. The tale is no longer beautiful; it is simply grotesque. No one laughs when the wolf turns back at the saint's bidding; it is hard not to laugh when the bear carries his baggage. One of these bear stories we must notice as a genuine bit of comparative mythology:—

On one occasion the brother minister (?) having found a bear eating their store of fruit, he [Columban] bade the brother divide the fruit into two parts and give one to the bear, forbidding it to touch more than its own share. On this and all similar occasions the wild beasts respected his commands.

Now we remember in our childhood a tale of a little girl eating some kind of porridge with a spoon, when a pig comes and seems inclined to take more than a fair share of the porridge. On this the child remonstrates with the request, "Take a spoon, pig." Surely a comparative mythologist would say that the stories of the bear and the pig come from the same source.

But Mrs. Hope is capable of much better things than these. The following is a really good setting-forth of the relations of the Teutonic invaders towards Christianity and Roman Paganism:—

The circumstances of the age, and the peculiar characteristics of the Germans, greatly assisted their conversion. Christian bishops and priests were often carried captive into Germany, where their saintly lives, their eloquence, and their miraculous gifts, brought about the conversion of whole tribes. When, on the contrary, the Germans were led to the south as captives, or wandered thither voluntarily, their worship of nature lost its hold on them. They missed the sacred oak, the grove, the spring, or the hill, which was the sanctuary of their gods. The whole aspect of nature, the seasons, and even the stars in heaven were changed, so that they could no longer carry out their daily routine of life under the guidance of their familiar deities. Perplexed by the strange novelty that met them on all sides, they would naturally look around to discover the new gods, to whom they must trust for aid and blessing. On the one hand, they would behold the gorgeous Pagan worship, associated with ideals of beauty and philosophy which were unintelligible to them, and with foul corruptions which were revolting to their better nature, while they would find that in point of depth and earnestness, especially as to the doctrine of a future life, it was far inferior to their own national religion. So palpable was this inferiority that Roman Paganism had no hold on the Germans, though the Romans were wont to admire the firm faith of the Germans, and often adopted their superstitions. On the other hand, they would find the Christian Church, whose simple creed was easily understood, and could even be connected with their own oldest national traditions and customs. Its poverty and chastity, the equality and fraternal union of its members, their devotion to the Lord to whose service they were vowed, their heroism as martyrs, were the supernatural expression of those virtues, which they had been wont to prize in their old forest home.

The English part of the book is still better than the Frankish. In the Frankish part, though Mrs. Hope rises far above the level of most books of the kind, yet, here and there, even when she is not telling stories about saints and bears, there are bits which show that, though she has gone a long way in the right direction, a little of the old leaven is still cleaving about her. In the English part, on the other hand, though she overdoes her story with cumbersome hagiography, yet in the parts where she has to deal with the ordinary world she has made a thoroughly good use of the latest lights. The political and geographical history, and the general circumstances of the conversion, are given with real clearness and insight. It is only when we come across the saints that we have anything to find fault with. The story of the conversion of the English could hardly be told without telling the tale of Gregory and the slave children yet again. Still Mrs. Hope might have spared us the rather sensational beginning of the English part of her book, and by relying on legendary authorities she carries Augustine into various parts of Britain into which history does not carry him. But the following contrast between the conversion of the English and that of the Franks is thoroughly good:—

* Conversion of the Teutonic Race; Conversion of the Franks and the English. By Mrs. Hope. Edited by the Rev. John Bernard Dalgairns. London: Washbourne. 1872.

We often meet still with great crimes, yet we never in the old English history come upon such hybrid monsters as Brunehaut and Frédégonde. In order to see how utterly different a Saxon king was from a Merovingian monarch, we have only to contrast the Venerable Bede with Gregory of Tours. The circumstances of the Saxon conquest of England will explain the difference. The Merovingian was a barbarian with a varnish of Roman culture. The Englishman was a fresh child of nature with the virtues of a Christian. The Frankish kings on the Continent found themselves in the midst of the ancient Roman Christianity, and settled themselves amongst and intermingled with the Romanized Gaul. It was not so with the German pirates who conquered Britain. Of course it is impossible to exterminate a nation, and British women no doubt often became the wives or slaves of the Saxons, and the serfs of the South and West were very probably enslaved Britons; yet the policy of the Saxon was one of extermination, while that of the Frank was, on the whole, of preservation. While the Franks dwelt amidst the churches and amphitheatres of the ancient Roman civilization, the Saxons drove the old population into the mountains and the fens, absolutely destroyed Silchester, Pewsey, and Wroxeter, and repopled waste cities. The peculiarity of the conversion of the English by St. Augustine and his successors was the consequence of this state of things. The Saxon king was not a blood-stained burlesque of a Roman emperor, like the Merovingian Frank. He was still a genuine German chief, and pure German ideas were to be found in England when they were adulterated on the Continent. Hence when the king was converted, Christianity was proposed to the Witan, and the nation gave to the religion of its king and nobles a hearing, which could not have been extorted by his command. Grace found a virgin soil in the frankness and independence of the Saxon, unspoiled by a decaying civilization.

The book is thus a curious mixture, but it is not like a good many books of the kind, in which theological prejudice is made to colour every word. The two incongruous elements in Mrs. Hope's book might be cut asunder with a pair of scissors. On one most important point her religion gives her an advantage over most people who take these times in hand. Whatever temptations may beset a Roman Catholic version of the conversion of England, there is at all events no fear of dreams about the ancient British Church, or of St. Augustine being made an accomplice in the massacre of the monks of Bangor.

MACDONELL'S SURVEY OF POLITICAL ECONOMY.*

MR. MACDONELL informs us in the preface to his book that he has no such excuse for publishing it as might be founded upon blaming his predecessors. He fully acknowledges his obligations to Mr. Mill, whom he describes as the greatest of economists, to Chevalier, to Roscher, and to other well-known writers. That he does not entirely accept the views of Mr. Mill or any other master will presently appear; but on the whole he may be described as belonging to the orthodox school. And why then publish a treatise which professes to teach nothing new, or at most aspires only to purify the sound doctrine from some of the errors with which it has become identified in popular estimation? Is there not already a superabundance of treatises expressing substantially the same views, and in the hands of everybody who cares for information on the subject? To this question Mr. Macdonell might reply, that if no books were written except those which were imperatively demanded, the business of publishing would be restricted within singularly narrow limits. He has as good a right to ask for a hearing as any of his competitors, and he may be justified in his undertaking if a slightly new arrangement of the matter, and felicity in expressing some of the theories under consideration, should fit his treatise to the tastes of any particular class. It seems indeed that Mr. Macdonell originally adopted a mode of publication which implies a considerable confidence in his powers of popularizing a proverbially dry subject. The book is based, we are told, on a series of articles which appeared in the Scotsman. The statement is calculated to increase the respect which we entertain for the Scotch people. It is startling to think of the vigorous intellectual appetite which is not repelled by a treatise on political economy appearing periodically as a substitute for light reading. In more Southern latitudes we fear that a discussion on the theory of rent or the laws of exchange would be squeezed out by descriptions of the last murder or the prospects of the next election. Yet even the readers of the Scotsman apparently require some sweetening of the pill. They could not quite manage that form of the study which affects a rigid scientific accuracy. So much at least we infer from Mr. Macdonell's method of treatment. He does not precisely expound the laws of the so-called science, but, according to his title, gives a general survey of results without venturing far into details. His book suffers in some respect when published as a whole. It seems to be deficient in systematic arrangement, and to assume an amount of previous knowledge which unfits it to be an elementary treatise. We fear that it would be less useful to a student who should desire to obtain a competent knowledge of the subject than to a hasty reader who is only anxious to be capable of superficial talking or writing about it. On the other hand, it certainly has the merit of being written in a more lively style than most similar works. Mr. Macdonell is evidently a well-read man, and can draw upon a considerable stock of illustrations. If we are inclined to fancy that he is rather too anxious to be amusing, we cannot suppress a certain feeling of gratitude to a quality so rare in a political economist.

We easily pardon a writer for being a little too jumpy in a study where almost every man thinks that he has a prescriptive right to be a bore. Yet our words must not be misunderstood, and we are far from accusing Mr. Macdonell of having produced a book which can, in any ordinary sense of the word, be described as entertaining. We only mean to imply that he is rather less uncompromisingly dry and systematic than we are accustomed to expect a writer of such a treatise to be.

Turning to the substance of Mr. Macdonell's book, we may say that it seems to have a fault or a merit—for opinions will differ on the subject—of a similar kind. He seems to have a rather inadequate grasp of the theories which he expounds. He discusses the claims of political economy to be considered as a science, and he appears to pronounce in its favour. He says that Comte's objection to conceding it so high a name is "neither just nor plausible in the case of the analysis of the phenomena of production which issue in conclusions absolutely true," and he thinks that "arguments which would be fatal to the pretensions of geology to rank as a science are not dangerous." In order to a full discussion of this question, we should have to inquire a little more precisely what is meant by science. If any study which leads to the discovery of truths is entitled to be considered as a science, history is a science just as much as geology; and, in truth, the word is applied so very carelessly in popular acceptance, that it may well include that as well as many other branches of study. The closer analogy would be between geology and statistics, both of which provide the facts on which it is endeavoured to base certain general laws. Without entering upon the question whether the laws announced by economists are entitled to be put beside the laws discovered by natural philosophers, we may say that the tendency of Mr. Macdonell's writings seems to be generally to discredit them. But for his apparently distinct assertion to the contrary, we should have inferred from the general tone of his remarks that he considered the claims of such writers to be greatly exaggerated, and that political economy, so far from in any sense comprising a body of accurately known and invariable truths, was little more than a collection of a small number of empirical observations, very liable to be upset at any moment. His general tendency is to find fault with most of the doctrines that have been most positively laid down, and, though not actually to deny their truth, to regard them as only approximately true, and true only in a minority of cases. He does not seem to attach any importance to what has been called the wage-fund theory; he does not believe much in the theory of rent, he finds much fault with Ricardo's theory as to the mode in which the value of certain commodities conforms to the cost of production; and he does not seem quite to accept the Malthusian theory of population. We have to speak rather doubtfully, for Mr. Macdonell does not express himself very positively upon these subjects, and always pays much deference to the authority of Mr. Mill, of Ricardo, or of Adam Smith, even when he is gradually paring away the most vital part of their theories. Part of what he says would be easily admitted even by the most orthodox economists, and amounts to a statement of what is substantially recognized by Mr. Mill. He observes, that is, that the concrete phenomena are not identical with the assumptions upon which economists generally base their arguments; that men are not actuated exclusively by the motives of buying in the cheapest and selling in the dearest market, and that the sum paid for the use of land is very frequently different from that which would be obtained by a rackrent. It follows that before we express economical theories in terms of real life we must make a great number of corrections in order to obtain anything like a true result. Just in the same way, the mathematician who calculates the motions of a perfect fluid, or of an absolutely hard body, would have to make many allowances before he could determine the way in which a particular lake or stream would behave, or before he could apply his formula to some bit of practical engineering. But besides this Mr. Macdonell appears to doubt the validity of some accepted conclusions, even when we limit ourselves to the ideal world of political economists. We cannot say that his arguments convince us in this respect, though we are quite ready to admit that he incidentally illustrates with much force the necessity for being careful in making the transition from theory to fact. Without going fully into any of the questions which he discusses, we will take an instance or two of his arguments, which will probably be a sufficient indication to our readers of the general characteristics of his style. Here, for example, is his attempt to meet Ricardo's theory of rent by a crucial instance. The Dutch, he says, drained Lake Haarlem and sold the 42,000 acres which were gained for 661,000*l*. "Suppose," he says, "the State, instead of selling the land, had rented it; would there—at all events need there—be one portion of this land not paying rent?" If not, he seems to think that the theory fails to correspond to the facts. We can give him a very simple answer. On the ordinary assumptions of political economists there would necessarily be either a portion of land not paying rent, or, which is equally in conformity with the theory, there would be a certain quantity of capital applied to the land which would pay no rent. The reason is obvious; for otherwise there would be an opportunity for capitalists to realize the average profit of which they would not avail themselves; and the theory of political economists is that capital, so to speak, spends itself equally over the whole field of production, and would therefore penetrate into Haarlem Lake. Whether this result would or would not be realized in fact would depend upon Dutch statistics or caprice.

* Survey of Political Economy, By John Macdonell, M.A. Edinburgh: Blackie & Douglas, 1872.

Surplusage here mars the effect, and adds to the sin of mistranslation of the first word. The beautiful description of Alceas visiting her nuptial chamber, her home's altars, and her children for the last time, which follows almost immediately on the lines we have quoted, ought to have quickened any translator's emulation to transmute worthily such linked sweetness. But Mr. Williams does not see it. With a singular disregard for probability, he makes her bathe in "river streams" (ibani norayung, we imagine, means simply "limpid water"—see v. 159), as if by such rashness she wished to accelerate rather than protract the fatal fleeting moments. And where it least should be so, his blank verse falls uniformly flat and commonplace. It is still worse with the choruses, as to which in his preface he takes some credit for having "put them into rhymed lines, the strophes and anti-strophes being generally of one metre and uniform length," and "care having been taken to select a metre in each case that should answer to, and in some degree express, the sad or joyous tone of the speakers in the choric songs." How is this promise fulfilled? In the first chorus of the Medea the first strophe and anti-strophe are rendered in elegiac quatrains—a measure not choral or lyrical—and the second in rhyming octosyllables. Any reader who calls to mind the chorus in question beginning with ἄνω ποταμῶν ἱερῶν, κ.τ.λ. (409-44), will understand that the first part of Mr. Williams's version is of necessity un-odelike, and will be struck by the unseasonableness of the chorus going off into a jingle when they recall Medea's flight from her fatherland, and her realization of the perjuries of Jason. In the second chorus of the same play strophes and anti-strophes do not correspond, in spite of lines being inserted, out of pure imagination, by way of makeweight; and of the third (a lyric ode deserving better fate—see Met., 824, &c., Ἐριχθίδα τὸ παλαιόν, κ.τ.λ.), the first strophe shall be quoted as a sample of the author's idea of rhythm and lyrical fitness:—

* The Medea, Alceste, and Hippolytus of Euripides. Translated into Blank Verse, with the Chorus in Lyric and other Metres. By the Rev. Henry Williams, B.A., formerly Scholar of Jesus College, Oxford. London: Longmans & Co. 1871

Blest were Erechtheus' offspring in the olden time;
From the gods most blessed sprang their lofty race:
On wisdom faired they pastured of a sacred chime,
Which of warlike ravage bears no lasting trace.

Ever softly moved they 'mid skies of deepest blue,
Where report doth publish that in days of yore,
Harmonia, graced with tresses of a golden hue,
Nine Pierian Muses, chaute in temper, bore.

By dint of freely paraphrasing the epithets ἀπορθήτου and ἀγνός, Mr. Williams has succeeded in making of equal length verses not of equal length in the Greek. But he fails to spin out the anti-strophe to corresponding measurement; and apparently is so convinced of his ill success that he flies off to another metre for the rest of the chorus. A good deal of the fault lies doubtless in an unlyrical ear and a defective perception; but the poorest versifier ought to have had more acquaintance with the rules of his craft than to think that the concluding couplet of strophe β is either rhyme or melody:—

We beseech thee, Medea, by every plea,
To forbear thy offspring beloved to slay.

Can it be possible that for a Cambro-Briton it is a permissible license to regard "plea" as a dissyllable? If so, the rhyme is saved; and really there is some colour given to this supposition by another of Mr. Williams's couplets, in Alcestis, 98-9:—

Before the gate I see no ewer, Containing lustral water pure—

where "pure" must clearly be pronounced "pūr." It would, however, be disingenuous to pretend that the translator allows a false rhyme or a syllable or two too many to stand in his way. We have found "came" rhyming with "dam," and many similar offences to the ear; and as for excess of syllables, we need only give the specimen which follows (Alcest. 125-6):—

Alcestis her escape had made,
And left the darksome seats below,
And pass'd the gloomy gates of Pluto.

It would be waste of time to give more proofs, though they might be culled from the Hippolytus, as well as from the two plays which we have referred to, that Mr. Williams is no more qualified to translate the dramas of Euripides on the score of poetic taste and aptitude than on that of scholarly accuracy. It remains to inquire, has he the requisite amount of tact, and sufficient management of the faculty of translation, applied to level and ordinary passages, to justify his appearance in a field to which he has no other claim of admission? He has no idea of imitating that eminent feature of classical poetry, its avoidance of all waste of words, its peculiar simplicity and chaste perfectness of form; he delights in amplification, and he rushes into the sin of "slipshod" without knowing it. Would any one believe that any taste could tolerate the expansion of two choral lines in the Alcestis (229-30):—

ἄρ' ἄλγῃ καὶ σφαγῇ ταύτῃ, καὶ πλῖον ἢ βροχὴν ἔσθην οὐρανὸν πελίσσαι;

into

Are not the sorrows which befall
This house well worthy suicide?
With inward pain the mind they tell
More than enough to tempt the hand
To tie the cord suspended high
Around the neck with tighten'd band.

What a coil of words about a coil of rope! And if this leaves any doubt as to Mr. Williams's taste, the question may be settled by comparing the lament of Eumelus over his mother (Alcestis, 392-403), as given by Euripides, and as diluted, amplified, and sham-bled through by the translator. Here is the work of the latter:—

Oh! hard is my lot! my mother's departed!
No longer she lives in the light of the sun.
Thy life thou hast left, and me thou'st deserted,
A destitute course in future to run.
Behold, oh, behold, how her eyelash is falling,
And her hands, all unnerced, hang loose on the ground.
Hear me, mother, oh hear me, most earnestly calling,
Thy darling doth bids thee in sorrow profound.

The only Greek words out of which Mr. Williams can have spun the obscure and irrelevant stuff printed in Italics are τῆς βλάβης καὶ παρατόνου χίρας. The one Greek word in the whole strophe which he might and ought to have translated faithfully and exactly—νεοσσός, or "nestling," in the last line—he has missed altogether, and so confirmed our suspicion that his soul is dead to poetry. At all times, if there is a question between taking the first rhyme that comes uppermost and giving a little patient thought to produce another doing more justice to the sense, precipitation gains the day, as when, for instance, having to bring in Charon and his port, he translates νεκρῶν πορθμῆς (Alc. 253), "the steersman of the soul," which is simply nonsense. In like manner, in another chorus, the words Σπάρτα κελεύει ἄνικα Καρνεῖον περιβίσσαι ὥρα μηνός—Alc. 449-50 (i.e. "when the periodic season of the Carneian month comes round")—are rendered by him:—

When the Carneian month in Sparta's paraded
In its annual round—

the passage being made unintelligible simply because "unaided" was the ending of the line before. One more extract from the same chorus, and we have done. The Greek dramatist makes the chorus say of Alcestis:—

τοιαύτας εἴη μοι κύρσαι συνδύας φίλιας ἀλόχον· τὴ γὰρ ἰν βίῳ σπᾶνιον μέρος· ἡ γὰρ ἰμοὶ γ' ἄλυστος δὲ αἰῶνος ἂν ζυγίη.—473-5.

Here is his translator's idea of a meet equivalent:—

Oh! would it were mine to meet such another,
And with such a helpmeet live together!
Such a portion in life 'twere rare to gain;
Sho'd live with me ever and cause not one pain.

After these evidences of the murder of the Medea and of that "strongest, saddest, sweetest song" of Euripides, Alcestis, it is quite unnecessary to examine his treatment of Hippolytus. We shall have done a good work if we have succeeded in convincing Mr. Williams that by him at least Euripides is not likely to be made familiar to English readers.

OUT OF HER SPHERE.

A NOVEL founded on persistent misunderstanding gives the reader an odd feeling of unsubstantiality. It is as if he were set to walk in a world of mist and fog, where "nothing is, but all things seem"; where the rule is that of dreams, not realities; and where things go according to appearance, not according to facts. Of the two methods of telling a story—that which lets the reader into the secret and keeps the characters in the dark, or that which supposes a certain amount of knowledge on the part of the characters, but covers it up rigidly from the reader—the latter is the more interesting. Of the former, the favourite modus operandi is by misunderstandings of all kinds; broken talk that leaves off always just too soon; allusions which mean one thing to the speaker and another to the hearer, of which the reader alone sees both sides, and of which therefore he alone understands the full import; doubtful appearances that have only the semblance of evil, when the author has undertaken the task of making white look like black; sometimes, if the puzzle goes the other way, when evil has to be concealed, and black set in the sunshine so that it looks like white, infamous deeds masked by an appearance of noble candour and engaging innocence, and the evil genius of the book pranking through two volumes and three-quarters as an angel of light with a revelation of soot at the end; important letters that miscarry at the crisis as letters never do miscarry in real life; with all the other tricks and dodges so well known to the craft, and so profoundly tiresome to experienced readers. But whatever the speciality employed, the uniform result of things being made to look what they are not, and the whole action of the plot turning on misunderstandings, is, as we have said, to create a feeling of unsubstantiality on the part of the reader, and to make him both weary and impatient.

Out of Her Sphere is one of these unreal books where every one lives in a fog, and no one sees things as they are. From Mrs. Thornton, who looks bad and is only vulgar, to her servant Charlotte Clare, who poses for a lamb when she is a ravening wolf of more than ordinary ferocity, the story is more or less maya or delusion throughout; even the catastrophe being one thing when it seems to be another, and nothing being real save the death of the deluded. Mrs. Thornton with her large black eyes, her love of pleasure and fine dresses, her inborn actresshood, her capacity for flirting, her want of passion, and her density of perception, has the misfortune to be married to a man at once ascetic and fervid, intensely religious and wildly in love, a man in whose vocabulary imprudences and small sins find no place, life being too earnest to admit of any palliation of evil. As the mistress of a half-furnished, cheerless rectory, the windows of which look for their liveliest prospect on to the abutting churchyard and its mouldering old tombstones, Mrs. Thornton is emphatically out of her sphere; and her husband, as her husband, is as much out of his. She has come as a stranger to St. Hilda, and no one in the neighbourhood, not even her husband, knows that she was formerly on the operatic stage, but has been compelled to seek refuge in conventionality and respectable dullness because her voice has given way; yet the theatrical taint is felt if not understood, and Mrs. Thornton, for all that she is the wife of one of the best regarded persons in the place, finds it hard work to float on the current of social acceptance. For which cause, and being a reasonable woman, not desiring the honours of social ostracism for the sake of indulging in anything like rampant Bohemianism, we hold all the misunderstanding she created by what looked so like a desperate flirtation with Audley Dale, yet was only platonic friendship seasoned with a special confidence, to be a piece of folly of which so clever a woman as she was would scarcely have been guilty. And it is taxing the reader's simplicity a little too severely to ask him to accept her indignation at her husband's very natural suspicions, with her apparent unconsciousness that her extraordinary proceedings could possibly give rise to those suspicions, as in any way like real life. Such a woman as Mrs. Thornton must have known what the world was sure to say, and what such a man as her husband would be sure to think. She might or might not think the game worth the candle, but she would at least understand that the candle had to be burnt. And, though all her motives were pure and kindly throughout, and what appearance of flirting she threw in was merely so much spurious poetry to mask the poverty of the actual prose, still she could not have been ignorant of the effect she was producing, and of the harvest she must reap after sowing her imprudences broadcast as she did. Her manner of carrying on her schemes, too, was unnecessarily compromising, not to say clumsy. Can we conceive of a woman in her senses making an appointment to meet at a ruined fort the man of whom her husband is frantically jealous—a young officer to whom she undeniably “makes eyes,” though she does counsel him to marry her friend—merely to give him three letters which she might just as well have sent by post? And can we credit any man with so much common-sense perception as would enable him to know a hawk from a handsaw, who goes day after day prowling about the house where lives the woman to whom he has committed himself, and of whom he is horribly afraid, for no better reason than to indulge in a platonic flirtation with the mistress, though snubbed by the master, and waylaid and kept up to the collar by the maid? Had Audley Dale had a grain of sense he would have avoided the rectory of St. Hilda with scrupulous care. As it was, he too played his game with the blankest oblivion of the candle involved, though, had he any pretensions to manliness or rationality, his conduct was inexplicable. With all he had at stake—his love for Milly Lisdale, the certainty of his name being coupled with that of Mrs. Thornton in so small and gossiping a place as St. Hilda, and his one burning desire to escape the consequences of his boyish imprudence with Clare—the rectory should surely have been the last place he would have visited, and its master would not have needed to have shown his jealous anger even once, not to speak of half-a-dozen times or more. For Mrs. Eilcoat has made the artistic blunder of continuing the same passion on the same level throughout her story. Out of Her Sphere opens with a scene of jealousy, misunderstanding, and false appearances; and the same kind of action is repeated again and again up to the climax. There is no careful leading up to that climax; no gradual deepening of the colours, or further entanglement of the threads; no well-graduated crescendo passages preparatory to the final burst. It is all on the one string; repetition, not increment or growth. Only when the scene in the fort is reached is another chord struck and a change of phrase obtained. But this continued repetition of motive and manner of action gives a monotonous character to the book that wearies the reader, and leaves on him the impression of both poverty and padding. Nothing is more interesting, if well done, than a psychological novel of careful analysis; but then it must be well done, and it must give the reader the impression of growth. It is destructive of all interest to perceive that the author's own materials are flagging; and the condemnation of the book is pronounced when the technical exigence of “copy” makes itself more felt than the necessary conditions of art.

* Out of Her Sphere. By Mrs. Elliott. Author of "The Curate's Discipline," &c. 3 vols. London: Bentley & Sons.

It is becoming rather a favourite theme with authors to paint a woman essentially pure but undisguisedly Bohemian, set in the midst of Philistine respectability. Of course all the men flirt with her, and all the women hate and think evil of her. Even by the County families, who flirt yet more audaciously than she does, she is tabooed as irregular and impossible to be countenanced; according to the old proverb about horses and hedges, which makes the careless indifference to appearances of the Bohemian a crime, while it allows the county families twice as much license with nothing worse than a deprecatory shrug. Mrs. Eilcoat has brought out this phase of injustice in the difference she draws between the two “mature sirens,” Mrs. Thornton and Mrs. Rushington. Mrs. Thornton, only the wife of the Rector of St. Hilda, and herself an unknown nobody, flirts in all innocence but in all openness, and she is looked at askance in consequence; she dresses in showy colours, and her ribbons are accounted to her as sins; even her black eyes and her way of using them affront the better born who have not the same charms, and it is considered good taste to condemn her as bad. Mrs. Rushington, on the contrary, may do as she likes—and her likings are undeniably questionable—but no one presumes to criticize. It is all the difference between the theatrical taint, which is felt if not understood, coupled with the doubt always hanging about the unknown, and that security of good birth which so marvellously lengthens a woman's tether in country places. So far Mrs. Eilcoat has observed well and reported accurately, though she would have done better to have made more distinction of type between Mrs. Thornton and Mrs. Rushington. As it is, they are rather too close in likeness; which also adds to the sameness of workmanship characteristic of this story.

The best, because the strongest thing in the book, is the character of Harold Thornton; about the worst is that of Audley Dale. As for the rest of the men, they are of the ordinary run of women's men, and singularly unlike the real thing; but in none do we find that wonderful absence of moral manliness, that surprising indifference to the first principles of truth and straightforwardness and all that we mean by honour, which marks the masculine portraits of most women, as in the character of the “first walking gentleman,” Audley. Looking at the thing dispassionately, we are inclined to the belief that Charlotte Clare, the pock-marked, crafty lady's maid, was quite good enough for the Bishop's son; and that Milly Lisdale was cruelly thrown away on such a half-hearted, cowardly, and inconsiderate intriguer as he is represented. We do not quite understand why Mrs. Eilcoat does not do much better than she has hitherto done. She has good ideas of a story, and she evidently draws largely from life; but whether from over-haste, or carelessness, or from that natural incapacity for thorough finish which belongs to some minds, her work fails to satisfy, and the impression it leaves is one of incompleteness. It is so good that it ought to be better; and we cannot help thinking that a little more pains, a little more rigorous self-discipline, would make it better. We are sorry to see in Out of Her Sphere a tendency to hysterical outbursts and sentimental maunderings which serve no good end whatsoever, save the filling up of space. An author would do far better to write a one-volume novel full of pith than dilute and dilate into the dimensions of three. What we want is matter, not bulk; and as soon as padding comes in fire dies out.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

THE illustrious historian Gervinus*, after a long life of honourable popularity acquired by the steady assertion of the liberties of his country, found himself in his latter days on the unpopular side, from his opposition to the measures which have resulted in the practical attainment of German unity. It is not amazing that a veteran politician should be unable to recognise the expediency of a system the reverse of his own, even when the end in view is the same; it is even natural that his aversion should be in proportion to its efficiency. When this consideration is duly allowed for, the temporary eclipse of Gervinus's reputation will pass away. It seems to be considered that this consummation may be hastened by the publication of two posthumous essays, composed in a measure for the purpose of self-defence. Whether calculated to promote this end or not, they are certainly curiosities worthy of preservation. The first is an address to the Emperor of Germany on the occasion of his recent victories, couched in the most dignified strain of philosophic morality, and exhorting him to disdain the intoxication of triumph, to eschew unprincipled rapacity, and to regulate his conduct by the precepts of eternal justice, more particularly in one crucial instance. It will naturally be inferred that this relates to the annexation of French territory—that the philosopher, rising superior to the passions of the hour, has recorded a stern protest against the iniquity of depriving free citizens of their nationality, the disgrace of condescending to the lower moral standard of the conquered enemy, and the impolicy of justifying his conduct by following his example. Not at all; the objects of the historian's sympathy are the dispossessed princelings of Germany, and the duty urged upon the Emperor is that of restoring them to their dominions without delay. To make an indignant and resisting Frenchman a subject of the German Empire is laudable and decorous; to perform a similar operation upon an assenting Hessian is monstrous and disgraceful. This is indeed to strain at a gnat and swallow a camel. The singularity of the second of these posthumous essays consists rather in the form than in the matter. It is a vindication of the author's sagacity and consistency as a politician, in the guise of a letter addressed by himself to himself. It must be concluded that no one else in Germany would undertake the task, and the straightforward simplicity of Gervinus's machinery at least indicates an advance on the method of Southey, who, when he could find nobody alive to concur in his own estimate of his deserts, had recourse to the clumsy expedient of evoking the shade of Sir Thomas More.

The third and concluding volume of Hermann Baumgarten's history of modern Spain† is almost entirely devoted to a narrative of the Carlist war. The intricate history of that sanguinary and inglorious strife is disentangled with industrious skill from the bewildering mass of petty details, for the most part only accessible in Spanish authors. The writer has bestowed particular attention on the manifestoes and other documents proceeding from the Carlist side, which have naturally been hitherto much overlooked. Two leading personages have especially called forth his powers in the delineation of character—the heroic Zumalacarréqui, one of the very few men of genius that Spain has produced for a century—and the dismal, sinister, grotesque, yet not uninteresting figure of Maroto. The singular mixture of motives by which the latter was actuated, and the extraordinary concatenation of circumstances which led to the unexpected termination of the war by the unique Treaty of Bergara, are analysed with much acuteness. Subsequent events are huddled up with extreme rapidity, though ample materials remain for a volume of equal bulk. The author takes leave of Spain with the remark that the problem of her destiny is identical with that of the future of all the Latin nations—whether the Roman Catholic Church will prove capable of reconciling herself with modern ideas; whether her failure to do so will force the peoples that have hitherto professed allegiance to her into the perilous enterprise of constituting a new social bond; or whether she will remain as now, a source of anarchy and perpetual strife until the surviving energy of the race is completely exhausted in a series of sterile conflicts.

* Hinterlassene Schriften. Von G. G. Gervinus. Wien: Braumüller. London: Williams & Norgate.

† Geschichte Spaniens vom Ausbruch der französischen Revolution bis auf unsere Tage. Von H. Baumgarten. Th. 3. Leipzig: Hirzel. London: Williams & Norgate.

Paul Hassel's history of the operations of the Crown Prince of Prussia's troops during the late war*, at which he was present, although not in a military capacity, is a straightforward and very copious narrative, interspersed with intelligent military criticisms which seem to be derived from professional sources. The work is principally based upon the writer's own communications during the campaign to the official Prussian Gazette and other journals, supplemented by details borrowed from other sources of information. It appears on the whole to be as satisfactory a work of its class as we can expect to see at present. General von Wittich's diary† principally relates to the operations around Orleans and Mans during the winter. It is almost exclusively technical.

The name of Theodor Mommsen‡ is a sufficient guarantee for the merit of his manual of Roman civil law, which is the first of a projected series of handbooks of Roman antiquities by him and T. Marquardt, and is designed to replace the well-known work of Becker and the latter. It is intended to consist of three volumes, the first of which is entirely devoted to the organization of the magistracy under the Republic. The style, as befits a handbook, is nervous and condensed; and the object principally aimed at, next to accuracy, appears to be the utmost attainable scientific precision. It is consequently no book for beginners, and can be profitably used only by those whose proficiency in classical literature is already considerable.

A volume on the manners, customs, and popular superstitions of the Tyrol, by Ignaz von Zingerle§, is a welcome contribution to an interesting branch of inquiry. Many of these Tyrolean beliefs, as for instance those regarding the ash-tree, are so singular that they can only be explained as relics of an age when the objects to which they refer were invested with religious sanctity. The compiler finds the traces of the ancient mythology everywhere, even in many instances where a connexion would hardly be suspected. Thus the popular prejudices against red hair is explained by the attribution of this characteristic to the formidable Thor. This interpretation is apparently confirmed by the fact that, in the Tyrol, Thursday, not Friday, is usually the unlucky day par excellence. Not the least valuable part of Herr von Zingerle's book is the preface, which contains a systematic enumeration of the queries which may be most usefully propounded by the collectors of these fast perishing traditions.

The recent regretted death of Adolf Trendelenburg|| imparts additional interest to two volumes of his collected essays, which are also interesting as exhibiting the application of the philosophic intellect to practical subjects. The first volume is principally occupied with essays relating to the history and organization of the kingdom of Prussia. These comprise, among other matter, disquisitions on those writings of Frederick the Great in which the principles of Prussian policy are most distinctly indicated, a sketch of the legal reforms effected by him and his Chancellor, Cocceji, and an account of his contributions towards the final settlement of a code of maritime law applicable to a state of warfare. The harsh and unamiable spirit of exclusively Prussian patriotism breathes through all these compositions, but they are not the less valuable as clear presentations of important features in the successful policy which has welded the disjointed fragments of Germany into a whole. The second volume consists chiefly of academical papers, mostly on legal and educational subjects, but concludes with æsthetic disquisitions on Raffaele's School of Athens, on the Niobe, on the Cathedral of Cologne, and on the principles of Greek philosophy as expressed in Greek art. All are characterized by fulness of information and a sober, nervous, lucid style.

If Professor Trendelenburg was characteristically Prussian, Herr F. Giehne¶ is no less distinctively Austrian. His reflections on the political condition of Austria, on the educational controversy, that great battle-field of the Church and modern thought within her borders, and upon the late war, probably express the sentiments of an average Austrian Catholic with tolerable precision. They may be summed up under two heads—great reluctance to see the Empire dismembered by the logical application of the federal principle, and great perplexity as to how to prevent it.

The specious generalities of M. Renan respecting the essentially monotheistic character of Semitic religion have found too easy a reception among the learned and the unlearned. Their extreme exaggeration was exposed a few years since by Herr Grau in a brilliant little book, to which Herr J. Röntsch* has not very successfully endeavoured to provide a counterpart in an exposition of the ethical and religious characteristics of the Indo-European races. The author is a plain straightforward thinker, who reasons fairly and justly from admitted data, but is too devoid of originality either to discover anything new or to set anything old in a novel light, and the freedom of whose inquiries is much restricted by his adherence to traditional opinions. He has, however, written a sufficiently sound and sensible treatise, from the orthodox point of view, on the characteristics of the Aryan races, regarded as the complement of those of the "chosen people." The most valuable portion of his work is the parallel between the three great epics, the Iliad, the Nibelungen Lied, and the Mahabharata, in which the fundamental unity of ethical sentiment among the three is well brought out. An analysis of the Ramayana would have still further enhanced his deservedly high estimate of the moral qualities of the chief conquerors and colonizers of the earth.

The need of a raison d'être keeps bodies like the Evangelical Alliance† in a condition of feverish activity, which commonly assumes the character of officious meddling, but is occasionally directed to a useful end. We must consider that the Alliance has been well employed in its interference on behalf of the persecuted Protestants of the Baltic provinces of Russia. A shabbier system of persecution cannot be conceived than that adopted by the Russian authorities, even though we should reject the apparently well-authenticated particulars of conversions obtained by fraud, such as alluring the victim to sign a paper in a language with which he is unacquainted, which paper proves to be an abjuration of his creed instead of a petition to retain it. These pages contain ample proof of the existence of gross oppression, of the violation of the most solemn engagements which it involves, of its exclusively political character, missionary zeal not being even affected, and of the deplorable religious and educational condition of the community to which it is sought to compel the Lutherans to conform. We have also a report of the interview between Prince Gortchakoff and the deputation from the Alliance. Some members of the deputation seem to have been more intent on complimenting the Imperial family than on fulfilling the object of their mission, but the question is not one that can be settled by unmeaning speeches on either side.

"The New Era"‡, a collection of philosophical essays by various writers, appears to be in great part intended to propagate the ingenious ideas of F. Krause (1781-1832). Anticipating some more modern speculations on "the colossal man," Krause adopted as the basis of his ethical views the attainment of the greatest possible unity, the nearest conceivable approximation to perfect identity, among the individual members of the human race. This object was to be attained by the constitution of an association of the choicest spirits, who were gradually to absorb the rest. Krause thought that he had discovered the germ of such an association among the Freemasons, which led him to bestow much attention upon their history, and to compose an esteemed work on the subject. Though comparatively obscure and unpopular, his views have never been entirely without adherents. The present collection contains several of his posthumous writings, especially "A Catechism of Faith in Humanity," which embodies the leading principles of his system. From other contributions to its pages, it would appear that the attention of his followers is at present principally engrossed with the reconciliation of metaphysical science with religion, and the abolition of war.

Edmund Montgomery's acute but very abstruse criticism of the Kantian theory of perception§ is a contribution to the empirical side of the argument, designed to establish the origination of the most abstract ideas from experience, and to prepare the way for the resolution of psychology into physiology.

Balthasar Gracian|| was a Spanish writer of the seventeenth century. His "Manual Oracle and Art of Prudence" consists of a series of aphorisms expressed in a proverbial form with true Castilian sententiousness, and expanded, with a view to practical application, with a terse and pithy comment. The spirit of the whole may be inferred from the author's opening observation:—"It takes more to make one wise man nowadays than it did anciently to make seven." Life, according to Gracian, is a state of perpetual warfare, and superior qualities of mind and heart expose their possessor to injuries against which prudence is the only safeguard. It is easy to understand the congeniality of this philosophy

* Von der dritten Armee. Kriegsgeschichtliche Skizzen aus dem Feldzuge von 1870-1871. Von Paul Hassel. Leipzig: Brockhaus. London: Williams & Norgate.

† Aus seinem Tagebuche, 1870-71. Von L. von Wittich. Cassel: Kay. London: Williams & Norgate.

‡ Römisches Staatsrecht. Von Theodor Mommsen. Bd. 1. Leipzig: Hirzel. London: Williams & Norgate.

§ Sitten, Sitten und Meinungen des Tiroler Volkes. Von I. von Zingerle. Innsbruck: Wagner. London: Williams & Norgate.

¶ Seine Schriften. Von A. Trendelenburg. 2 The. Leipzig: Hirzel. London: Williams & Norgate.

|| Sitten und Studien. Von F. Giehne. Würzburg: Stuber. London: Williams & Norgate.

* Ueber Indogermanen und Semiten. Eine völkerverpsychologische Studie. Von J. Röntsch. Leipzig: Hinrichs. London: Williams & Norgate.

† Evangelische Allianz und Russische Diplomatie. Ein Beitrag zur neuesten Geschichte Beider. Von W. von Bock. Berlin: Schneider. London: Williams & Norgate.

‡ Die Neue Zeit. Freie Hefte für vereinte Erhebung der Wissenschaft und des Lebens. Herausgegeben von H. Freiherrn von Looschardt. Prag: Tempky. London: Williams & Norgate.

§ Die Kantische Erkenntnistheorie widerlegt vom Standpunkt der Empirie. Von E. Montgomery. München: Achermann. London: Williams & Norgate.

|| Balthasar Gracian's Hand-Oracle and Kunst der Weltweisheit. Uebersetzt von Arthur Schopenhauer. Leipzig: Hinrichs. London: Williams & Norgate.

for Schopenhauer, with his morose mistrust of his fellow-men on the one hand, and his overweening self-estimate, exasperated by neglect into monomania, on the other. His translation was executed during one of the most comfortable periods of his life, the latter years of his residence at Berlin. It is a masterpiece of condensed vigorous expression, and, in the contact of mind with mind, the worldly prudence of the old Spaniard seems penetrated and illumined with something of the sublime audacity of the system-shattering sage of Frankfurt.

Ferdinand Lotheissen's work on French literature* and society at the period of the Revolution is a lively, and at the same time accurate, review of the literary and social phenomena of the time—the salons, the journals, the theatre, the authors who chiefly influenced their epoch or were the most characteristic representatives of its tendencies. The execution is somewhat slight, and too little care has been bestowed upon the man of letters, such as Mirabeau, whose direct action upon the Revolution was chiefly oratorical or administrative. The writer exhibits a preference for, and is most successful in dealing with, the characteristic qualities of writers who themselves personify some especial phase of the esprit français—the icy brilliancy of Chamfort, the exuberant sentimental enthusiasm of Bernardin de Saint-Pierre, the impassioned serenity of Condorcet, the practical, calculating idealism of Volney.

W. von Lenz† has few particulars of much personal interest to record respecting Liszt and Chopin; his brochure, however, contains a few notes of the opinions of those masters on musical matters, which possess some value in a technical point of view.

Rudolph Genée's‡ "Life of Shakspeare" is a sensible and practical arrangement of the little that is known on the subject, accompanied by an analysis of the dramas, and critical remarks partaking of the sober unambitious spirit of the biography.

"The Professor of Heidelberg," by Otto Müller§, is an exceptionally good novel. The length of the sentences, the prolixity of detail, and the leisurely development of the plot, occasion indeed a certain tedium, but this is redeemed to a considerable extent by the real interest of the story, the variety of the incidents, and the general indications of a culture and knowledge beyond those of ordinary novelists. It is in some degree an historical fiction, the scene being laid in Italy in the sixteenth century. The hero is the German poet Lotichius, who, in accordance with actual fact, is represented as travelling beyond the Alps in the capacity of tutor to some young students. The contrast between German and Italian morals and manners, a favourite subject with the novelists of Germany, is picturesque and well maintained.

Johannes Olaf, by Eliza Wille||, is a remarkably good novel of incident. The scene is laid on an islet in the miniature Frisian Archipelago, and the picturesque features alike of the waste region itself, and of the lonely, homely life of the inhabitants, are described with animation and truth. "At Twilight Hour," by Otilie Wildermuth¶, is a collection of very pretty stories of social life. The authoress possesses both fancy and pathos. The sentimentality of "Erna; or, I have lived and loved"**, is quite in keeping with the title.

Deutsche Blätter†† is a new journal devoted to the discussion of political and theological topics in the spirit of moderate Conservatism. The most interesting paper in the first number is an account of the proceedings of the last ecclesiastical synod in Baden, the debates of which present a miniature reflection of the various controversies and practical problems that at present principally agitate the Church of Germany.

* Literatur und Gesellschaft in Frankreich zur Zeit der Revolution, 1789-1794. Von F. Lotheissen. Wien: Gerold's Sohn. London: Williams & Norgate.

† Die Grossen Pianoforte-Virtuosen unserer Zeit aus persönlicher Bekanntschaft. Von W. von Lenz. Berlin: Behr. London: Nutt.

‡ Shakspeare: sein Leben und seine Werke. Von R. Genée. Hildburghausen: Verlag des Bibliographischen Instituts. London: Nutt.

§ Der Professor von Heidelberg. Ein deutsches Dichterleben aus dem sechzehnten Jahrhundert. Von Otto Müller. 3 Bde. Stuttgart: Kröner. London: Siegle.

|| Johannes Olaf. Roman. Von Eliza Wille. 3 The. Leipzig: Brockhaus. London: Williams & Norgate.

¶ Zur Dämmerstunde. Erzählungen. Von Otilie Wildermuth. Stuttgart: Krabbe. London: Williams & Norgate.

** Erna, oder "Ich habe geliebt und geliebt." Ein Seelengemälde. Von T. S. Braun. Leipzig: Grunow. London: Williams & Norgate.

†† Deutsche Blätter. Eine Monatsschrift für Staat, Kirche und sociales Leben. Herausgegeben von Dr. G. Füllner. Gotha: Perthes. London: Williams & Norgate.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we decline to return rejected communications; and to this rule we can make no exception.

The publication of the SATURDAY REVIEW takes place on Saturday mornings, in time for the early trains, and copies may be obtained in the Country, through any Newsvendor, on the day of publication.

Nearly all the back Numbers of the SATURDAY REVIEW may be obtained through any Bookseller, or of the Publisher, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C., to whom all Communications relating to Advertisements should likewise be addressed.

New ready, VOLUME XXXII., bound in cloth, price 16s. Cloth Cases for Binding all the Volumes, price 2s. each. Also, Reading Cases, price 2s. 6d. each. May be had at the Office, or through any Bookseller.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 835, MARCH 16, 1872:

India. Masini.
Prince Bismarck's Victory. The Ewelme Debate.
France and the Assembly. The Government and the Thames Embankment.
Legislation against the International Society. The Public Health Bill.
The Mepora Inquiry.

The Uses of Tattooing. The Secret Policy of the Vatican.
The Twiss Label Case. An Oriental Roger. The Completion of St. Paul's.
The House Secretary in the Eleventh Century. Protection of Pacific Islanders.
Fires. Faults of Vision in Turner and Mulready.

Du Saulle on Persecution-Madness.
The Life and Reign of Edward I. The Thorough Business Man.
Mrs. Hope's Conversion of the Teutonic Race.
Macdonell's Survey of Political Economy. Williams's Euripides.
Out of Her Sphere. German Literature.

CONTENTS OF No. 834, MARCH 9, 1872:

Prince Bismarck and the School Question—The House of Lords and the Public Business—The Attack on the Education Act—The Tichborne Case—Mr. Goldwin Smith on English Institutions—France—Mr. Lowe and the Income-Tax Deputation—Legal Education.

The Story of the Tichborne Case—Newspaper Decorum—The Catholic Movement in Bavaria—Imperialism Whitewashed—Infant Life Protection—Recruiting—The Debates in the Swiss Sönderath—The Ecclesiastical Courts Bill.

Fremont's Corps in the Late War—History for the Young—Gray's Birds of the West of Scotland—Bala's Papers Humorous and Patriotic—Ratis Having—O'Shaughnessy's Lay of France—Eastlake's Gothic Revival—The Choice of a Dwelling—A Woman's Faith.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LONDON INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, 1872.—SEASON TICKETS now on sale at the Albert Hall Ticket Office, and at the usual Agents. For a Gentleman, 45s. For a Lady, 35s. For a Youth under Fifteen years, 25s.

ELIJAH WALTON'S ENTIRE COLLECTION of OIL and WATER-COLOUR PAINTINGS, now ON VIEW at his GALLERY, 4 Westminster Chambers, Victoria Street, Westminster.—Admission, 1s. Open daily from Ten till Five.

DORE GALLERY.—GUSTAVE DORE, 36 New Bond Street. EXHIBITION of PICTURES including "CHRISTIAN MARTYR," "MONASTERY," "TRIUMPH OF CHRISTIANITY," "FRANCE AND DE RIMINI." Ten to Six. Admission, 1s.

ART-UNION of LONDON.—Subscription, One Guinea.—Every Subscriber receives a Series of EIGHT COAST SCENES, engraved in line, from the Originals by David Cox, Copley Fielding, and Samuel Prout; includes a chance of one of the numerous valuable Prizes; the chief of which is the Life-size Marble Statue, THE WOOD Nymph, for which the sculptor, Mr. Birch, received 2000. The Prints are now ready.

411 W Strand, February 1, 1872.

LEWIS PROCK
EDWARD E. ANTHORPE, Secy.

CHELTEMHAM COLLEGE SCHOLARSHIPS.—Twelve Scholarships, May 1872, viz. Six Junior Scholarships, £40 for Three Years; Two Senior Scholarships, £50 for Three Years; Two Senior and Two Junior, £20 for Two Years.—Full information given by the SECRETARY, The College, Cheltenham.

MARLBOROUGH COLLEGE, March 1872.—THIRTEEN SCHOLARSHIPS, varying in value from £20 to £15 a year, besides a certain number of FREE ADMISSIONS, will be competed for early in June next. These Scholarships are open to Members of the School and others without distinction. Two will be offered for proficiency in Mathematics, and One is limited to Sons of Clergymen. Age of Candidates from Twelve to sixteen. Full particulars may be obtained on application to Mr. SELLICK, the College, Marlborough.

RADLEY.—ST. PETER'S COLLEGE.—TWO ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS of £20 per annum for Four years, open to Boys who were under fourteen on January 1, 1872, will be filled up on April 10.—Apply to the WARDEN or the BURSAR.

TRINITY COLLEGE, Eastbourne.—AN EXAMINATION will be held, on May 5, for TWO SCHOLARSHIPS, worth £20 a year, for Two Years, to a Bursar; open only to Boys not already Pupils of the College.—Address, Rev. J. H. WOOD.

DOVER COLLEGE.—EDUCATION by the SEASIDE. President.—The Right Hon. Earl GRANVILLE, K.G.
Head-Master.—Rev. WM. BELL, M.A., Scholar of Christ College, Cambridge.
Mathematical Master.—W. M. MADDEN, B.A., 17th Wrangler, Scholar of Queen's College, Cambridge.

TERMS.—Tuition Fees, from Ten to Fifteen Guineas per Annum, according to age. No Extras.
Charge for Boarders in Head-Master's Mess, 50s., in addition to School Fee.

DOVER COLLEGE.—The NEXT TERM begins April 11.

THE HARTLEY INSTITUTION, SOUTHAMPTON.—Trustees.—THE CORPORATION of SOUTHAMPTON. Principals.—FRANCIS T. BOND, M.D., B.A. Lond.—In the Department of General Literature and Science, CANDIDATES are prepared for the Indian Engineering College and all other Public Competitive Examinations. In the Department of Engineering and Technical Science, VOCALISTS are trained, both Theoretically and by a Course of Practical Instruction in Laboratories, Workshops, and on Works of actual Construction, for Engineering, Architecture, Surveying, and other Technical Occupations, and for the Engineering Service of India. In the Department of Preliminary Medical Education, STUDENTS receive Instruction in the Elements of Medical Science, with opportunities for Dispensing and Hospital Practice.—For Prospectus, address THE LIBRARIAN. Next Term commences April 10.

FOLKESTONE.—MR. W. J. JEFFRESON, M.A. Oxon (formerly Principal of the Egham High School, Surrey), will continue, with the assistance of a qualified Bursar-Master, to prepare PUPILS for the Universities, Indian Civil Service, West India, and all Competitive Examinations.—Terms and References on application.

FOLKESTONE.—PREPARATION FOR PUBLIC SCHOOLS.
The Rev. A. L. HUSSEY, M.A., Christ Church, Oxford, formerly a Master at Radley College, will REMOVE at Easter with his Pupils to a large house at FOLKESTONE, where he can receive more Boys.—Present Address, Peterley, Great Misenden, Bucks.

AT ILKLEY.—MR. ALGERNON FOGGO, M.A., of Christ's College, Cambridge, late Head-Master of the Bradford High School, will take TWELVE PRIVATE PUPILS, Boarders, to prepare for the Public Schools.—Address, Moorlands, Ilkley, Yorkshire.

MR. A. D. CLARKE (B.A. Cambridge) and Mr. A. M. LIPCOMB (B.A. Oxon) receive RESIDENT and NON-RESIDENT PUPILS for the various Competitive Examinations, and for the Universities. During the last three years Pupils have been prepared for the following Examinations:—Oxford (Final Schools and Matriculation), Cambridge (B.A. Exam. and Matriculation), Indian Telegraph Service, Engineering College, and Woods and Forests; Woolwich, Direct Commission, Diplomatic Service, British Museum, Institute of Actuaries, Preliminary Law and Medicine.—For Terms, References, &c., apply to Mr. A. D. CLARKE, 30 Torrington Square, W.C., or to Mr. A. M. LIPCOMB, 51 Bernard Street, Russell Square, W.C.

EDUCATION IN GERMANY.—For Prospectuses and Information respecting the SCHOOL for YOUNG GENTLEMEN, conducted by Professor HIRSCH, of Cassel, near Stuttgart (recommended by Dr. Norman Wilson, one of Her Majesty's Chaplains), apply to F. HODGKIN, Esq., 101 Pall Mall, London, E.C., who will arrange for interviews with Professor Hirsch, when he is in London, in April, to meet pupils.

OXFORD.—A PHYSICIAN and M.A. will receive PUPILS (Members of University or otherwise) requiring special care.—Address, J. B., Post Office, 407 Strand.

LESSONS IN HINDUSTANI given by a GENTLEMAN.
Good testimonials.—Apply, A., care of Mr. Williams, 4 Craven Road, Westbourne Terrace.

HINDUSTANI.—An INDIAN OFFICER on Furlough wishes to READ HINDUSTANI in London and Brighton with Candidates for Indian Staff Corps, Civil Service, &c. He is a passed Interpreter, was Interpreter of his Regiment for nearly five years, and at several times, Honorary Examining Committee. Terms very moderate.—Address, Capt. W., care of Mr. Wakeling, the Royal Library, Brighton.

HOME for INVALIDS or PERSONS INDISPOSED for HOUSEKEEPING.—A MARRIED PHYSICIAN, without Family, resident in a fashionable inland town, is able to receive an INVALID LADY or GENTLEMAN, suffering from Rheumatic, Spinal, or Nervous Affections, or requiring Medical Supervision, but not insane. A large detached house and gardens, with every accommodation, including a Private Suite of Apartments, with separate servants, and Carriages if required. The entire arrangements would be on a liberal scale, and a corresponding remuneration expected. No other care received at same time.—Address, M.D., C. W. Catell, Esq., Solicitor, 40 Bedford Row, W.C.

AN ASSISTANT CLASSICAL MASTER will be required after Easter in a PREPARATORY SCHOOL for Eton, Winchester, &c.—Apply, with particulars, to Rev. E. ST. JOHN PARRY, Tudor House, Durham Down, Bristol.
March 15, 1872.

ESTABLISHED 1869.
PRINCIPALS of SCHOOLS and COLLEGES wishing to increase the number of their PUPILS should Advertise in the leading BRITISH and FOREIGN JOURNALS, at a special rate, by T. H. BRIDGMAN, Educational Advertising Agent, 14 Red Lion Court, Fleet Street, London, E.C.
References permitted to many eminent Educationalists.

THE CONSERVATIVE LAND SOCIETY (enrolled under 6 and 7 Wm IV., cap 32, as the Conservative Benefit Building Society, co-operating with the United Land Company, Limited).
The TWENTY-FIFTH YEAR's Investment for Capital and Savings, Share and Deposit Departments for Building and House for Sale. Present rate of Interest 5 per cent. per annum on Shares, with participation of Profits above that rate, and 4 per cent. on the Deposit Department. No Partnership Liability. Prompt Withdrawals when required. Prospective free to any part of the World.
Secretary: CHARLES LEWIS GRUNSEIN.
Office: 33 Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

CANCER HOSPITAL, Brompton, and 107 Piccadilly, London.
Office, 107 Piccadilly opposite Bond Street.
The following FORM of LEGACY is respectfully recommended:
"I give and bequeath unto the Treasurer for the time being of the Cancer Hospital, situate in the Fulham Road, Brompton, Middlesex, and at 107 Piccadilly, the sum of £ (free of legacy duty), to be paid out of my personal estate, not charged on land, to be applied towards carrying on the charitable designs of the said Institution."

HYDROPATHY.—SUDBROOK PARK, Richmond Hill.
Physician, Dr. EDWARD LANE, M.A., M.D. Edin., Turkish Baths on the Premises. Private entrance into Richmond Park. Prospection on application.

BRIGHTON.—BEDFORD HOTEL.—Every endeavour is made to render this Hotel equal to its long-existing repute. Spacious Coffee Room for Ladies and Gentlemen, Sea-Water Service in the Hotel.—Communications to The Manager, Bedford Hotel Company, Limited.

WELBY PUGN'S GOTHIC FURNITURE.—Furniture similar to that supplied to the Granville Hotel, from the designs of F. Welby Pugin, Esq., can be obtained on application to the Manager of the South-Eastern Works, St. Lawrence, Isle of Thanet.
N.B.—Estimates given for furnishing houses complete in the Gothic style.

WANTED TO PURCHASE some OLD ARTIFICIAL TEETH. Persons having the above to SELL can forward them by post or otherwise, and their value will be sent per return.—Address, Mr. E. BROWN, Dentist, 5 Chisworth Street, Paddington, London.

HORSE.—Powerful BROUGHAM HORSE WANTED, for Trade use.—Address, W. J. H., 6 Canonbury Grove, London, N.

RODRIGUES' MONOGRAMS, ARMS, CRESTS, and ADDRESSES Designed and Steel Dies Engraved as Gifts.
RAISED, RUBBER, GILT, and ENAMELED MONOGRAMS artistically designed for any combination of Letters. NOTE PAPER and ENVELOPES stamped in Colour, Relief, and brilliantly illuminated in Gold, Silver, and Colours in the highest style of Art. CARD-PLATE elegantly engraved and 100 Superfine Cards printed for it, &c.
At HENRY RODRIGUES', 42 PICCADILLY, LONDON.

MECH'S WEDDING PRESENTS consist of DRESSING CASES, Dressing Bags, Work Boxes and Bags, Writing Cases, Jewel Cases, Medical-mounted Writing Table Sets in wood and gilt, Albums, Paper-mache Tea Trays, Caskets, and Caddies, Portable Writing Cases, and Despatch Boxes; also an infinite variety of Novelties to choose from. 119 Regent Street, W. Catalogue post free. Mr. MECH or his Son attends personally daily.

"They come as a lion and a blessing to men,
The Pickwick, the Owl, and the Waverley Pen."
1,000 NEWSPAPERS recommend them. For their names see "Graphic," January 15, 1872.—The Sun says: "The Phœton Pen creates both wonder and delight."—Sold by every Stationer in the World. Sample box by post, 1s. 1d. MACNIVEN & CAMERON, 25 Blair Street, Edinburgh.

THE ASTRONOMER-ROYAL Reported to the Admiralty (August 13, 1870), on 40 Chronometers entered for annual competition, "M. F. DENT'S is the finest we have ever had on trial."—M. F. DENT, Chronometer, Watch, and Clock Maker to the Queen, 35 CANNON STREET, CHANCERY CROSS.

SPECIAL MACHINE-MADE PRODUCTIONS.
18-CARAT GOLD and GEM JEWELLERY.
ENGLISH LEVER WATCHES and CLOCKS.
Quality of Gold guaranteed on the Invoice.
Each Article marked in Plain Figures.
Illustrated Catalogue and Price List post-free for Two Shillings.

MR. STREETER, 37 CONDUIT STREET, BOND STREET, W.
MR. STREETER, JEWELLER and DIAMOND MERCHANT, 37 CONDUIT STREET, BOND STREET, LONDON, W.
BURLINGTON STEAM WORKS, SAVILE ROW.

E. DENT & CO., 61 Strand, and 34 Royal Exchange, London. WATCH, CLOCK, and CHRONOMETER MAKERS to Her Majesty, H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, and H.R.M. the Empress of Russia and Masters of the Great Clock in the Houses of Parliament.

MESSRS. DAY & CO., of 9 Great Winchester Street, London, and Commercial Buildings, Manchester, are authorized to invite Subscriptions for the remaining Shares in the

ENGLAND AND PENINSULAR SILVER LEAD MINING COMPANY, Limited.
CAPITAL £20,000 IN 4,000 SHARES OF £5 EACH.

Directors.

Sir E. PEARSON, F.R.S., Wimbledon.

WALTER L. ROGERS, Esq., 3 Brick Court, Temple.

ISAAC ABRAHAM, Esq., 51 Mortimer Street, Cavendish Square.

JOHN EMANUEL, Esq., 77 Warwick Road, Malda Vale.

W. H. MOLLETT, Esq., Finner's Hall, and the Baltic.

THE NATIONAL PROVINCIAL BANK OF ENGLAND, Bishopsgate Street, E.C., and all its Branches.

Messrs. DAY & CO. offer the remaining Shares in this Mine to the Public, with the following guarantee of its worth, viz.:—
That the Reports of Independent Inspectors acting in the interest of a Committee of proposed Shareholders having no connexion with vendors or promoters, as is unfortunately too often the case, have induced the Committee to subscribe part of the capital and the Directors appointed by them to associate their names with the undertaking.
Messrs. DAY & CO. believe that wisdom has a mine been offered so cheaply in which the chances of immense Profits have been so great, whilst immediate large Returns are apparently a matter of certainty.
Any intending Investor may have an order to inspect the Property. Full particulars, with Reports of Messrs. J. H. HITCHINS, Assistant FRANCIS, THOMAS L. COTTINGHAM, and E. W. C. F. HENRIOT, may be obtained at either of the above Offices, and will be forwarded on application.

THE AGRA BANK, Limited.—Established in 1838.
CAPITAL, £1,000,000.

HEAD OFFICE.—NICHOLAS LANE, LOMBARD STREET, LONDON.

Branches.
Messrs. GLYN, MILLS, CURRIE, & CO., the NATIONAL BANK OF SCOTLAND, and the BANK OF ENGLAND.

BRANCHES in Edinburgh, Calcutta, Bombay, Madras, Karachi, Agra, Lahore, Shanghai, Hong Kong.

Current Accounts are kept at the Head Office on the Terms customary with London Bankers, and Interest allowed when the Credit Balance does not fall below £100.

Deposits received for fixed periods will be received on terms to be agreed upon.

At 5 per cent. per annum, subject to 12 months' Notice of Withdrawal.

For shorter periods Deposits will be received on terms to be agreed upon.

Bills issued at the current exchange of the day on any of the Branches of the Bank, free of extra charge, and Approved Bills purchased or sent for collection.

Sales and Purchases effected in British and Foreign Securities, in East India Stock and Loans, and the safe custody of the same undertaken.

Interest drawn, and Army, Navy, and Civil Pay and Pensions realized.

Every other description of Banking Business and Money Agency, British and Indian, transacted.

J. THOMSON, Chairman.

EAGLE INSURANCE COMPANY.
Established 1807. (For Lives only.)
79 PALL MALL, LONDON.

Premiums . . . . . £255,515
Invested Funds . . . . . £2,575,755
Interest and Dividends (being £1 10s. 0d. per cent.) . . . . . £127,751

FURTHER SECURITY.—A Subscribed Capital of more than £1,500,000. The Expenses of Management are under 1 per cent. A Division of Profits will be made after June 30 next.

GEORGE HUMPHREYS, Actuary and Secretary.

UNIVERSITY LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY,
79 PALL MALL, LONDON, S.W.

Amount of Capital originally subscribed, £500,000, on which has been paid up . . . £250,000

Amount accumulated from Premiums . . . . . £225,000

Annual Income . . . . . £60,000

Amount to Policies in force, and outstanding Additions, upwards of . . . £2,800,000

Addition of Policies at the Ninth Division of Profits, 2½ per cent. per annum.

The Tenth Quinquennial Division of Profits, June 1871.

CHARLES McCABE, Secretary.

PHOENIX FIRE OFFICE,
LOMBARD STREET AND CHANCERY CROSS, LONDON.—ESTABLISHED 1792.

Promot and liberal Loss Settlements.

Insurances effected in all parts of the World.

GEO. W. LOVELL, Secretary.

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.
Established 1803.

101 D BROAD STREET, E.C., and 16 and 17 PALL MALL, S.W.

CAPITAL, £1,500,000. PAID UP AND INVESTED, £700,000.

THE SCOTTISH NATIONAL INSURANCE COMPANY.

Chairman.—EDWARD S. GORDON, Esq., Q.C., M.P.

THE THIRTIETH ANNUAL REPORT AND ACCOUNTS, with Form of Proposal, Rates, &c., may be had on application.

JOHN M. McCANDLISH, Manager.

WILLIAM PORTEOUS, Secretary in London.

EDINBURGH.—22 ST. ANDREW SQUARE.

LONDON.—3 KING WILLIAM STREET, E.C.

DEATH or INJURY from ACCIDENT, with the consequent LOSS of TIME and MONEY, provided for by a Policy of the RAILWAY PASSENGERS' ASSURANCE COMPANY.

Against Accidents of all kinds.

An Annual Payment of £5 to £50 insures £1,000 at Death, or an allowance at the rate of £5 per Week for Injury.

OFFICE: 101 CORNHILL and 10 REGENT STREET.

WILLIAM J. VIAN, Secretary.

DEBENTURES at 5, 5½, and 6 PER CENT.—CEYLON COMPANY, Limited.

The Directors are prepared to issue DEBENTURES, to replace others falling due, viz. for One Year, at 5 per cent.; for Three Years, at 5½ per cent.; and for Five Years, at 6 per cent. per annum; also for longer periods, on Terms to be ascertained at the Office of the Company.

R. A. CAMERON, Secretary.

Palmerston Buildings, Old Broad Street, E.C.

TO CAPITALISTS and INVESTORS.
DIVIDENDS 5 and 10 to 20 PER CENT.
Read SHARP'S INVESTMENT CIRCULAR (post free).

The MARCH Number ready.

CAPITALISTS, SHAREHOLDERS, INVESTORS, TRUSTEES, will find the above Investment Circular a most valuable and reliable Guide.

Messrs. SHARP & CO., Stock and Share Brokers, 25 Fenchurch Lane, London, E.C. (Established 1802.)

IMPORTANT to INVESTORS in BRITISH and FOREIGN MINES, RAILWAY STOCKS, and other SPECULATIONS of all descriptions. Dividends at the rate of 5, 10, and 15 per cent. Consult Mr. JOHN A. BRYCE'S SPECIAL LIST of INVESTMENTS, sent free by post on application to JOHN A. BRYCE, Stock and Share Dealer, 70 and 71 Abchurch Lane, London, E.C. (Established 1802.)

of Canada, Middlesex, and Southern Counties, and in the County of Kent, as well as those transferred to the rich Mining District of St. Agnes, Cornwall, should by all means have a copy of this Circular.

THE

SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 856, Vol. 33.

March 23, 1872.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

THE ALABAMA QUESTION.

THE Government exercised, as had been expected, a sound discretion in declining to produce the incomplete American correspondence. The questions asked by Mr. DISRAELI and Mr. HORSMAN were intended as a warning that Parliament has more confidence in the good intentions of Mr. GLADSTONE and his colleagues than in their diplomatic adroitness. Mr. GLADSTONE'S assurance that any change of policy will be communicated to Parliament seems to imply that the Government adheres to its own interpretation of the Treaty; but in that case the answer to Mr. Fish's despatch can have been little but a courteous formality. The main results of previous negotiations has unfortunately passed beyond the stage of anxiety and doubt. There is a fatal discrepancy of opinion or of policy between the two Governments; and the time appointed for the commencement of proceedings at Geneva will have been reached before another communication can have been received from Washington. The cumbrous constitutional arrangement which disables the Executive Government of the United States from making any binding arrangements with foreign Powers proved fatal to the REVERDY JOHNSON Convention; and probably it will serve as a pretext for declining any concession of the point in dispute; yet it must be remembered that the rupture of the Treaty will have been exclusively caused by the acts of the PRESIDENT and his Cabinet. Having ratified the Treaty, the Senate had finally discharged its functions, nor could it have exercised any control over the composition of the American Case. It has been too hastily assumed that General GRANT and Mr. Fish have been hampered or influenced in their recent deliberations by a consciousness that the course which they might adopt would be subject to the revision of the Senate. On the contrary, it would have been competent to the PRESIDENT at his discretion to modify the Case in such a manner as to remove all objection on the part of England. Some of the soundest politicians and best jurists in the United States have expressed the opinion that the English interpretation of the Treaty and the English version of the preliminary discussions are substantially correct; and the supporters of the American Government have, with few exceptions, admitted that the demand for some hundreds of millions was absurd and scarcely serious. It is not known that any American has recommended the simple course of withdrawing an unjust or an insincere pretension; and there can be no doubt that the PRESIDENT is sustained by popular opinion in his determination to maintain a demand which was perhaps in the first instance incautiously advanced. It is not likely that the question of responsibility will at any time be raised between the Executive Government and the Senate. If the matter had been referred to the Senate, the decision of the PRESIDENT would have been confirmed; but the Case and the refusal to alter the Case proceed exclusively from the Cabinet. Some American journals endeavoured to justify the conduct of their Government by referring to Mr. GLADSTONE'S strong expressions of opinion on the construction of the Treaty. The violent and discourteous language of the Case, consistently maintained through a volume of five hundred pages, has never provoked disapproval in the United States.

The suggestion that the meaning of the Treaty should be submitted to the arbitration of the Geneva Tribunal was equivalent to a proposal that the English objection should be withdrawn. If the reference had proceeded in the ordinary course, it would have been in the power of the English counsel at any time to raise a plea as to the jurisdiction. It was in such a form that the arbitrators at Washington lately considered and rejected the claim of the Confederate holders of cotton bonds; and the Geneva Tribunal might probably have sustained the objection to the consideration of the indirect claims; but if the contention of the American agents had been successful, the scope of the reference would have been unduly extended. It would be discourteous to the American Government to assume that it authorised its agents to prefer a claim which it knew to be not only baseless, but extraneous to the Treaty. When Mr. Fish suggests that the Tribunal shall decide the preliminary issue of jurisdiction, he must be supposed to think it possible that a decision would be given in his favour. An agreement to refer the question whether a certain subject-matter shall be included in a reference is itself a reference of the substantial point in dispute. The English nation would never have consented to allow any arbitrator to determine whether a monstrous and preposterous claim for the expenses of a civil war in a foreign country should be submitted to arbitration. The offer to limit the maximum amount of damages, if it has really been made directly or indirectly by the American Government, would in no degree meet the objection, although the offer of a receipt in full on the contingent payment of four or five millions would conclusively prove the unfairness of demanding in a formal Case a hundred times the amount. If England had been even in the smallest degree responsible for the prolongation of the war, the liability would not have been represented by a trifling sum. It is absolutely necessary to repudiate, independently of the amount involved in any demand, claims which might hereafter be drawn into a fatal precedent. As a Belgian writer has lately remarked, the admission of the American demand might encourage ruinous exactions on the part of any powerful belligerent against a petty State. As the proposal is on all grounds inadmissible, it is almost unnecessary to observe that a proposed limitation of damages would, unless it had been clearly expressed, have probably caused fresh misunderstanding. The Commissioners, the whole English nation, and nine-tenths of the American people, implicitly believed that hostile feeling had been finally appeased by the English apology, and by the large concessions involved in the Treaty; yet all the time Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS, who had been Secretary of the Commission, was composing an inflammatory denunciation of successive English Governments, and his colleagues and superiors approved of the attempt to earn domestic popularity at the expense of international courtesy and good feeling. It is at least possible that, if the English Government had been induced by vague professions of moderation to enter on the reference, the bitterness and the extortionate spirit displayed in the Case would have been once more exhibited by the American counsel.

It has lately been the fashion to protest against any further discussion of the substantial merits of a controversy which will evidently not be settled by agreement; but in most disputes there is a right and wrong; and it is scarcely fair that the party who is wholly blameless should voluntarily place himself on the level of his adversary. It is perfectly true that the discussion cannot profitably continue for ever; but while public attention is fixed on the failure of the Treaty, it is expedient to remember that England has been unwillingly forced to abandon the hope of a friendly arbitration and a final award. The Americans have lately spoken with complacency of their own temperate language, and of the general absence of excitement; but the document which has caused the whole mischief was conspicuously intemperate, and not the smallest provocation has at any time during the controversy been offered to the American Government or nation. The strong feeling which was caused in England by the publication of the American Case was not disproportionate to the occasion; but the question has been exclusively discussed on its merits, sometimes with even an unreasonable assumption of candour. No serious attempt has been made by American writers to answer the conclusive arguments which have been founded on the construction of the two phrases of "Alabama claims" and of "an amicable settlement." The indirect demands were to be abandoned in the event, not of a particular form of amicable settlement, but of an amicable settlement in general, and shortly afterwards the Treaty itself was formally described as an amicable settlement. The definition of the claims "generically known as the Alabama claims" is still more conclusive. No claims for indirect damages had at any time been preferred by the United States, while the direct claims of private citizens were from the time of Mr. SEWARD downwards generically known as the Alabama claims. Mr. SUMNER, who invented the indirect demands, preferred them in his notorious speech as consequences, not only of the depredations of the cruisers, but also of the alleged unfriendliness of the English Government, as shown in the recognition of Confederate belligerency, and in other acts throughout the whole course of the war. Mr. SUMNER's speech, delivered in Secret Session, was only published by the special permission of the Senate, and even if it had asserted any Alabama claims, it could not have been officially brought to the notice of the English Government. The demand has never been reproduced in any public document before the publication of the recent Case, except in Mr. FISH's despatch to Mr. MOTLEY, in which the SECRETARY OF STATE expressly declared that he preferred no claim of any kind. It is absurd to attribute to the Commissioners the impropriety of describing as known claims, claims which were diplomatically unknown to both parties to the Treaty.

It is not known whether the English Government has taken the precaution of preparing a counter case to be used in the improbable contingency of a settlement of the preliminary differences. If such a document should by some unforeseen accident be required, it will probably have been framed in the lawyer-like and dispassionate tone of the original English Case. It would be undignified and indiscreet to reciprocate the passionate rudeness of the American agents; nor is the temptation to recriminate likely to affect the minds of English lawyers. It will be necessary to avoid any notice of those parts of the American Case which relate to matters not within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. An argument, however conclusive in answer to an irrelevant claim, might by astute opponents be construed into an admission that it was material. In fact the original English Case is, like Lord RUSSELL's letters to Mr. ADAMS, almost too forcible in its demonstration of the groundlessness of the American demands. It would scarcely be desirable, after all the concessions which were made at Washington, to irritate the American people by a complete disappointment of their expectations. A belief in the justice of the demand for consequential damages was probably confined to the followers of Mr. SUMNER and to other inveterate enemies of England, but there is no doubt that the entire nation, not having studied international jurisprudence, is convinced that the direct claims on account of the Alabama, and perhaps of one or two other vessels, were morally or legally just. No Englishman would have been disappointed if the less unreasonable expectations of the American people had been satisfied by the decision of the Tribunal. It is the fault of the Government of the United States that the whole transaction has, against its own wish, been rendered abortive.

THE HISTORY OF THE PARIS INSURRECTION.

EXACTLY a year has passed away since a knot of obscure men found themselves by a great chance, and to their own infinite surprise, the absolute masters not only of Paris, but of all the forts of Paris except Valerien, of 2,000 cannon, 450,000 muskets, innumerable stores, and 260,000 armed men, who, if they had not learnt to fight, had at least learnt to ramble about with a gun in their hands for fifteenpence a day. For more than two months these obscure men, or such as they, had Paris at their mercy. After they were subdued, Frenchmen were naturally very anxious to know how so strange and monstrous a thing could have happened, and an elaborate inquiry was instituted by order of the Assembly into the history of the insurrection. Three volumes have been issued by the Committee of Inquiry, and the volume containing the evidence on which the Report was founded is one of the most instructive and entertaining public documents of modern times. M. THIERS, Marshal MACMAHON, General VINOT, General D'AURELLE, JULES FAVRE, PICARD, FERRY, several Mayors, successive Prefects of Police, and a host of minor persons gave their evidence, and although they in some measure contradicted each other, the witnesses furnished quite enough materials to enable the reader to deduce a tolerably clear notion how it was that the insurrection succeeded. It was indeed the fruit, the inevitable fruit, of the siege. M. JULES FAVRE declares that he always thought the fortifications of Paris a mistake, because no military advantage which they might secure could compensate for the evil effect of shutting up two millions of persons in a state of famine, excitement, and exhaustion. Every single person, high or low, who had anything to do with the Government of Paris from the 4th of September to the 18th of March declared that he had been from the first sure that a crisis must come sooner or later. The Jacobins, the Communists, the International, had all something to do with the insurrection; but it was the siege that really produced it. The National Guard under the Empire had a nominal strength of about 60,000 men; but it had never been trained, and had no organization. When the Prussians drew near it was suddenly determined that this faint, incoherent body should receive an indefinite expansion. Twenty-five thousand gaol-birds were admitted into its ranks. Arms were distributed to all who liked. Those who were the most audacious elected themselves commanders. But at first the front ranks of the force were filled by men of station, character, and enthusiasm, who really fought hard when permitted, were zealous in their duties, and kept down the rascals. But by degrees the worst elements began to attain the mastery. It is true that order was outwardly maintained until the capitulation, but the seeds of evil had been sown. A fatal separation had grown up between the respectable men who did their duty and fought for their country and the unrespectable men who liked being fed without working and being soldiers without fighting. Not that these latter were cowards, but they had peculiar views of what was due to themselves. They manufactured bombs secretly, they announced that they had other enemies nearer home than the Prussians, they denounced the Government of National Defence as the blackest of traitors. On the 31st of October these men, enraged by the news of the fall of Metz, attempted to overthrow the Government, and very nearly succeeded. But they were put down for the moment by the partisans of order, although the Government was terribly weakened by the contest. Some of its members had undoubtedly made, in some very unofficial way, a bargain that no great harm should happen to the insurgents. There was, however, a section of the Government which wished to show firmness, and a large number of the leaders of the insurrection were arrested. But the Government was afraid to treat them as guilty. It discharged those who had friends; it kept in prison, but did not bring to judgment, those who were judged more dangerous. There were many men of courage and sense in positions of some authority, but they were not backed up; and General TROCHU was as unsuited a man to his position as could have been found for the place. As one witness epigrammatically put it, he had just the wrong belief for Paris; he did believe in God, and he did not believe in the possibility of resisting the Prussians. He was pious, but he was a failure, and was conscious that he was a failure. When the fatal end came he was the most unpopular man in Paris; and when his reign came to a close, all government of every sort was hated and despised.

After the negotiations for the armistice had been commenced in the last week of January, the question was keenly debated whether the National Guard should be disarmed or not. M. JULES FAVRE on one occasion begged pardon of God and man for not having agreed that the Guard should be disarmed. But when he appeared before the Committee, he had to own that this was a mere flower of rhetoric. The truth was that it was entirely impossible for the authorities in Paris to disarm the National Guard. Prince BISMARCK insisted that only 12,000 troops should retain their arms. These troops had to devote all their energies to keeping the city tolerably quiet while the Germans entered, and could not possibly have disarmed a quarter of a million of National Guards. It is not true that Prince BISMARCK offered to disarm the National Guards. He did not wish to mix himself up with a difficult and dangerous business. What he did say was, that he thought he knew how to disarm them if it was necessary. His plan was simply to break off the negotiations, continue to starve Paris, which was then at its last extremities, and order the German troops to give a piece of bread to every Frenchman who brought him a gun. This was probably neither said nor taken seriously. It was merely a mode of expressing the thought that it was a very difficult matter to disarm the Guard, which was spread through the city, and could not be got at without much risk. The entry of the Germans was the signal for the seizing of the cannon, which was at first done without any sinister design; but then, when the disaffected found what strength this incident had given them, they would never let the cannon be restored, although they affected to enter into arrangements with the Government for giving them up. During the six weeks that intervened between the ratification of peace and the 18th of March Paris was drifting faster into anarchy day by day. General CLÉMENT THOMAS resigned the commandship of the National Guard, as he despaired of being able to keep up the semblance of authority. General D'AURELLE was appointed to the post, but when he attempted to get his force into something like order, he found that his chiefs of battalions obeyed some secret authority and disregarded his orders. The moment peace was signed, the mass of regular troops, marines, Mobiles, and so forth, who had formed the Paris army, claimed to be sent home. The Germans permitted the number of troops kept with arms in Paris to be raised to 40,000; but there was not a sufficient number to be got, and those that were sent as reinforcements were utterly untrustworthy. The orderly part of the National Guard, and the best friends of the Government, took immediate advantage of the raising of the siege, and some 60,000 of them, according to the calculation of M. THIERS, were thus absent when the time of trial came. The soldiers were either bullied or seduced by the mob, and the agents of police run about in terror, pursued by those whom they had been sent to pursue. At length it was agreed to take, at all risks, some steps to terminate a state of things so disgraceful and so dangerous. On March 20 the Assembly was to meet at Versailles, and in order that the Government might not seem to have entirely forfeited its position, it determined that a bold attempt should be made on the early morning of the 18th to carry off the cannon from the heights of Montmartre.

The attempt failed, and unfortunately it was conducted by a man who never had the slightest hope of its success. General VINOT obeyed orders, but he thought the orders he obeyed were the orders of madmen. Two hours, as is well known, elapsed after the troops had got possession of the cannon before any horses arrived to take them away. General VINOT asserts that if the horses had been there they could not have been of any use, as the cannon had to be dismounted before they could be dragged off; if they had been carried off, they would have taken so long to get through the streets that the populace would have easily stopped them on the way; if these cannon had been removed, there were as many more in Belleville and Père la Chaise; if Montmartre had lost its cannon, it could easily have replaced them from the ramparts. These are only the excuses of a man who was sent on an errand which he did not fancy; and General LE FLO, the Minister of War, did not hesitate to declare that the blame of the failure lay at the door of General VINOT. A few hours afterwards, however, General VINOT rendered a service to France which may well outweigh all his shortcomings. M. THIERS gave positive orders that the army should retire to Versailles, and that all the forts should be abandoned. He made no exception, and on Sunday the 19th, when he was earnestly pressed to retain Valérien, he stoutly refused. At one in the morning, between Sunday and Monday, General VINOT made his way into the bedroom of M. THIERS, and did not leave until he got an order for the re-occupation of Valérien. Had this not been done, the Assembly and the tiny army of Versailles and the Government would all have been at the mercy of the insurgents. By so narrow an accident, and in spite of the man on whom his hopes of safety rested, was France spared from a catastrophe which would have increased tenfold the dangers that flowed from the abandonment of Paris. Fortunately the leaders of the insurrection were not in the least prepared for their own success. They were stunned and stupefied by the luck that had befallen them. The insurrection was not under any guidance. The Jacobins, the Communists, and the International successively contributed the elements of something like an authority; but there had been no previous preparation for the action necessary under the circumstances that actually occurred. General TROCHU and Admiral SAISSSET firmly believed, and probably still believe, that the devilry of BISMARCK was at the bottom of the whole affair, and that the anarchy of Paris was skilfully contrived by the lavish use of German gold. But M. THIERS and M. JULES FAVRE decided such wild theories, and found quite enough in the madness of the siege, in the hatred of classes, the cessation of labour, and the demoralization of the soldiers to account for what had happened. The general conclusion to which the evidence points is, that the insurrection, and its wonderful, if temporary, triumph, were mainly due to these causes, and that the action of the more violent demagogues and of the Secret Societies was only a secondary cause. That the wrath of the defeated Communists and the operations of the International may be for a long time to come a source of apprehension to every French Government is highly probable; but the circumstances under which the insurrection of the 18th of March assumed such gigantic proportions can never, in all likelihood, occur again.

SIR CHARLES DILKE'S MOTION.

THE proceedings of the House of Commons on Tuesday last have in one sense afforded Sir C. DILKE an undeserved and unexpected triumph. Under the Monarchy which he has assailed, the Government is really administered by an Assembly which has often contrasted its own calm and dignified demeanour with the upstart bodies which have in foreign countries been formed after its pattern. English critics habitually ridicule with injudicious freedom of speech the disorderly episodes which occur from time to time in the debates at Versailles; but it is not recorded that either the most bigoted Legitimists or the wildest Republicans are in the habit of enlivening their discussions by imitating the crowing of cocks. It was right and natural that Sir C. DILKE's motion should, in remembrance of his speeches at Newcastle and other places, be received with marked disfavour; and it was for the House to decide whether the Ministers should be required to answer his statements, or encouraged to refuse all inquiry as unnecessary and indecorous. In either case the division which eventually occurred would have operated as a significant rebuke to a presumptuous agitator. It is a subject for regret that the ill-judged levity and rudeness of a certain number of members should, not indeed have justified Sir C. DILKE, but have placed the House in the wrong. On such occasions it is unfortunately in the power of a few young and inconsiderate persons to discredit the Assembly in which they hold an ordinarily humble position. The repeated attempts to count the House out could only have been excused by success, and even at the best an irregular attempt to terminate the debate would have been injudicious. The motion for excluding strangers might have been supposed by a stranger to convey an undeserved compliment to the speaker, whose feeble vehemence could otherwise not have been considered dangerous. It is true that Sir C. DILKE was allowed to complete his tedious statement without serious interruption; but when Mr. GLADSTONE had concluded his answer, Mr. AUBERON HERBERT's little paradoxes and platitudes ought to have been tolerated, not on account of their value, but from respect to the dignity of the House. It was not necessary to listen, or even to be present, during his oration; and at its close the House could have proceeded to a division. When a political fanatic proclaims opinions which he knows to be distasteful or offensive, his object is attained if his opponents imply by their conduct that they desire to silence him by force. The disturbance which took place is the more unfortunate because it follows after several petty riots against the political allies of Sir C. DILKE and Mr. AUBERON HERBERT. The more thoughtless members of the Conservative party only injure the cause with which they are ostensibly associated by a resort to violence which may hereafter serve as a precedent for more formidable disorders. The antidote to bad taste and bad feeling without or within the walls of Parliament is not the exhibition of the same qualities by others. Attacks against the Constitution will always be harmless as long as the House of Commons exercises with universal assent the prerogative which is formally vested in the Crown. The rabble which applauded Sir C. DILKE's autumn speeches will listen greedily to the assertion that the corruption which has been attributed to the Court has penetrated the House of Commons.

The dryness and formality of Sir C. DILKE's speech would have done credit to the most hackneyed devotee of routine. There was something whimsical in the conventional appeal of a fierce revolutionist to the authority of Mr. BURKE, Mr. DUNNING, and Mr. TIERNY. It was DUNNING who moved and carried the once celebrated Resolution that the power of the Crown had increased, was increasing, and ought to be diminished. If the proposition was true, it logically followed that it was the duty of Parliament to inquire into the resources which enabled the Sovereign to transgress the limits of the Constitution. At that time it was notorious that the KING, as distinguished from his Ministers, took a personal and active part in public affairs; but it would have been too absurd to assert that such interference was practised at the present day. Sir C. DILKE, instead of repeating DUNNING'S complaint, could only suggest that, if the QUEEN were to accumulate too large a private fortune, she might perhaps become independent of Parliament. When the savings of the Civil List render the Army and Navy Estimates superfluous, it will be time enough to take precautions against the despotism which undoubtedly was prevented in the seventeenth century by the financial dependence of the Crown on the House of Commons. BURKE and DUNNING would never have troubled themselves to inquire whether the Treasury might not, on a strict construction of the Civil List Act, be entitled to let at a rack-rent the lodges in the Royal Parks. As Mr. GLADSTONE showed, the Government was exclusively responsible for any irregularity which an astute critic could discover; and if in some trifling instances the convenience of the QUEEN and the Royal Family has been consulted, as in the disposal of the Royal lodges, the country would certainly not disapprove of the exercise of a reasonable discretion. That the Master of the Horse is allowed by custom to use the Royal equipages is not a reason for revolution, and probably it is not even an economical grievance. It is well known that in the QUEEN's establishment there must be surplus horses and carriages for exceptional occasions, and no harm is done if they are at other times appropriated to the use of one of the great officers of State. The provision for the QUEEN's daughters was deliberately made by the House of Commons, although on one or two of the later occasions the grants were opposed by a small minority of members. If the motion had not been discredited by Sir C. DILKE's previous conduct, there would have been no impropriety in inquiring whether the Treasury had exercised due supervision over the transfers from one department of the household to another. In any case the Privy Purse is practically the residuary owner of the entire income; and probably warrants have from time to time been issued in proper form. Members in want of employment may legitimately busy themselves with trivial matters of detail, but unless Sir C. DILKE had some better reason for undertaking his recent agitation, his conduct has been inexcusable. The strings of figures which wearied the House of Commons were paraded at Newcastle as arguments for the overthrow of the institutions which rendered such transactions possible; and artisans were invited to compare their own pittance of weekly wages with the large sums which are spent in maintaining the splendour of the Court. The inference that a Republic would be preferable to a Monarchy was absurdly disproportioned to the statistics which were presented to the House of Commons. A vote in favour of Sir C. DILKE's motion for papers might perhaps have been regarded as an admission that there was some ostensible pretext for his menace of revolution.

Mr. GLADSTONE anticipated the unanimous desire of the House by meeting the motion with a direct negative; and it may be safely asserted that no member has a moral right to force a division which leaves him in a minority of four. It is not unsatisfactory to find that between November and March the PRIME MINISTER has discovered that a proposal to abolish the existing Constitution deserves severe reprobation. It was undoubtedly proper to connect the motion for returns and the speech by which it was supported with the purpose to which Sir C. DILKE had formerly applied the same statements and arguments. The House declined to order even the most harmless returns when it was known that they were to be used for the purpose of giving plausibility to an attack on the Crown. It would perhaps have been better if Mr. GLADSTONE had abstained from giving a partial answer to Sir C. DILKE's speech, and had relied on the preliminary and decisive objection to the entire discussion. Two hundred and seventy-eight members afterwards voted against four, not that this or that petty payment had been sufficiently explained, but that no substantial ground had been laid for an inquiry into the management of the Civil List, and that no question of the kind should be raised for revolutionary purposes. Notwithstanding his long experience and his great oratorical ability, Mr. GLADSTONE is inferior to some of his predecessors in the art of saying nothing when discussion is inexpedient. Lord PALMERSTON, though he had no pretensions to eloquence, would have suppressed Sir C. DILKE more summarily and effectually by refusing altogether to correct or to explain his unseasonable assertions.

Sir C. DILKE and his solitary supporter have, through the blunder of a portion of their adversaries, escaped the sentence which General CHANGARNIER lately described as an amnesty of contempt. There have been a few occasions in history on which it became a duty for the champion of some great principle to stand alone in opposition to the world; but modern martyrdom unattended with the smallest suspicion of danger excites but little admiration. A one-ided zealot who stands immovable when strangers are ordered to withdraw, or when the House is counted, may perhaps persuade himself that he assumes a heroic attitude; but a defiance of general ridicule and reprobation is rarely meritorious. Sir C. DILKE showed a certain amount of tact in adopting the Parliamentary tone and method which might have become Mr. HUME in an attack on some questionable item in the Estimates; but it was universally felt that he was bound, not to explain the terms of his formal motion, but to justify his wanton attacks on the Constitution and on the QUEEN herself. It is difficult to understand how any man of education and ability could have thought that frivolous criticisms on the salaries of coachmen and trumpeters were relevant to a proposal for subverting an ancient Government to which Englishmen are for the most part deeply and habitually attached. In no country is it permitted publicly to question the foundations of social order. The question whether a Republic would possess any theoretical advantages is not properly discussed before crowds which have neither the capacity nor the wish to balance the merits and demerits of different Constitutions. An American DILKE who openly advocated the substitution of a Monarchy for the existing Republic would not meet even with the qualified tolerance which is practised in England.

THE ROUMANIAN JEWS.

THE Jews of Roumania are among the most unfortunate people of Europe. They are constantly being persecuted for no other reason than that they are Jews. They are set upon by infuriated mobs, who show their Christian feelings by kicking, trampling on, and killing the unhappy children of Israel. English philanthropy, which embraces everything in its wide net of speechifying, and inviting subscriptions, and forming committees, has taken up the case of these poor wretches, and has invited Mr. BRIGHT to be present at a meeting on their behalf. Mr. BRIGHT could not attend, but he wrote to say how shocked he was that Jews should be so ill-used, and that religious bigotry should still exercise so much sway in the world. The obvious thing to do seems to be to appeal to the Roumanian Government, but the Roumanian Government is not nearly so powerful to check the evil as it would itself wish to be. It knows that these raids on the Jews are a disgrace to it and to the nation it represents; but then they are exceedingly popular, and the electors of the Chamber are determined not to be balked in their private diversions by the weakness of the Government. The barbarism and fanaticism of the population, and old traditions of hatred towards the Jews, combine to keep up the custom; and Roumanians of the lower classes are impervious to the reproaches of Europe and the criticisms of Mr. BRIGHT. But it is not merely religious fanaticism that sets the Roumanians against the Jews. It is the old story. The Jews are too clever for the Christians. They are more thrifty, more intelligent, more united. They make money when the degraded Christians do not make it. They lend money and get hold of the property of their debtors, and this the Christians resent. There is something certainly very sweet to the barbarous mind in first taking a man's money, and then, when he wants his money back, kicking him and beating him and half killing him on high religious grounds. The Roumanians are in this respect only in the mental state in which Englishmen were in the thirteenth century. The strange thing is, that in spite of all persecution the Jews hold their ground. An extreme amount of persecution, of course, quenches the efforts and spirits of the Jews, as it does the efforts and spirits of every body of men. The Jews were kept out of England from the days of EDWARD I. to the days of CROMWELL. They were hunted into Morocco or into the pale of the Church by the Spanish Inquisition. But they are not to be crushed by half measures. Wherever money is to be made, and they are permitted to hold life even as a persecuted and miserable race, they flourish, multiply, and grow rich. No spot is too remote, no form of trade too disgusting, no climate too unhealthy for the Jew. He does not fear isolation or discomfort, for he and his people have been for centuries isolated and miserable. He is sustained by the traditions of his race, by the sympathy of his brethren, by the hopes of his religion, and by the contemplation of the gold he accumulates. In Roumania the Jews are said to be hated more than in the other semi-barbarous countries in the vicinity, because there are so many of them there. They aggravate the Christians by multiplying as the sands of the sea, where they are most trodden under foot and persecuted; and fear of a power they cannot crush is one of the strongest influences at work to animate the fury of the Roumanian population.

There is no real difference between the Roumanian Jews and the Jews of Galicia or Bohemia, nor can they in their turn be separated from the Jews of Germany, of France, or of England. The dirty, greasy usurers of Roumania are the humble brethren of the financiers of London and Frankfurt, and that the Jews are a great power in Europe is incontestable. What are, it may be asked, the secrets of their power? They are religion, the capacity for making money, and internal union. A ceremonial and, therefore, exclusive religion, a religion that binds together its members by rites that seem strange to the rest of the world, has a strong hold upon those who are within the fold. They are like the tenants of a beleaguered fort cut off from the rest of mankind, and obliged to protect themselves and help each other. But religion is not enough to raise a race into eminence. The Jews and the Parsees are eminent, not only because they circumcize their sons, or light fires on the tops of their houses, but because they make money. The money they have gives them consequence; but it is not only the money itself that does this; it is the qualities that go to making money which raise them—the patience, the good sense, the capacity for holding on when others are frightened, the daring to make a stroke when the risk is sufficient to appal. And the Jews are not only religious and rich, they are bound together by intimate ties. The inner world of Judaism is that of a democracy. The millionaire never dreams of despising, or failing to aid, his poorest and most degraded brother. The kindness of Jews for Jews is unfeeling, spontaneous, and unaffected. The shabbiest hat buyer or orange seller of Houndsditch is as sure of having the means provided for him of keeping the sacred feast of the Passover as if he lived in a Piccadilly mansion. To the eyes of Jews, even the most degraded of Jews do not seem so degraded as they do to the eyes of the outer world. The poorest have perhaps possessions which redeem them in the eyes of their brethren, and many of the lowest, grasiest, and most unattractive Hebrews who walk about the streets in search of old clothes or skins are known by their co-religionists to be able to repeat by rote portions of the sacred volumes by the hour at a time. To all these permanent causes of Jewish eminence there must, however, be added one that has only had time to develop itself since extreme bigotry has died away, and since in Western Europe the Jews have been treated, first with contemptuous toleration, then with cold respect, and finally, when they are very, very rich, with servile adoration. These people—so exclusive, so intensely national, so intimately linked together—have shown the most astonishing aptitude for identifying themselves with the several countries in which they have cast their fortunes. An English Jew is an Englishman, admires English habits and English education, makes an excellent magistrate, plays to perfection the part of a squire, and even exorcises discreetly the power which, with its inexhaustible oddity, the English law gives to him, while it denies it to members of the largest Christian sect, and presents incumbents to livings so as to please the most fastidious bishops. The French Jews were stout friends of France during the war, served as volunteers in the defence of Paris, and opened their purses to the national wants and their houses to the suffering French. The German Jews were as stout Germans in their turn, and in war, as in peace, they are always ready to show themselves Germans as well as Jews. It is the combination of the qualities of both nations that is now raising the foremost of the German Jews to their high rank in the world of wealth. In that world, to be a German is to be a trader whom it is very hard to rival; to be a Jew is to be an operator whom it is impossible to beat; but to be a German Jew is to be a prince and captain among the people.

In this way the Jews have managed to overcome much of the antipathy which would naturally attach to men of an alien race and an alien religion. The English Jew is seen not to be standing aloof from England and Englishmen. But it is impossible there should not be some sort of social barrier between the Jew and the Christian. They cannot intermarry, and it necessarily chills the kindness and intimacy of family intercourse when all the young people know that friendship can never grow into anything else. In order to overcome this obstacle, many wealthy Jews have chosen to abjure their religion, and enrol their households in the Christian communion. But the more high-minded and high-spirited among them shrink from doing this, and accept, and even glory in, the position into which they were born. Fortunately for himself and for England, a kind friend determined the religion of Mr. DIBAKLI before he was old enough to judge for himself, and in his maturer years he has been able conscientiously to adopt what he terms the doctrines of the school of Galilee. If they are not decoyed into Christianity by their social aspirations, Jews are unassailable, for the most part, by the force either of persecution or argument; and although there are some conversions to be attributed to Christian reasoning or Christian gold, they are probably counterbalanced by the accessions to Judaism of Christian women who marry Jewish husbands. The Jews therefore lead, and must lead, on the whole, a family life marked by something of reserve and isolation. But the disadvantages they have thus to endure are not without their compensative advantages. Their family life, by being secluded, has gained in warmth and dignity. In very few families is there so much thoughtfulness, consideration, parental and fraternal affection, reverence for age, and care for the young as in Jewish families. The women, too, have been ennobled, not degraded, by being thrown on themselves and on their families for their sphere of thought and action. They are almost always thoroughly instructed in business, and capable of taking a part in great affairs; for it has been the custom of their race to consider the wife the helpmate—the sharer in every transaction that establishes the position or enhances the comfort of the family. Leisure, activity of mind, and the desire to hand on the torch of instruction from the women of one generation to those of another inspire Jewesses with a zeal for education, a love of refinement, and a sympathy with art. Homes of the best type are of course to be taken as the standard when it is inquired what are the characteristics of a race as seen at its best; and European family life has few things equal to show to the family life of the highest type of Jews. Their isolation, again, makes most of the men liberal and free from the prejudices of class, just as their connexion with their dispersed brethren relieves them from the pressure of insular narrowness. But, as Mr. BRIGHT remarks, religious bigotry is slow to die away altogether; and even in educated English society there are few Christians who do not think themselves entitled to approach a Jew with a sense of secret superiority. If a Jew is ostentatious, or obtrudes his wealth; if his women are loaded with jewelry, if he talks the slang of the sporting world in order to show what a fine creature he is, society is as right to put him down as to put down any Christian like him. But the philanthropists who invited Mr. BRIGHT to attend their meeting may be profitably invited to search their own hearts and ask themselves whether they are quite free from that feeling that the best Jew is never the equal of the worst Christian which is at the root of the Roumanian riots, and which certainly is entirely out of keeping with the tenets and teaching of the school of Galilee.

THE TREATY OF COMMERCE.

THE regret which will be felt in England at the denunciation of the Treaty of Commerce is certain to be misunderstood by the majority of Frenchmen. They will think the feeling itself perfectly natural, but they will find it hard to believe that our regret is for them rather than for ourselves. It is impossible not to compare the expectations which were based on this arrangement in 1860 with the fulfilment of them in 1872. It was thought that when once England had succeeded in getting the heaven of Free-trade into the minds of the French people, the work of conversion was as good as done. Every year, it was supposed, would show them more plainly the wisdom of the policy into which they had been forced by a ruler more clear-sighted in this respect than his subjects, and the only change that was to be looked for was the complete and unconditional abolition of all remaining restrictions on commercial intercourse. Twelve years have passed, and, though Free-trade has made great progress, it is not yet master of the field. M. THIERS has found the Assembly ready enough to thwart him upon many points; but he has had no cause to complain of it upon this one. A doctrine which to Englishmen seems as capable of demonstration as a proposition of EUCLID is still rejected by the mass of Frenchmen, or, if not rejected, is not thought worth insisting on when it is known to be distasteful to the PRESIDENT. It is strange that a nation of such quick intelligence should thus lag behind on a road on which its own interests, properly understood, demand that it should make rapid progress. Englishmen will find a further reason for regret in the probability that when France comes to her senses, those who care more for material prosperity than for political freedom will lament that the enlightened despotism which gave France the Treaty should have been forced to make way for the Republic which ignorantly deprived her of it. The popularity of a defeated cause is the compound result of a large number of individual discontents. Those who are convinced that under Protection France will be less wealthy and less prosperous than she has been under Free-trade, may fairly lament the identification of tyranny with the seven years of plenty, and of liberty with the seven years of famine. Our feelings will be taken by most Frenchmen to be really prompted by selfish grief at being no longer able to make money at their expense. Figures make but little impression on the popular mind, or the fact that in the year before last our exports to France were less than one-fourth of our imports from France might help to disabuse them of this fancy. The French idea of the Treaty of Commerce is that it was a clever scheme for getting rid of English goods. The English idea is rather that it was a convenient scheme for getting hold of French goods. Which of the two theories is the correct one may be left to the test of statistics. In 1870 we paid the French 37,000,000*l.* for what we had from them, while they paid only 11,000,000*l.* for what they had from us.

These figures, though they may not convey enlightenment to Frenchmen, will at all events convey consolation to Englishmen. They may lose a market in which they have been accustomed to sell, but the market in which they have been accustomed to buy will remain open to them, and the buying part of the transaction is very much the larger of the two. It is some evidence of the value set upon Free-trade in this country that this is the only consolation we have allowed ourselves. Considering the talk there has been from time to time about a Protectionist reaction, it would not have been wonderful if some pressure had been put on the Government to restore the tariff which existed before the Treaty. It might have been argued that we abandoned certain sources of revenue in 1860, in return for the new opening extended to English trade, and that, now that this opening has been withdrawn, the proper course is at all events to consider whether we should not resume our former position as regards imports. No suggestion of the kind has been offered. The delusion that to be shut out from buying cheaply is any reparation for being shut out from selling largely is thoroughly exploded. Possibly Sir WILFRID LAWSON may plead that no form of alcohol should be admitted except at a duty which he would like to make prohibitive, and the correspondents of Conservative newspapers may raise an occasional wail over the decline of the ribbon manufacture—a branch of industry in which, for some unexplained reason, Conservatives seem to take especial interest. But no serious suggestion of retaliation will be made from any quarter. Our import trade will be practically undisturbed. Had the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER to deal with a deficit instead of a surplus, the prospect would be less clear, as Mr. LOWE might like to cap his excise eccentricity of last year with an equally eccentric customs duty. But the necessity which was the mother of the match tax no longer exists, and we may hope to be spared any exhibition of financial sleight of hand. The incidence of English taxation is pretty fairly distributed over the several classes of the community, and an increase, when necessary, in existing duties of all kinds will in future be preferable to ingenious experiments in new modes of raising money.

Though the large balance of imports from France over exports from England under the Treaty has failed to convince Frenchmen that the arrangement has not worked to their disadvantage, there is another aspect of the same fact which has possibly had more influence on them. As the Economist has pointed out, only the smaller half of the trade between the two countries is directly affected by the abrogation of the Treaty. Of the 48,000,000*l.* which has yearly changed hands under its provisions, 37,000,000*l.* will continue to change hands as before. This consideration, while it comforts Englishmen, who have been the largest buyers under the Treaty, may also have had its weight with a not over-scrupulous politician in leading him to put an end to the Treaty. The French are more interested in the 37,000,000*l.* of money which they get in return for their goods than in the 11,000,000*l.* worth of goods which they get in return for their money. The interests which have England for a buyer are friendly to the Treaty, but then, as England will go on buying on the same terms, they will feel nothing but a sentimental regret at its abrogation. Consequently M. THIERS need fear no serious unpopularity, even with those who have most profited by the Treaty. If it were ever worth while to spite ourselves in order to spite our neighbours at the same time, we might have made his position in this matter very much less comfortable. A return to the state of things which existed before the Treaty would cause serious dissatisfaction in France. As it is, the wine trade and the silk trade will be uninjured, while a substantial benefit will be conferred on the cotton manufacture. Bordeaux and Lyons may condemn M. THIERS's policy, but it will be with the unimpassioned condemnation of men who are not hurt by it. Rouen will give him the enthusiastic support of men delivered from an inconvenient rival. The one person who will not be considered in the matter is the French consumer. The peasant will have to pay more for his shirt, and if so he will probably lay the increased cost at the door of the Republic. It is curious that no form of free government in France seems to think it worth while to consider anything but particular interests. The two strings which the ex-EMPEROR had to his bow were public order and general prosperity. M. THIERS seems fairly able to answer for the first, but neither he nor the Assembly can bring themselves to see that, for one Frenchman who makes calico, there are a hundred who wear it. In their desire to conciliate the Norman manufacturer, they forget that buyers all over France may resent being forced to take his goods when English goods suit them as well, and cost them less. Under any circumstances the present condition of France must impose heavy burdens upon every one of her people. That is the unavoidable misfortune of a Government which has to pay for a war which it did not make. But to impose additional burdens upon the French consumer by the abrogation of the Treaty with England is exactly the way to make him confuse the authors of the burden which he might have been spared and of the burden from which there is no escape. If ever NAPOLEON III. appeals to the French peasantry to judge between him and those who have succeeded him—and his agents will make the appeal for him, whether he does or does not make it for himself—he will try as far as possible to explain the material difficulties under which France is labouring by reference, not to the money she has had to pay, but to the particular taxes which the Republic has imposed in order to get the means of paying it. If he had had to choose an enemy who would unintentionally play into his hand, he could not have done better than take M. THIERS.

The misdirected thought which the Government and the Assembly have lately been bestowing on finance may help to account for the remarkable lull which has come over the controversies that were raging a week or two back. There seems to be a pious disposition, even on the part of the least pious politicians, to spend Easter in peace and concord. Even the sacred cause of the POPE has had to yield to the universal desire to put aside all subjects of controversy. The monarchical fusion is no longer spoken of, and it begins to be whispered that, unless the idea is revived, M. LEFRANC's Bill against the press will be allowed to slumber in the same limbo with the Manifesto and the Letter of Adhesion. The provisional order of things in France must eventually meet the fate of the pitcher which goes often to the well; but no attempt at putting an end to it seems likely to succeed at present. If M. THIERS's faults and follies do not actually endear him to the French people, they are of a kind that they easily put up with. His financial heresies are pardoned as soon as he gets into the tribune, and if his way of raising money is not always approved by an Assembly which on this subject is less retrograde than the Government, it is something to his credit that he manages to raise it at all.

PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION.

THE subject of private Parliamentary legislation is seldom fairly discussed, for the simple reason that those who understand it best have for the most part a personal interest which tends to diminish their authority and perhaps to bias their judgment. The House of Commons includes many members who have acquired experience in Select Committees; but it is sometimes invited to rely on opinions which are from the necessity of the case theoretical or rather conjectural. The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, the Chief Clerk at the table of the House of Commons, the Speaker's Counsel, and Mr. DONSON himself have the common qualification of general eminence and of want of habitual familiarity with the practice of Committees. Mr. DONSON is indeed Chairman, in virtue of his office, of the Court of Reference, which has illustrated by its notorious failure the inconvenience of a final tribunal to determine mixed issues of fact and of public expediency. The miscarriage has been due, not to the incompetence of the members of the Court, but to the inevitable adoption of rules of practice which are for the most part utterly inap-plicable to the subject matter, and which sometimes degenerate into the narrowest technicalities. For two or three years after their first appointment the Referees exercised exclusive jurisdiction over the engineering details and estimates of public works. If the House of Commons had thought fit to consult those who were acquainted with the subject, it would have learnt that neither engineering questions nor disputes on estimates occupied in the great majority of cases any perceptible portion of the time of Select Committees; but when a tribunal was appointed to solve imaginary problems, a new branch of litigation immediately sprang into existence. Every railway project was opposed on the pretext that some part of the works was ill contrived or that the estimate was insufficient; and the decisions of the Referees often sanctioned fatal objections which would never have been seriously presented to a Committee. The expenses of private legislation were for the time largely increased, and the most mischievous injustice was perpetrated in almost every instance in which a Bill was defeated before the Referees. The fault lay not with the Court, which performed the functions for which it had been unwisely constituted, but with the House of Commons, which had misapprehended the nature of the issues to be tried. After a short trial the experiment utterly broke down; and the duties of the Referees were restricted to the inquiry whether petitioners were entitled to a locus standi before a Committee. Many practitioners at first approved of the reference of questions of locus standi to a separate tribunal; but experience has led to an almost unanimous condemnation of the present practice. Like all other Courts, the Referees adopt fixed rules, and establish as far as possible a body of precedents for their own guidance; and consequently they disregard more and more systematically the merits which almost always depend on the special circumstances of the case. It often happens that petitioners who are both deeply interested and exclusively competent to inform Parliament on the objections to a Bill are excluded from a hearing by a tribunal which takes no cognisance of public expediency or of substantial justice. The appeal to the House of Lords, which Mr. Dodson hastily deprecates, is sometimes rendered necessary by the inefficient machinery which has been provided by the House of Commons. The proposed Court will be of a higher order, but it will almost necessarily aim at that uniformity of decision which is no more desirable in private legislation than in Nisi Prius trials.

The promoters of a change of system naturally refer to the branches of litigation which have been successively devolved by Parliament on external tribunals. Estate Bills, Inclosure Bills, and Divorce Bills were formerly supposed to admit of the exercise of discretion which properly belongs to the Legislature; but the concession of extended powers to proprietors of limited estates in land is now dependant on the application of fixed rules; and nearly twenty years ago Parliament determined, in spite of Mr. Gladstone's strenuous opposition, that release from the bond of marriage should be granted as a right to a petitioner who could prove certain indispensable facts. At a much earlier period jurisdiction over applications for divorce had been tacitly, but exclusively, vested in the House of Lords sitting in a judicial capacity. Lay peers were excluded from interference as strictly as in cases of appeal from the Courts of Laws and Equity, and adherence to the rules of evidence was strictly enforced. A petitioner who could both establish the truth of his complaint and displace any counter-allegations was practically as certain that his petition would be granted as if he had in an analogous case entitled himself to a legal judgment. It had evidently become a waste of judicial power that the highest Court in the kingdom should be employed in hearing evidence and giving verdicts on issues of fact; and the great expense of the previous proceedings in a Court of law and in the Ecclesiastical Court, as well as of the application to Parliament, had created a scandal by making divorce a privilege of the rich. There can be no doubt that Parliamentary jurisdiction is inapplicable to the determination of rights which depend either nominally or practically on fixed rules of law. There was no similarity between the practice of the House of Lords and the reference of Private Bills to Select Committees of either House. The precedent of Inclosure Bills, which, if they were opposed, were formerly considered on their merits before Committees, is more nearly in point. In the great majority of cases Inclosure Bills passed without opposition; and since the appointment of Commissioners to make Provisional Orders, the lord of the manor, together with the proper proportion of commoners, has until lately practically acquired the power of including at pleasure. The Commissioners, perhaps rightly, interpreted the Act by which they were appointed as a direction that they should grant all applications for inclosures, on compliance with certain fixed conditions. The consequence has been that, after many years of acquiescence, Parliament has, in deference to popular clamour, for three successive Sessions refused to pass the general Inclosure Bill which is required to give effect to the Provisional Orders. The Commissioners thought it no part of their duty to consult the public interest, and Parliament has at last remedied the defect by a summary refusal to consider private rights. The Bills which are affected by Mr. Dodson's Resolutions are more complicated than Inclosure Bills, and alternate uniformity of decision for and against the promoters would scarcely be consonant with justice. The transfer of jurisdiction over election petitions to the Judges has not been unattended by drawbacks, although the result is thought satisfactory by the House of Commons. The partial and limited discretion which was exercised by Election Committees was more conducive to purity of election than the adherence to fixed rules which is necessarily maintained by the Judges; but on the whole the conflicting claims of petitioners and sitting members are matters of right; and in this class of inquiries, as in Divorce Bills, the legal rules of evidence were always carefully observed. It was never doubted that the functions of Election Committees were purely judicial, while it is only by a metaphor that Select Committees on Private Bills are said to act judicially, when they are really exercising by delegation the legislative authority of Parliament. One of the advantages which Mr. Dodson anticipates from the appointment of his proposed tribunal is the establishment of fixed rules for the admission or exclusion of evidence. There can be no doubt that his expectations are well founded; but in dealing with issues not of right but of expediency, the practice of Committees in allowing a wide latitude of statement to witnesses is greatly preferable to any less elaborate system. Not only on questions of evidence, but in the substance of its decisions, a fixed tribunal will necessarily be guided by precedent; and in a short time it will be known whether the Court favours amalgamations, running powers, high or low rates, and the transfer of undertakings to public bodies or their retention by joint-stock Companies. Whatever may be its leaning on these and other points, it will necessarily be tempted to commit occasional injustice.

According to Mr. Dodson's calculation, the appointment of an external tribunal would release two or three hundred members from engagements which are supposed to conflict with their more important Parliamentary duties. For five or six weeks in the middle of the Session there are perhaps seven or eight Select Committees sitting; and it is the fault of the authorities of the House if the number is exceeded. Each Committee contains four members, making in the whole forty at the utmost, some of whom are employed more profitably to themselves, and more usefully to the public interest, than in any department of legislation for which they might be less specially qualified. The result of their labours is on the whole highly satisfactory to suitors; and although the expense of detailed inquiries before any tribunal must be heavy, Committees have the merit of acting gratuitously. The cost of Mr. Dodson's tribunal, though it would amount to several thousands a year, furnishes no conclusive objection to his plan; but although the salaries of the Judges would be far more than covered by fees levied on the present scale, the additional expense to the country would be precisely the same as if the payments were made from any other public fund. The fees now provide for the whole expenses of the Parliamentary establishment, and the surplus, if any, is paid into the Exchequer. The occasional appeal to Parliament would be regarded as an anomaly if the tribunal were so constituted as to command general respect. It is perhaps not worth while to remark on the absurdity of the suggestion that the right of appeal should be subject to the discretion of the Standing Orders Committee. The House of Commons will never refer such a question to a body which has no opportunity of judging of the weight of evidence, even if it possessed any judicial aptitude; but it may be allowed that errors of detail may hereafter admit of correction. Before the House of Commons arrives at a decision it would be desirable to obtain a return of the Private Bills which have been introduced within a limited period, with a short analysis of their provisions and objects. The various nature of the questions which have in this form been submitted to Parliament, and the wide legislative discretion which is required to decide them, would probably surprise those who are not practically acquainted with the subject.

THE DUBLIN UNIVERSITY TESTS BILL.

SO far as Mr. FAWCETT's Bill simply extends to the University of Dublin a principle already applied to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, no objection can be made to it. The abolition of tests has in this case been accepted beforehand by the corporation in which it is to take effect. The Provost and Fellows of Trinity College have determined to make a virtue of necessity, and to undo with their own hands the fetters which they cannot hope to retain much longer. Mr. GLADSTONE took exception to the large powers conferred by the Bill on the governing body of the University. No doubt they are very large. All the powers now possessed by the Provost and Senior Fellows with respect to the election of Professors, the control of lectures, examinations, and studies, and the granting of degrees, are to be exercised by the Council of the University, and all other powers are to be exercised by an Hebdomadal Board. There is no need for either of these bodies to come to Parliament, or to the QUEEN in Council, for leave to alter existing statutes or to make new ones. The right to do both or either is vested in them without any limitation other than the prohibition against imposing any religious test. We do not share Mr. GLADSTONE's objection to this part of the Bill considered simply on its merits. There is great force in Dr. BALL's plea that the autonomy of great educational institutions is a thing to be preserved and strengthened. The higher education does not benefit by being treated as a department of State. But the existence of such provisions would of itself be enough to condemn Mr. FAWCETT's Bill considered as a settlement of the Irish University question. The preamble of the Bill recites that it is expedient to abolish tests "under proper safeguards for the good government of the College and University as a place of religion and learning." At first sight it appears as though these words had no counterpart in the enacting part of the Bill. When it is looked at closer it turns out that the framing of these safeguards is left to the new governing bodies. A corporation hitherto closely connected with a particular Church is to be left to make its own regulations for the application of a system of mixed education. Cardinal CULLEN himself could desire no larger liberty. He might consent that the Fellowships in the Roman Catholic University should be open to candidates of all religions, provided that a Board in which the existing Fellows are in an immense majority were allowed to have the control of the lectures, examinations, and studies. It is true that at some distant period the proportion of Roman Catholics and Protestants in the Council of the University and in the Hebdomadal Board may be reversed, but it would need an actuary to pronounce how long it will be before this reversal can occur. Not even an actuary could venture to say how long it will be before it is likely to occur, inasmuch as this depends on the character of the lectures, examinations, and studies organized by the University authorities while the Protestant element is still in a majority. Nothing would be easier than for the University to legislate on these matters in a way which would operate as a virtual exclusion of the mass of Irish Roman Catholics from studying at Trinity College, and by a necessary consequence from being elected to its Fellowships. It would not be necessary for this idea to be consciously present to the minds of the University authorities. They would only have to arrange matters with the ignorance of Roman Catholic sentiment natural to members of another communion to ensure the result. It is idle, therefore, to imagine that Mr. FAWCETT's Bill could possibly be accepted by the Roman Catholics of Ireland as a measure for promoting mixed education. Even if it is taken at its author's own valuation, all that it will do in this direction is to lay the foundation of a system of mixed education which may be built up by and by.

It is worth while inquiring how such a system will work as applied to Trinity College. The Bill, as has been seen, regards the powers vested in the authorities as constituting a safeguard for the good government of the University and College as a place of religion. The Provost and a majority of the Fellows will for some time to come remain members of the Irish Protestant Church, and they will maintain the accustomed services in the College Chapel, and continue to give the accustomed instruction in Divinity to Protestant students. In process of time, however, if Mr. FAWCETT's anticipations are fulfilled, the Provost and a majority of the Fellows will be Roman Catholics. Their powers will remain unaltered, and they will naturally use them for the benefit of their own religion, just as the Protestant Provost and Fellows have been accustomed to use them for theirs. The chapel will be made over to Roman Catholic services, and the theological faculty will become Roman Catholic. These changes will all be within the clauses which give to the University Council the control of lectures and studies, and to the Hebdomadal Board all other powers "heretofore exercised by the Provost and Senior Fellows." There is much pertinence in Mr. BUTT's inquiry whether, "if a Roman Catholic chapel were established in Trinity College and its Provost were a man whose appointment might be attributed to the influence of Cardinal CULLEN," Irish Protestants would continue to send their children there. It is a question which may be said to answer itself. But if Irish Protestants would almost to a certainty not send their sons to a mixed institution of which Roman Catholics had the control, why should Irish Roman Catholics be expected to send their sons to a mixed institution of which Protestants have the control?

There is not much use, however, in considering whether the Roman Catholics of Ireland ought or ought not to accept the opening of Trinity College to men of all religions in full satisfaction of their demands. Whatever opinions may be held on this part of the subject, the fact remains that they will not so accept it. The great majority of the Irish people desire to have an opportunity of obtaining a University degree without abandoning the principle of Denominational education. It is not enough for Mr. FAWCETT to say that this desire of theirs is mistaken. There are many sentiments of which enlightened politicians may entertain this opinion without the State being justified in disregarding or defying them. Let it be granted that Denominational education tends to "perpetuate religious discord," while united education both "tends to make the nation more harmonious, and promotes the highest interests of religion and culture;" still it does not follow that Parliament is to secure the acceptance of this more excellent way by forcibly closing every other. When Mr. FAWCETT asks the House of Commons to declare that those Irishmen who will not accept an education apart from religion shall be shut out from University degrees, he asks it, as Mr. GLADSTONE pointed out, to sanction the infliction of civil penalties on account of religious opinions. There may of course be great difficulty in constructing a system under which this disability shall no longer exist, though even on this point there has been much exaggeration. But there cannot to our minds be any doubt as to the propriety of constructing such a system, or as to the duty of the Government to make the attempt. Whether the Government ought not to have introduced an Irish University Bill during the present Session is a point upon which opinions may fairly be divided; but Mr. GLADSTONE would certainly have been to blame if he had allowed any further uncertainty to rest on the character and scope of such a measure.

The Times is shocked at Mr. GLADSTONE's language, because it amounts in substance to an admission that the demand of the Roman Catholics for the recognition, if not the endowment, of exclusive seminaries is founded in justice. Mr. GLADSTONE says nothing about the endowment of exclusive seminaries. He only says that an Irishman educated at an exclusive seminary ought not to be debarred from a University degree, provided he is fitted in other respects to receive it. If the demand for thus much of recognition is not founded in justice, it is hard to say what justice means. The Times professes itself unable to conceive how Mr. GLADSTONE proposes to carry out his policy. It finds it difficult to believe that it is intended "to leave all sects to their own unassisted endeavours, and to create a University like that of London, which will simply be an examining Board;" and considering that Mr. GLADSTONE expressly characterized the system of non-resident education as the weak and objectionable element in the system of the University of Dublin, there seems no reason why the Times should have tried to believe it. But it can imagine no third alternative between this and Mr. FAWCETT's proposal. In December last, however, a plan was described in this journal which would completely answer the description given by Mr. GLADSTONE of what a proposal for the settlement of the Irish University question ought to be, while at the same time it would not involve either the endowment of sectarian institutions or the abolition of the teaching function of the University. "According to this plan," we said, "all the endowments would be given to the University of Dublin, but provision would be made for their being held by students or teachers of the affiliated Colleges, of which one would represent and continue the Anglicanism of Trinity College, and another would absorb the existing Roman Catholic University. Instead of fellowships and scholarships being attached to particular Societies, as at Oxford and Cambridge, they would all be attached to the University, and the students or teachers of all the affiliated Colleges would be admitted to stand for them. The separate Colleges would thus be placed on the footing of "the Halls at Oxford. Their tutors would be paid as a matter of private arrangement, but they would naturally be mostly chosen from those students who had gained or were likely to gain fellowships in the University. In this way no denomination as such would be endowed, for the affiliated Colleges might be Roman Catholic, Anglican, Presbyterian, or Secularist; and yet no denomination could complain of not having its fair proportion of the endowments, since its share in them would only be limited by the number of scholars competent to hold them turned out by its own College." Of course, as Trinity College has repudiated its Anglicanism, one portion of the scheme would seem to be at a disadvantage; still it is so just in itself that we do not see why it might not be reconsidered under what would certainly be different conditions. As regards its remaining provisions, the plan would, whatever may be its merits in other respects, meet all the perplexities which have baffled the ingenuity of the Times.

THE NAVY.

ON Monday Mr. GOSCHEN was to have introduced the Navy Estimates, but Mr. CORRY interposed and insisted on having a discussion, nominally on the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, but really, as far as his own speech was concerned, on the question whether he was not a safer and more capable administrator than Mr. CHILDERS. This was a challenge which Mr. CHILDERS was nothing loth to accept. Mr. GOSCHEN was of course bound to say something on the subject, and one or two members who have a kind of vested interest in naval matters also took the opportunity of airing their pet views. But the House of Commons as a body very properly stayed away, and declined to countenance such a waste of valuable hours. A good deal has been said about the increasing pressure of business in the House of Commons, and the necessity of economizing time. An attempt has been made to show that it is the private members, as they are called, who are the chief obstructives; but it is doubtful whether the official and ex-official members are not the worst offenders in this respect. Mr. GOSCHEN thought himself hardly used because he was not allowed to introduce his Estimates on Monday; but the truth is that it is the House of Commons which is ill used by First Lords and other Ministers insisting upon "introducing" Estimates at all. All that a Minister has to say on such an occasion might be printed as a preface to the Estimates, and there would then be no necessity for the idle ceremony of a tedious speech. It is impossible for listeners, however well informed, to criticize a speech bristling with figures the instant it is delivered; a pretence is indeed made of discussing it, but it is only a pretence, and the real discussion is always postponed until the speech has been studied in the newspaper reports. Mr. CORRY wasted Monday by moving a Resolution calling for certain changes in the arrangements at the Admiralty, which it was known beforehand that Mr. GOSCHEN had determined to make of his own accord; and Mr. GOSCHEN on Thursday made a speech about the Estimates, which might just as well have been written out and printed along with them. Mr. CORRY was doubly to blame, because he introduced the question of the Megara, which other members, not being in possession of the evidence taken by the Commission, were unable to discuss. Mr. GOSCHEN and Mr. CHILDERS had had the evidence in their hands for some time, and Mr. CORRY had also obtained an early copy of it; but the printing arrangements of the House of Commons are of such a nature that, although the whole of this evidence was put into type and printed day by day for the use of the Commissioners as the inquiry proceeded, and although the taking of evidence practically terminated on the 29th of January, it was not presented to the House until Tuesday last. It is hardly worth while to go into the question of the comparative merits of Mr. CORRY and Mr. CHILDERS as First Lords of the Admiralty. Mr. CORRY says he had a great many important reforms in his head, but he left office without carrying them into effect; and Mr. CHILDERS, after busying himself in pulling the old Board to pieces, might possibly have reconstructed it in a perfect manner if his health had not broken down under the pressure of the labour which he imposed upon himself. The fact that, as soon as Mr. CHILDERS withdrew, the whole office fell into confusion is in itself the best comment on his scheme of departmental organization. Under a Parliamentary system of government, no plan of administration is sound to the success of which the permanent supervision of a particular Minister is indispensable.

The greater part of the discussion as to the constitution of the Admiralty turned on a mere question of names. It is of no consequence whether the office which manages the navy is called a Board, Committee, or Commission, or whether the officials who compose it go by the title of Lords, Secretaries, or Controllers. The essential thing is to take care that there shall be an efficient permanent staff, with well-defined duties and distinct responsibilities; that the team shall be harnessed so that the Parliamentary head of the office can hold them well in hand, and touch up or pull in any one who is not going exactly as he desires; and further that the reins shall be so contrived that they can be passed from one driver to another without throwing everything into confusion. The First Lord and his Secretaries, Permanent and Parliamentary, should exercise a general supervision over the whole department, and should know everything that is going on. If the First Lord is temporarily disabled, the Parliamentary Secretary should be competent to speak for him; if there is a change of Ministry, the Permanent Secretary should be capable of maintaining the continuity of the department, and of connecting the new administration with the old one. It is difficult to resist the conclusion that if the principle by which the patronage and discipline of the army is confined to a non-political officer is sound, it is equally applicable to the navy. In any case the First Lord, who will usually be a civilian, should be provided with the best professional advice in regard to all branches of the service; and if he is a wise man, he will constantly take advantage of it. Mr. GOSCHEN thinks that it would be a mistake to go back to the old system of making the Board a little Parliament, at which everything is brought up for discussion, down to the most trivial matters of everyday routine; but he has resolved that the Board shall meet regularly, and that there shall be consultations on all important professional or technical questions. The Controller is to be a permanent officer; and, although not a member of the Board, he will be allowed to take part in its deliberations, and to explain his views. He will be assisted by a Deputy Controller, who will take charge of the dockyards, and by a Chief Constructor, who will be in the position of a naval architect, and who will confine himself mainly to the study of designs and the scientific work of the Controller's department. The Chief of the Staff is to be abolished, and a new Naval Lord will be appointed to do his work, with a permanent Naval Secretary, who will be, under the Naval Lords, at the head of the personnel of the navy. It may be doubted whether it would not be better to have a non-political First sea-Lord, a kind of naval Commander-in-Chief, permanently at the head of the personnel rather than a Naval Secretary who will be nominally under, but practically from his tenure of office superior to, the moveable Lords. One of the most important reforms which Mr. GOSCHEN has in view is to raise the status and pay of the professional staff of the Admiralty.

Reserving a detailed explanation of the changes at the Admiralty for another opportunity, Mr. GOSCHEN on Thursday stated what had been done, and what it is proposed to do, in order to provide a strong and efficient fleet. The normal expenditure on the Navy may be fixed, he thinks, at about nine millions a year, but the estimates for the present year are half a million above that figure; and since 1870-71 a million has been spent beyond the normal limit. For this million we have obtained ships of the Rupert and Cyclops classes and a number of gunboats; and our coast defences are now in such a condition that, we are told, nothing more need be spent on them. The difference between the estimates of this year and those of last year consists mainly in a reduction in the sum to be applied to the construction of ships. It appears to be the opinion of competent judges that the Devastation is the best type of fighting ship; but Mr. GOSCHEN is a cautious man, and before he gives up building sea-going cruising ships of the first class, and builds more ships of the Devastation class, he is desirous of seeing how the Devastation actually acquits herself at sea. If she gives satisfaction, the Fury, a ship of the same class, which has already been laid down, will be completed; but if not, the money will be spent on small gunboats. In any case, two ironclads of the first class are meanwhile to be built, with armour thicker than that of the Hercules or Sultan, and armed on the broadside principle. Before doing anything more with turret ships, the Glutton is to have a couple of 25-ton guns fired into her; and although the frigates on hand are to be completed, no more frigates are to be commenced. The shipbuilding programme includes a torpedo ship of 540 tons. So much for the ships; now for the crews. Mr. GOSCHEN is able to announce that there is no difficulty either in procuring or in keeping a sufficient number of good sailors. A boy who goes to sea at sixteen is liable to change his mind as to the pleasure. of a life afloat before he is twenty-eight; and a certain proportion of desertions must always be expected. At present they are at the rate of more than a thousand a-year; but this is less than the rate formerly; and it is an encouraging circumstance that eighty per cent. of the men re-enlist at the end of their first engagement. The plan of manufacturing our sailors, taking a boy when quite young and giving him a thorough training, answers so well that the Admiralty means to adhere to it. The Reserve is not in a very satisfactory position, but Mr. GOSCHEN is going to make another effort to persuade men who leave the service at thirty-eight years of age to join the Reserve; and an attempt will also be made to raise a new class of Naval Volunteers in all our large ports in connexion with the gunboats for the defence of the coasts. Perhaps the most important feature in Mr. GOSCHEN'S proposals is the conversion of Greenwich Hospital into a great Naval University for the scientific training of cadets. Boys are henceforth to be taken at fifteen, instead of thirteen, so that they may have two years' more schooling; and Mr. GOSCHEN hopes to be able to introduce a system of limited competition, with the view of "tapping" the public schools, and striking a blow at the cramming establishments. After a year at college, the cadet will go to sea in a man-of-war under naval instructors, and there will afterwards be six months' teaching on shore before he goes up for examination. By means of the Naval University a higher standard of professional study will be introduced into the service. The grant for an expedition to investigate the depth, temperature, circulation, and distribution of animal life in the Atlantic, Indian, and Pacific Oceans is another healthy indication of the attention which the Admiralty is disposed to pay to scientific subjects.

LADY MAYO'S PENSION.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE for INDIA, sitting in Council, has passed a Resolution assigning a pension to Lady MAYO, together with a sum of money as a provision for her younger children. As this Resolution has not unnaturally excited remark, it is worth while to examine it in what appears to be its logical sequence. It begins by setting forth the circumstances which, in the opinion of the SECRETARY and his Council, entitle the widow and family of the late GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA to some mark of public gratitude. Lord MAYO rendered eminent services as Viceroy; while in office he maintained the dignity of the Crown with munificence, and he was killed "by a deed of violence to which he was exposed in the discharge of his public duty." As far as words go, this acknowledgment of Lord MAYO'S services, without going beyond the truth, is sufficiently handsome and unrestrained. It is true that there are some other considerations which either were, or ought to have been, taken into account in fixing the amount of these allowances; but it was unnecessary, and it might perhaps have been improper, to refer to them in a formal manner. Enough is said in the Resolution to justify a liberal grant for the bereaved family; and if the Duke of ARGYLL and his colleagues, having got thus far, had asked anybody else to supply the conclusion to which their argument seemed unmistakably to point, there can be little doubt that the figures would have been very different from those which now wind up the Resolution. It might have been expected that such a prelude would lead up naturally to a substantial result. It is not without a shock of surprise that, after reading about eminent services, personal munificence, and violent death in the discharge of public duties, we come to a proposal to wipe off all obligations by a life annuity of 1,000*l.* to Lady MAYO, and a grant of 20,000*l.* for the younger children. It is a pity the SECRETARY OF STATE did not throw the resolution into the form of a complete syllogism; we have the minor and conclusion, but the major is wanting. Eminent services, most people would be disposed to say, deserve an eminent reward; but in the opinion of the Indian Council, if we may judge by the conclusion at which it has arrived, eminent services and a lavish personal expenditure for the benefit of the public service are sufficiently recognized, we cannot say repaid, by the smallest pension which can with decency be granted to the family of any official not of subordinate rank, who has died under circumstances which give his widow and children a claim upon the Government. One explanation of the paltriness of the allowance which was instantly suggested was that this was only the contribution of the India Office, and that it would be supplemented by a vote from the Imperial Treasury. Mr. GLADSTONE, when questioned on the subject in the House of Commons, affected to believe that it concerned the Indian Government alone. He said he had no official information about it; but he understood that the Resolution published in the newspapers was authentic, and no question of any other provision had, as far as he was aware, been raised. He seemed to think there was a good precedent for this parsimonious gratitude. A thousand a year was granted from the Indian revenues to the widow of the late Lord ELGIN, with another 1,000*l.* from Imperial resources, which was awarded on account of Lord ELGIN'S colonial and diplomatic services. Two blacks, however, do not make a white, and one shabby precedent does not justify another. Besides, if it is a question of precedents, the case of Mr. SPENCER PERCEVAL may be cited; when he was shot by BELLAMY in the lobby of the House of Commons, an annuity of 2,000*l.* and 20,000*l.* down was assigned to his family.

It is absurd to argue this question as if it were merely one of economy. It is a question of policy, and to some extent of justice. The income of the Viceroy is fixed at an amount which is supposed to render a pension unnecessary, inasmuch as it allows a margin for legitimate savings. It may be doubted whether this is a wise or wholesome arrangement. It is not desirable that a Viceroy should be tempted to push his economies too far. He has a great position to maintain in the eyes of a people who expect to see men in authority surrounded by pomp and splendour, and who measure the extent and reality of authority pretty much by these outward signs. It is obviously important that the representative of the QUEEN should be on good terms with the native princes, that he should receive them at his own Court and should visit them in return, and that his dignity and hospitality should not be shamed by a comparison with those of his inferiors in rank. This kind of splendour may be very childish in itself, and some day the people of India may perhaps come to regard it with as much indifference as ourselves; but at present it is certain they attach great importance to it; and it is therefore sound policy to gratify their tastes in this respect. It is admitted that Lord MAYO, while he held the office of Governor-General, maintained the dignity of the Crown with a munificence which was of advantage to Imperial as well as to Indian interests. He had to bear the costly honour of a Royal visit, and he did his best to present the second son of the QUEEN to her distant subjects in such a manner as to leave a pleasant impression on their minds, and to create a kind of friendly personal feeling on their part towards the Crown. It was scarcely possible that the impression should be very deep, and it would be absurd to say that it made much difference in the work of governing the country; but the effect as far as it went was good; and Lord MAYO, in spending his money freely on this and on other occasions, undoubtedly rendered an important service to the country. The India Office must, by the language of its Minute, be held to approve his liberality; and it will occur to every one that if the expenditure was for the public benefit, it should have been supplied out of public funds, and not out of the Viceroy's private purse.

If Lord MAYO had not been prematurely cut off, he might perhaps have indemnified himself to some extent by future economies; as it happened, the outlay to which he was subjected rendered it impossible that he could lay aside those savings which in fact constitute the retiring pension of a Governor-General. It might perhaps be more convenient that the Viceroy should have a Civil List bearing some relation to his necessary expenditure, with a pension to retire upon; but Lord MAYO'S family are at least entitled to expect some equivalent for the money which Lord MAYO might have put by for them, but which he spent for the public benefit. We do not suppose that before Lord MAYO accepted the office of Viceroy he went into minute calculations as to whether it would pay better to go out or to stay at home; but the Government, in making provision for his family, might fairly take into account the prospects which lay before the late Earl if he had remained in this country. It is not desirable that a public man or his family should be a loser by his accepting an office of high rank and great responsibility. There is probably no other position in which so much depends on personal character and capacity as that of Governor-General of India, especially in the present condition of the country. It is of the utmost importance that the best man for the office should be obtained, and that, if he happens to be also a poor man, he should not be deterred from undertaking the office through a fear that he may not be able to save enough out of his income to provide for his family.

It is unnecessary to contend that the manner of Lord MAYO'S death increases the obligation to make an adequate provision for his widow and children. A cynical observer might be tempted to suggest that the shabby allowance of the India Office is intended to convey to the people of India that a Governor-General is a very cheap article, so that when one is murdered, he can always be replaced, and the only expense the Government is put to is the price of a rope for the murderer and a small annuity for the family of the victim. On the other hand, it will certainly not tend to increase the respect which is entertained for a Viceroy to find how little value is placed upon his services by his grateful countrymen, when he is struck down in the midst of an active and zealous career by the hand of an assassin. It is perhaps as well that sentiment should not exercise a very strong or direct influence on questions of finance; but there is an unpleasant disparity that cannot be ignored between the profound emotion caused by the news of Lord Mayo's death and the paltry pecuniary tribute to his memory which is now offered. It is true that an adequate provision cannot be made for the family of every one who loses his life in the public service; but there are exceptions to every rule, and a Viceroy is not an ordinary official. As for the argument that what is called "the common quality of honour" in dying for one's country would be impaired if anything were granted to Lord Mayo's family which would be denied to the family of a subordinate functionary, it has not hitherto been discovered that there is anything ignoble or improper in a general being more highly paid for taking his chance of death in the rear of a battle than the private soldier who has to face the enemy in a skirmish in the front. The India Office has assigned 500*l.* a year to the widow of Chief Justice NORMAN, and the grant to Lord Mayo's family should obviously be in proportion to the rank he held. It is to be hoped that the Government may see their way to remedy a discreditable piece of national parsimony by proposing a vote of money from the Imperial Treasury in addition to the allowance which is to be paid out of Indian revenues.

HERO-WORSHIP.

SOME of our readers may have had occasion during the past fortnight to visit the banks of the Thames at Putney. There, if fortune has favoured them, they will have remarked a knot of young men, clad in blue and white, and, as we may venture to say without offence, of "unusual personal attractions." So far, at least, as broad shoulders, well-developed muscles, and a healthy glow of colour can justify the use of that phrase, they fully deserved it, and were worthy objects for the admiration of the surrounding crowd. For in all probability these good-looking idols were the centre of a ring of enthusiastic worshippers. Stolid masses of elderly flesh and blood gaped in dumb homage at the spectacle before them; the irrepressible street boy squeezed himself with characteristic pertinacity through the interstices of the crowd; and at the outer circumference of the ring the more dignified spectators sought in vain to conceal their emotion under a studied attitude of fashionable stoicism. Certain reflections of a more special kind may perhaps demand expression next week; but in the meantime we would regard this singular observance merely as an instance of the general tendencies of hero-worship. We may, indeed, venture even now to admit that it was not precisely the most elevated form of the passion: there are in this world some virtues, and even some intellectual attainments, which we still regard as decidedly superior to purely athletic excellence. But, abstractedly from the particular cause which called it forth, the scene strikingly exemplified the delight with which the bulk of mankind prostrate themselves before such specimens of human excellence as they are best fitted to appreciate. An admirable instinct! as some moralists exclaim; yet one which, we must confess, appears to us to be as misleading as most other admirable instincts.

Why, for example, does the crowd admire the heroes of athleticism, or of military, or political, or philanthropic, or religious energy? One main ingredient in the admiration is probably the belief that excellence has been obtained at the cost of much self-denial. How many days or weeks those gallant oarsmen must have borne up against aching muscles and labouring breath, and with stern resolution refrained from the fascinations of tobacco! How heroically the politician has listened night after night to speeches in Parliament, whilst Radicals prozed and Conservatives crowed like cocks for the good of their country! How patiently the Christian martyr awaited the spring of the wild beast, and saw the fangs being piled around his limbs! It is all very true; and yet one unpleasant doubt obtrudes itself. If self-denial is the test of merit, tastes differ so unaccountably that it is very difficult to say who is really the worthiest object of admiration. Few people indeed like being burnt at the stake, or exposed to the remorseless cleanness of an able orator. But, short of such unmanly evils, who is to say how far human eccentricity extends? One man, let us suppose, is a prosperous British merchant; his wife is like a faithful vint, and he never has any difficulty in paying the bills incurred by his olive-branches; he has bricks at his doors, makes a fortune, reaches the woolstack, is regarded with universal esteem and confidence, and founds a new family to illustrate his well-won peerage. Another man is a philanthropist; he sacrifices fortune, health, and domestic comfort to his mission; he ventures into plague-stricken cities and offensive dungeons; he pleads the cause of the wretched till he becomes a bore; he reads blue-books; nothing is too tiresome or too disgusting for his energy; and, thus "driven by strong benevolence of soul," or by something equivalent, "he flies like Oglethorpe from pole to pole." But there's the pinch. Is it benevolence or something equivalent? You suppose that the successful lawyer has never known what self-denial means, because he has gained all the prizes that most men desire. You fancy the other man's life has been one course of self-denial, because he has encountered all that which most men shrink. But how can we know without looking into men's souls? For anything we can say, the philanthropist and the lawyer may both have been men with a taste for Bohemianism. The lawyer suppressed it rigorously, because he thought it his duty to employ his talents to good purpose; but to the end of his days he was longing to kick his wig and his briefs into the dusthole, to shake himself free from the bondage of his society, and possibly of his wife, and to wander off to the Bohemia of his imagination. He resists nobly, but he gets no credit for consenting to be rich and respectable, however hard the struggle. The philanthropist, on the other hand, has yielded to his natural taste, and found a creditable name for it; he has not really gone through greater hardships than you can bring as many thousand soldiers as you please to endure at a shilling a day; and not nearly so great as some men will encounter in the chance of an occasional shot at a tiger, or others in the hopes of adding a few dozen species of entirely new bugs—we speak after the manner of Americans—to those already labelled with Latin names. His hobby was a great deal more amusing than these, and brought in far greater returns in the shape of general adulation. Why was it more creditable to ride it? Are we not guilty of scandalous injustice in this instance, and admiring the man most who has really made by far the least sacrifice of his natural tastes?

The answer to one part at least of this difficulty is obvious enough. The amount of self-denial is not, in any sense, a proper measure of virtue. The ideal man would be one in whom the unselfish passions should be so powerful that he would without any self-denial prefer his neighbour's interests to his own. The perplexity which we occasionally observe upon the subject arises from a natural confusion of ideas. We measure a man's virtue very truly by the amount of external obstacles which it will overcome, and we transfer the same mode of reasoning to internal obstacles. A man who speaks the truth when he will be burnt for it has given a greater proof of veracity than a man who speaks it when it will be in his favour; and we therefore are apt to fancy that a man who speaks the truth in spite of a strong disposition to tell lies is better than one who speaks it because lying is naturally hateful to him. There is no end to the confusion which is introduced by this mode of reasoning. We have, for example, the ordinary theory that men of genius should be subject to a different code of morals from the rest of mankind. People talk as if genius was not part of the man himself, but a kind of wild beast committed to him for taming, and exceedingly difficult to keep in order. If we carried out the same system logically, we should infer that a murderer deserved pity rather than blame, because he was mastered by a bump on the back of his head, and, in short, we should make an end of all moral judgments whatever. In one sense it is true that the vices of a man of genius are occasionally more pardonable than those of other men; inasmuch as they do not necessarily indicate so debased a character. Byron's profligacy or De Quincey's opium-eating did not show the simple brutishness which we should have inferred from them in the case of a commonplace reprobate; but, to some extent, might be considered as indicating quick sympathies and brilliant imagination, which, in other directions, might lead them to noble actions. On the same principle, we should not detract from the merits of the philanthropist because benevolence happens to be his hobby, as tiger-hunting or insect-collecting happens to be the hobby of other people; for it is only the most unselfish of mankind who choose their hobbies at the prompting of their unselfish instincts. We should be falling into the same error as if we asserted that a lad who just escaped plucking for his degree was a better mathematician than Newton because he had taken more pains to understand a proposition in Euclid. If, in short, a man takes to philanthropy, we should esteem him in proportion to the strength of his passion, and not in proportion to the effort which it has cost him; though, of course, in many cases, our only means of judging the passion is by measuring the effort.

To descend, however, from these problems of moral philosophy, there remains a difficulty which it is not so easy to answer. No rule can be given for arguing from actions to character, and determining whether a particular action is due to vanity or ambition or benevolence. That is the point upon which our hero-worshippers are in a perpetual state of perplexity. The high priest of the sect evades the difficulty by claiming a certain power of insight which tells him at once whether a man is really acting from good motives or bad. He knows by immediate intuition that Cromwell was not a hypocrite nor Frederick a tyrant; and anybody who takes a different view of those characters is like a blind man arguing about colours. We do not profess to be endowed with this desirable instinct, and must humbly admit that we are frequently a good deal puzzled how to arrange men in the order of moral merit as any competitive examiner will profess to arrange them in the order of intellectual merit. It is a slow and perplexing process to determine whether certain patriots of our acquaintance are actuated more by a faith in their characteristic ideas, or by a desire for popular applause, or by fifty other motives; and, indeed, we are not quite sure that problems of this kind always admit of definite solution. The more one considers contemporary celebrities the more one is inclined to respect Sir Robert Walpole's opinion that, whatever else was true, history must be false. Of course history, as it occurs in this aphorism, must be taken to mean a collection of verdicts as to the motives of the great men by whom the course of events was principally determined; for in other respects we are ready to admit that a certain number of facts are ascertainable; and here is the great advantage of the hero-worship which is practised on the banks of the Thames. There is, we are aware, immense divergence of opinion as to the merits of particular heroes; there are endless controversies as to whether one performer catches the beginning properly, whether another pulls his stroke through to the end, whether a third does not feather a thought too high, and whether a fourth may not be suspected with a certain show of justice of occasionally touching the water a hundredth part of a second before the stroke-oar. These horrible suspicions, we are aware, trouble the minds of many earnest inquirers, and have perhaps caused sleepless nights to some of those gentlemen upon whom the hopes of half the nation hang, and whose designation of "coach" seems to correspond very ill with the heavy responsibilities of their position. The fact may serve to remind us that, even after the most careful and elaborate investigation, the human mind is fallible. But, every deduction being made, it may nevertheless be said of these, as of few other heroes, that we may be tolerably certain of the actual existence of the qualities which we admire. People may dispute whether an orator is eloquent, but unimpeachable evidence shows that a particular youth weighs twelve stone, stands six feet in his stockings, and can write his name with a hundredweight hanging from his little finger. We may doubt the honesty of many politicians, but there can be no doubt that our eight heroes are capable of forcing a boat through four and a-half miles of water in twenty minutes and thirty-five seconds. We apologize if there is any error in our figures, but at any rate there is a tangible, solid, measurable quality about these muscular virtues which must be infinitely comfortable to true believers. They pin their faith to no shadowy essence which may vanish in an instant when an election goes the wrong way or a Minister is turned out, but on facts as solid as a steam-engine. Here at least, they may say, is so much undeniable bone and muscle of first-rate quality, and if our worship is not of the loftiest kind, at any rate it has little to fear from sceptics.

WEDDINGS AND WEDDING PRESENTS.

IT is a matter of unquestionable notoriety that all marriages are made in heaven, and it is equally certain that the beautiful descriptions of them which we read must be due to celestial Correspondents. Such choice of words, such felicity of arrangement, such grace of epithets could not emanate from any inferior source, and the future historian will best gather from these chronicles the condition of the English language in our day, and the manners and customs of those who spoke it. We shall not perhaps be accused of unnecessary repetition if we call attention to the subject. The sun is shining, and peculiar interest is excited. The bridegroom is accompanied by his friend who is officiating as groomsman, and who is qualified by frequent service for the efficient discharge of the multifarious duties which are attached to the position. At precisely thirteen minutes and a half past eleven they alight at the church, saluted by the acclamations of the crowd, the excitement of the bystanders, and the symphony of bells. When the door is opened, four-and-twenty perpetual curates and prebendaries, deans and archdeacons, begin to assist one another. The scene increases in interest until the climax is reached when the bride enters, leaning on somebody's arm, and supported by her bridesmaids supplied with jewellery by a neighbouring firm, which thus has the good fortune to secure eight advertisements of its goods. The religious ceremony is performed with peculiar solemnity, unbroken save by the fidgeting of the groomsman; the benediction is pronounced, and on repairing to the vestry the formalities of registration are gone through—a part of the ceremony which is often described in language worthy of Burke. After this the party repair again to a mansion or residence, where a sumptuous dinner is prepared, and numerous covers are laid—a mysterious but interesting process. It is here that English oratory is displayed to its best advantage, and graceful tributes are paid on all sides, characterized by good taste, by brevity, and fluency. The peer forgets his pomposity, and the fact that nobody listens to him elsewhere; the groomsman feels that the lightest part of his duties has come, and all regret the close of his remarks. At precisely four minutes past two the bride and bridegroom take leave of their friends, and seek the seclusion of a country seat.

Meantime the "friends" separate, and the Correspondent is enabled to furnish those advertisements which all read with interest, if not with excitement. The enumeration of the presents and of the names both of their eminent manufacturers and of their donors fills columns, and affords invaluable opportunities for fine writing. The "members of the domestic household," called sometimes by profane and illiterate people servants, contribute something difficult to carry, and impossible to pack. It is interesting to know that the flowers were not the production of nature, but were expressly supplied for the occasion by the floral manufacturer; nor is the name of the pastrycook wanting who made the indigestible compound termed a "bride-cake." A few years more, and we shall be told the incomes of the guests, their ages, and the construction of the ladies' petticoats. It may be that publicity is thus ostentatiously given to the names of those who contribute towards the future ménage of the happy couple in order that the standard may be raised, and that the donor of a water-bottle may shrink from appearing in the same list with the donor of a diamond bracelet. That aim, however, has not yet been realized, and the list of objects is as varied and as free from all connexion with each other as the words which make up a page of Johnson's Dictionary. The company is a medley one; sugar-basins and aneroids, an antique pair of bellows, the Zoological Gardens faithfully represented in ormolu, a musical-box, a sketch mounted as a fan, fifty travelling articles to make locomotion impossible, a basket of snowdrops, and nine addresses on vellum congratulating the bridegroom on the examples he has to imitate and on the wisdom of his choice, quite unreadable from the magnificent flourishes with which the initial letters abound, and signed by the schoolmaster and schoolmistress in behalf of the scholars. Were the bride and bridegroom endowed with ostrich-like digestions they might find some use for these articles. As it is, they often prove the most unmitigated nuisance, a misery alike to him who gives and to him or her who receives. It occasionally happens that the announcement of an engagement, instead of recalling the fact that two people are perfectly certain of being happy for life, that the cares of this world are over for them, and that a beautiful account of their marriage will appear in the newspapers and enrich the literature of the country, only suggests the painful thought that a present must be given, and, in order to be given, must be bought. To explain the grounds for this impression would be impossible; a slight relationship exists between the victim and one or other of the engaged pair, and the persons about to marry are going to live in London, possibly in a large house; it may be that the intending giver received at some former period a perfectly useless and now blackened object, too dirty to make its appearance again in the world of rubbish, and that he feels bound to reciprocate the attention. "Human nature," says a great authoress, "is so well disposed towards those who are in interesting situations that a young person who either marries or dies is sure of being kindly spoken of." Whatever may be the cause, the dilemma remains the same. Much mental agony is undergone, increasing as the interval before the marriage becomes shorter. Some prudent persons have a stock of objects always at hand, one of which they forward upon receipt of the intelligence, and thus they may have the good fortune to send the first of the fifteen inkstands which follow. She who hesitates is lost; now helplessly bemoaning her condition, now peering unceasingly into shop-windows, and finding that everything costs seven pounds when she is prepared to spend only four. Her sense of her unfortunate position daily grows in intensity, and she may next be seen sitting in a shop with a choice selection in front of her, amongst which are a blotting-book covered with excrescences of brass like a portmanteau, a miniature helmet, two shepherdesses of modern Meissen, a silver-gilt machine for brushing away crumbs after breakfasting in bed, a gentleman in ormolu looking into a windmill about the same size as himself and of the same material, both containing cavities in their insides for matches, the discovery of which would occupy a lifetime. What a choice is here! The biggest fool of her acquaintance has just ordered the silver-gilt machine, which costs thirty pounds, so she takes the windmill with a sigh of relief, and sends it as a little object to remind her friend of the happy hours they have spent together. Her friend sends in return a little note assuring her that she will always value it, reflecting that it is a just requital for the ormolu porcupine stuffed with pins which she had presented on a previous occasion. But the donor and the windmill are not destined to lose sight of one another just yet. It is bad enough to see the rubbish in a shop, but there is some excuse for the production of these costly and worthless trifles. What the dogs are in the East to the streets, the givers of modern wedding presents are to the trade—the scavengers of refuse; what is too dirty, too useless, too ugly for other purposes, they absorb; but it is too hard to be called upon to look at it again when exposed to view in the drawing-room of the unfortunate girl whose future life is to be spent, or supposed to be spent, in its contemplation. There are entertainments of divers kinds and degrees of dulness, but the entertainment which is given for the display of the objects we have described is without an equal. Neatly arranged upon the tables in symmetrical order lie these specimens of English taste, "several hundreds in number," slips of paper being attached to them recording the names of the givers. Here the lady and the windmill meet once more, regretfully perhaps, for some kind friend announces that she only gave two pounds for the candlesticks opposite; another has picked up something for thirty shillings which produces a sublime effect, and the name of the shop where similar objects can be procured is whispered in secret. There is a pleasing equality evinced in the display; Her Grace and the housemaid think the same thing "beautiful," and probably spend the same amount of money upon the object of their admiration.

The custom of giving wedding presents as it now exists is a social tax which, though paid by every one, is only paid grudgingly and on compulsion. It represents neither affection nor interest, and is not productive of the smallest profit to any save the tradesmen whose wares are sold for the purpose. Its counterpart can only be found in the custom which existed a short time ago of giving leaving-books at Eton. The fashion was exactly analogous; little boys gave them to big boys, to whom they always had been, and to whom they continued in after life, complete strangers, subscribing themselves their "sincere friends on their leaving Eton." The head-master submitted to the custom at a smaller cost; wise in his generation, and being an elegant classic, he had published or privately printed a quarto edition of some Latin author which, it is needless to say, nobody ever wanted, and no one ever bought. This peculiarly useless volume was exchanged for the sum of ten pounds deposited in some corner of the room by the boy who was bidding good-bye, whence it was generally supposed that the head-master ultimately took it. This pleasant mode of escaping the tax was unfortunately not open to those who paid for the leaving-books presented by their sons to their sincere friends, and who not unnaturally considered that the annual expenditure of fifteen or twenty pounds was hardly compensated by the possession of some scores of soiled copies bound in yellow calf. What these books are to the library, wedding presents are to the ordinary furniture of a house. What is to be done with the windmill? Should the first opportunity be seized for getting rid of it, there is the risk that its donor will tenderly inquire after it. It cannot be given away after the lapse of six months, for its colour is gone, and it looks as if it might have been present at Hilpah's wedding to Shalum. The poor thing eventually finds a shelter and a home in some spare bedroom of a country house, where damp and dust hasten its decay. Sometimes it is destined to a hawker's fate. One swallow does not make a summer, and the gift of a wedding present does not ensure the celebration of a marriage; the engagement may very possibly be broken off, and one of the consequences is the return of the windmill to its unhappy and original possessor, whose feelings on its reappearance we forbear from commenting on. If the State would include wedding presents among the assessed taxes, and fix a definite sum to be paid at the beginning of each year, great relief would be experienced; the Government would of course realize a profit, and a large sum would still remain to be distributed as marriage portions. The present inequality would be remedied; for, as it is, those who never marry at all (and their number is daily increasing) receive no return for their original outlay; but on the institution of the tax this need no longer be the case. Single women, on attaining the age of forty-five, might, on condition of subscribing a declaration setting forth the extreme improbability of their marrying, and their aversion to that condition, receive the sum to which they would have been entitled on marriage. Widows, on the other hand, would get nothing under any circumstances, being exhorted to remain contented with the ornolu of the first marriage. During the interval before the adoption of this plan we have but one remedy to propose. Surely the old shoes which are now so lavishly thrown away at the departure of the bride and bridegroom are capable of conversion into some valuable substance; which cannot be predicated of wedding presents. Let, therefore, the next "groomsman" set a bright example, and deserve well of society and the oppressed; as the carriage starts let a shower of anoroids, barometers, bellows, candlesticks, vases, mosaics, and antiques gracefully fall and flutter around it. Thus we feel sure that a "peculiar interest would be excited," while the struggles of the crowd to possess objects which to their inexperienced eyes might seem capable of being exchanged for a shilling would give additional animation to the scene. The prevalence of this custom might be expected to modify to some extent the present fashion, the chief compensation for which must be found in the advantages which result from a study of the pages of the Court Journal.

SCHEMES OF CAPITULAR REFORM.

IT was in the heretical reign of the second Constantine that there was no getting about the Roman Empire in any comfort, because the roads were so blocked up with Bishops going to and from the endless Synods of the time. With our improved system of travelling, this particular result is not likely to happen in our days; but it is not at all unlikely that intelligent railway functionaries may have noticed the unusual number of shovel-hats and gaiters which must have been passing to and fro for some weeks past. It is certain that there has lately been an unusual amount of motion about our ecclesiastical, and especially our capitular, dignitaries. Besides the regular Session of Convocation, a Session clothed this time with unusual powers, there have been private gatherings of Bishops, Deans, and others to discuss the reform of our capitular bodies. The Acts—we use the proper ecclesiastical formula—of these gatherings for a time obtained only a private circulation, and so long they did not seem matter for public comment. But, as they have latterly crept out into the full light of the Times, we may as well have our say about them.

That some capitular reform is needful no one who knows anything about the subject can doubt. Reform is the only way to hinder destruction. But reform must be done warily, and with a full understanding of the institutions to be reformed. It must be the work of men who have thought over the subject, who know what reforms are needed, and who have no personal interest in hindering reforms. Deans and Canons cannot, any more than other men, be trusted to reform themselves; but neither can they be reformed by outsiders who have neither sympathy with the institutions nor knowledge of their object or history. And men who are personally interested in the maintenance of abuses sometimes fail to understand that those who are most indignant at the abuses of an institution are likely to be those who most thoroughly understand and love the institution itself.

